They haue another ceremony vpon Palme Sunday of ancient tradition: what time the Patriarch rideth through the Mosko, the Emperour himselfe holding his horse bridle, and the people crying, Mosanna, and spreading their vpper garments vnder his horse feet. The Emperour bath of the Patriarch for his good seruice of that day, 200. rubbles of standing pension. Another Pageant they haue much like vnto this, the weeke before the Nativity of Christ: When euery Bishop in his Cathedral Church, setteth forth a shew of the three children in the Ouen. Where the Angell is made to come flying from the roofof the Church, with great admiration of the lookers on, and many terrible flashes of fire, are made with rozen, and gun-powder, by the Chaldeans (as they call them) that runne about the towne all the Twelue dayes, disguised in their Players coats, and make much good sport for the honour of the Bishops Pageant. At the Mosco, the Emperour himselfe, and the Emperesse neuer faile to be at it, although it be but the same matter played euery yeare, without any new inuention at all.

Besides their fasts on Wednesdayes, and Fridayes throughout the whole yere, (the one, because they say Christ was sold on the Wednesday, the other, because he suffered on the Friday) they haue foure great Fast, or Lents euery yeare. The first, (which they call their great Lent) is at the same time with ours. The second, about Midfomer. The third, in Haruest time. The fourth, about Hallowtide: which they keepe not of pollicie, but of meere superstitions.

In their great Lent, for the first weeke, they doe eate nothing but Bread and salt, and drinke nothing but water, neyther meddle with any matter of their vocation, but intend their shrining and fasting only.

They haue also three Vigils or wakes in their Lent, which they call Stoimia, and the last Friday their great Vigil, as they do call it. What time the whole parish must be present in the Church, and watch from nine of the clocke in the Euening, vntill fixe in the Morning, all the while standing, except when they do fall downe, and knocke their heads to their Idoles, which must be an hundred and seauenteen times, iust, through the whole night.

About their burials also, they haue many superstitious and prophane ceremonies: as putting within the finger of the corpse, a Letter to Saint Nicholas, whom they make their chiefe Mediator, and (as it were) the Porter of Heauen gates, as the Papists doe theyr Peter.

In Winter time, when all is covered with snow, and the ground so hard frozen, as that no spade, nor pickaxe can enter; their manner is not to bury their dead, but to keepe the bodies (so many as die all the Winter time) in an house, in the suburbs, or out-parts of the towne, which they call Bolsedom, that is to say, Gods house: where the dead bodies are piled vp together, like billets on a woodstacke, as hard, with the frost, as a verie stone, till the Spring-tide come and dissolve the frost; what time euery man raketh his dead friend, and committeth him to the ground.

They haue besides, their yeares and monthes mindes, for their friends departed. What time they haue prayers faide ouer the graue by the priest; who hath a penny ordinary for his paines. When any dyeth, they haue ordinarie women mourners, that come to lament for the dead party: and stand howling ouer the body, after a prophane, and heathenish manner (sometimes in the house, sometimes bringing the body into the backside: Asking him what he wanted, and what he meant to doe? They bury their dead, as the party vsed to goe, with coate, hose, bootes, hatte, and the rest of his apparel.

Many

Vigils or Wakes they haue three.

Burials and their superstitious ceremonies at them.

No buriall in the winter.

Month mindes for departed friends.

Buriall according as they went liuing.

Many other vaine and superstitious ceremonies they haue, which were long and tedious to report. By these it may appeare; how farre they are fallen from the true knowledge and practise of Christian Religion: hauing changed the Word of God, for their vaine traditions, and brought all to externall, and ridiculous ceremonies, without any regard of spirit and truth, which God requires in his true worship.

¶ Lastly, an Oeconomicall discourse of the Emperours Court; his Familie and Household affaires: And more priuate behaviour of the people.

Of the Emperours domestike or priuate behaviour.

The Emperours ghostly father

His priuate prayer, and the manner how it is performed in ceremonies

HHe Emperours priuate behaviour, so much as may be, or is meete to be knowne, is after this manner: Hee riseth commonly about foure of the clocke in the morning. After his apparrelling and washing, in cometh his ghostly father, or priest of his chamber, which is named in their tongue, Otez Dubouna, with his Crosse in his hand, wherewith he blefseth him, laying it first on his fore-head, then vpon his cheekes, or sides of his face, and then offreth him the end of it to kisse. This being doone, the clauke of the crosse (called Chresby Deyack Profery) bringeth into his chamber a paynted Image, representing the Saint for that day. For every day with them hath his funerall Saint, as it were a patron for that day. This he placeth among the rest of his Image gods, wherewithall his Chamber is decked, as thicke almost as the wall can beare, with Lampes and wax Candles burning before them. They are very costly and gorgeously decked with pearls and precious stones. This Image being placed before him, the Emperour begins to crosse himselfe after the Russe manner; first on the fore-head, then on both sides of his breast, with Apydy Pomeley, Pomeley mena hofpody, facyoy mena grefnick Syhodesfua: which is as much to say, as, Helpe mee O Lord my God, Lord comfort mee, defend and keepe mee a sinner from doing euill, &c. This he directeth towards the Image or Saint for that day, whom he nameth in his prayer, together with our Lady (whom they call Precheste) Saint Nicholas, or some other, to whome he beareth most deuotion, bowing himselfe prostrate vnto them, with knocking his head to the very ground. Thus he continueth the space of a quarter of an houre or thereabouts.

Then cometh againe the ghostly father, or chamber priest, with a silver bolle full of holy water, which they call in Russe, Smetva vada, and a sprinkle of Basil (as they call it) in his hand, and so all to besprinkle first the Image gods, and then the Emperour. This holy water is brought fresh euery day from the Monasteries, farre and neere, sent vnto the Emperour from the Abbot or from the Priour, in the name of the Saint, which is patrone of that Monastery, as a special token of good will from him.

These deuotions being ended, he sendeth in to the Empreffe, to aske whether she hath rested in health, &c. And after a little pause, goeth himselfe to salute her in a middle roome betwixt both their chambers. The Empreffe lyeth apart from him, and keepeth not one Chamber, nor Table with the Emperour daily, saue vpon the eene of their Lents, or commo Fasts: what time she is his ordinary ghest at bed and board. After their meeting in the morning, they go together to their priuate Church or Chappell, where is saide, or sung a mourning Service (called Zamtrana) of an houre long or thereabouts. From the Church he returneth home, & sitteth him downe in a great Chamber, to be seene and saluted by his Nobility, such as are in fauour about the Court. If he haue to say to any of the, or they to him, then is the time. And this is ordinary, except his health, or some other occasion alter the custome.

About nine in the morning, he goeth vnto another Church within his Castle: where is sung by Priests and Choristers, the high Service (called Obedna or Complin) which commonly lasteth the space of two houres: the Emperour in the mean time, talking commonly with some of his Councell, Nobilitie, or Captains, which haue to say to him, or hee to them. And the Councell likewise conferre together among themselves, as if they were in their councell house. This ended, he returneth home, and recreateth himselfe till it be dinner time.

Hee is serued at his Table on this manner. First, euery dish (as it is deliuered at the Dresser) is tasted by the Cooke, in the presence of his high Steward, or his Deputy. And so is receiued by the Gentlemen waiters (called Shilshy) and by them carried vp to the Emperours Table, the high Steward going before. There it is receiued by the Sewer (called Erafinoy) who giueth a taste of euery dish vnto the Taster, and so placeth it before the Emperour. The number of his dishes for his ordinary seruice, is about seauentie; dressed somewhat grosely, with much garlike and salt, much after the Dutch manner. When he exceedeth, vpon some occasion of the day, or entertainment of some Ambassador, he hath many more dishes. The seruice is sent vp by two dishes at a time, or three at the most, that hee may eate it warme: first the baked, then the roasted meates, and last of all, the brothes. In his dining Chamber is another Table: where sit the chiefe of his Nobility that are about his Court, and his ghostly Father, or Chaplaine. On the one side of the Chamber standeth a Cubbard, or Table of Plate, very fayre and rich, with a great cesterne of Copper by it, full of yce and snow, wherein stand the pots that serue for that meale. The taster holdeth the cup that hee drinketh in all dinner time, and deliuereth it vnto him with a say, when he calleth for it. The manner is to make many dishes out of the seruice, after it is set on the Table, and to send them to such Noblemen and Officers, as the Emperour liketh best. And this is counted a great fauour and honour.

After dinner, he layeth him downe to rest, where commonly hee taketh three houres sleepe, vnlesse hee doe employ one of the houres to bathing or boxing. And this custome for sleeping after dinner, is an ordinary matter with him, as with all the Russes. After his sleepe hee goeth to Euen-song (called by them Vechurna) and thence returning (for the most part) recreateth himselfe with the Empresse till supper time, with iesters, and dwarfes, men and women, that doe tumble before him, and sing many songs after the Russe manner. This is his common and vniuersall forme of recreation betweene his meales, wherein hee most delighteth.

One other speciall recreation, is the fight with wilde Beares, which are caught in pittes, or nettes, and are kept in barred Cages for that purpose, against the Emperour bee disposed to see the pastime. The fight with the Beare is on this sort: The man is turned into a circle walled round about, where hee is to quite himselfe so well as hee can; for there is no way to flee out. When the Beare is turned loose, he cometh vpon him with open mouth. If at the first push hee misse his ayne, so that the Beare doe come within him, he is in great danger. But the wilde Beare being very fierce, hath this quality, that giueth aduantage to the Hunter. His manner is, when he assaileth a man, to rise vpright on his two hinder legges, and so to come roaring with open mouth vpon him. And if the Hunter then can push right into the very breast of him betweene his fore-legges (as commonly he will not misse) resting the other end of the Boare-speare at the side of his foot: and so keeping the pike still towards the face of the Beare, hee speedeth him commonly at one blowe.

But many times these Hunters come short, and are eyther slaine, or miserably torne with the teeth and talents of the fierce beast. If the party quite himselfe well in this fight with the Beare, he is carried to drinke at the Emperours Seller doores where hee drinketh himselfe drunke for the honour of Hofpedare. And this is his reward, for aduenturing his life for the Emperours pleasure.

To maintain this pastime, the Emperour hath certaine Huntsmen, that are appointed for that purpose, to take the wilde Beare. This is his recreation commonly on the Holy-daies. Sometimes he spendeth his time in looking vpon his Goldsmiths and Jewellers, Taylors, Embroyderers, Painters, and such like, and so goeth to his supper. When it draweth towards bed time, his Priest faith certaine prayers; and then the Emperour blefseth and crosseth himselfe, as in the morning, for a quarter of an houre or thereabouts, and so goeth to his bed.

The Emperor that now is (called Theodore Iuanowich) is for his person of a mean stature, somewhat lowe and grosse, of a fallow complexion, and enclining to the drop sicke, hawk nosed, vnsteady in his pace, by reason of some weaknesse of his limbs, heavy and vnactive, yet commonly smiling almost to a laughter. For quality otherwise, simple and slowe witted, but very gentle, and of an easie nature, quiet, mercifull, of no martiall disposition, nor greatly apt for matter of pollicy, very superstitious, and infinite that way. Besides his priuate deuotions at home, hee goeth euery weeke commonly on pilgrimage to some Monastery, or other that is needfull hand. He is of 74. yeares old, or thereabouts, and hath reigned almost the space of fixe yeares.

Of the Emperors priuate,
or household
Officers, Master of the Horie,

The chiefe Officers of the Emperors household, are these which follow. The first is the Office of the Boiaren Consheua, or Master of the Horie. Which containeth no more then is expressed by the name, that is, to be Ouerseer of the horie, and not Magister equitum, or Master of the horsemen. For hee appointeth other for that seruice, as occasion doth require (as before was said.) He that beareth that Office at this time, is Borris Federawich Godenot, Brother to the Emperesse. Of Horie for seruice in his wars (besides other for his ordinary vses) hee hath to the number of ten thousand, which are kept about Mosko.

The Lord
Steward.

The next is the Lord Steward of his household, at this time, one Gregory Vasilowich Godenot.

The Lord
Treasurer.

The third is his Treasurer, that keepeth all his monies, jewells, plate, &c. now called Stepan Vasilowich Godenot.

Controller.

The fourth his Controller, now Andreas Petrowich Clelinine.

Chamberlain

The fifth his Chamberlain. He that attendeth that Office at this time, is called Eistoma Bisabroza Pastelnishay.

Tasters.

The sixth his Tasters, now Theodore Alexandrowich, and Iuan Vasilowich Godenot.

Harbengers.

The seventh his Harbengers, which are three Noblemen, and diuers other Gentlemen that do the Office vnder the. There are his ordinary Officers, and Offices of the chiefeft account.

Of Gentlemen beside that waite about his Chamber and Person (called Shilsey Strapcy) there are two hundred, all Noblemens sonnes.

His ordinary Guard is 2000. Hagbutters, ready with their pieces charged, and their match lighted, with other necessary Furniture continually day & night: which come not within the house, but waite without in the court or yard, where the Emperour is abiding. In the night time, there lodgeth next to his bedchamber, the chiefe Chamberlaine, with one or two more of best trust about him.

A second chamber off, there lodge fixe other of like account, for their trust and faithfulness.

In the third Chamber lie certaine yong Gentlemen, of these two hundred, called Shilsey Strapcy, that take their turnes by forties euery night.

There are Groomes besides, that watch in their course, and lye at euery gate and doore of the Court, called Eshoppick.

The Hagbutters or Gunners, whereof there are two thousand (as was saide before) watch about the Emperors lodging, or bed-chamber by course two hundred and fifty euery night, and two hundred and fifty more in the Court yard, & about the Treasurie house.

His Court or House at the Mosko, is made Castle-wise, walled about with great store of faire Ordenance planted vpon the Wall, and containeth a great bredth of ground within it, with many dwelling houses. Which are appointed for such as are knowne to be sure and trusty to the Emperour.

The priuate behaviour and qualitie of the Russe people, may partly be vnderstood, by that which hath bene sayde concerning the publique state and viage of the Countrey. As touching the naturall habite of their bodies, they are, for the most part, of a large size, and of verie fleshy bodies; accounting it a grace to be somewhat grosse and burley, and therefore they nourish and spread their beards, to haue them long and broad. But, for the most part, they are very vnwieldy and vnactive withall. Which may be thought to come, partly of the Climate, and the numbnesse which they get by the colde in winter, and partly of their dyet, which is most of rootes, onions, garlike, cabbage, and and such like things that breed grosse humours, which they vse to eate alone, and with their other meates.

Their dyet is rather much then curious. At their meales they beginne commonly with a Chark, or small cuppe of Aqua uita, (which they do call Russe wine) and then drinke not till towards the end of their meales, taking it in largely, and all together, with kissing one another, at euery pledge. And therefore, after dinner there is no talking with them, but euery man goeth to his bench to take his after-noonnes sleepe, which is as ordinary with them as their nights rest. When they exceed, and haue varietie of dishes, the first are their baked meates (for roasted meates they vse little) and then their portage and broaths. To drinke drunke, is an ordinary matter with them euery day in the week. Their common drinke is Mead, the poorer sort vse water, and thin drinke called Quasse, which is nothing else (as wee vse to say) but water turned out of his wittes, with a little branne meashed with it.

This dyet would breede in them many diseases, but that they vse bath-houses, or hot-houses, in stead of all physike, commonly twice or thrice euery weeke. All the Winter time, and almost the whole Summer, they heate there Peaches, which are made like the Germane Bathhouses, & their Polads like Ovens, that so warme the house, that a stranger at the first shall hardly like of it. These two extremities, specially in the Winter of heate within their houses, and of extreme coldewithout, together with their dyet; maketh them of a darke and fallow complexion, their skinned being tanned and parched both with cold and with heate: specially the women, that (for the greater part) are of farre worse complexions, then the men. Whereof the cause I take to be their keeping within the hot-houses, and busying themselves about the heating & vsing of their bathhouses, and peaches.

The Russe, because that he is vsed to both these extremities of heate and of colde, can beare them both a great deale more patiently, then strangers can doe. You shall see them sometimes (to season their bodies) come out of their Bathhouses all on a froth, and fuming as hot almost as a Pig at a Spit, and presently to leape into the Riuer stark naked, or to poure colde water all ouer their bodies, and that in the coldest of all the Winter time. The women, to mend the bad lute of their skins, vse to paint their faces with white and red colours, so visibly, that euery man may perceiue it. Which is made no matter, because it is common, and liked well by their husbands: who make their Wives and Daughters ordinary allowance, to buy them colours to paint their faces withal, and delight themselves much, to see them of fowle women, to become such faire Images. This parcheth the skinned, and helpeth to deforme them when their painting is off.

They apparell themselves after the Greeke manner. The Noblemans attire is on this fashion.

First a Taffia, or little night-cappe on his head, that couereth little more then his crowne, commonly very rich, wrought of silke and gold thred, and set with pearl and precious stones. His head he keepeth shaven close to the very skin, except he be in some displeasure with the Emperour. Then hee suffereth his hayre to grow and hang downe vpon his shoulders, couering his face as vgly and deformedly as he can.

Ouer the Taffia, hee weareth a wide Cap of blacke Foxe (which they account for the best Furre) with a Tiara or long bonnet put within it, standing vp like a Persian or Babilonian Hat.

About his necke (which is scene all bare) is a collar set with pearle and precious stones, about three or foure fingers broad.

Next ouer his shirt (which is curiously wrought, because he strippeth himselfe into it in the Summer time, while he is in the house) is a Shepon, or light Garment of silke, made downe to the knees, buttoned before: and then a Caslan or a close coate buttoned, & girt to him with a Persian girdle, whereat hee hangs his kniues and spoone. This commonly is of cloth of gold, and hangeth downe as low as his anckles.

Ouer that he weareth a loose garment of some rich silke, furred and faced about with some gold Lace, called a Ferris.

Another ouer that, of Chamlet, or like stuffe, called an Alkaben, sleeued and hanging lowe, and the cape commonly brooched broached and set all with pearle.

When he goeth abroad, he casteth ouer al these, which are but sleight (though they seeme to be many) another garment called an Honoratkey, like to the Alkoben, saue that it is made without a collar for the necke. And this is commonly of fine cloth, or Camells haire.

His buskins, which he weareth in stead of hose, with linnen folds vnder them in stead of boot-hose, are made of a Persian leather called Saphian, embrodered with pearle. His vpper stockes commonly are of cloth of gold.

When he goeth abroad, hee mounteth on horse backe, although it be but to goe to the next doore; which is the custome and maner also of the Boiarskey, or gentlemen.

The Boiarskey or gentlemen attire is of the same fashion, but diffreth in stufes; and yet he will haue his Caslan or vnder-coate sometimes of cloth of golde, the rest of cloth or silke.

The Noble woman (called Chyna Boiarskoma) weareth on her head, first a kall of some soft silke (which commonly is red) and ouer it a frontlet, called Obrofa of white colour.

Ouer that, her Cap (made after the coife fashion of cloth of golde) called Shapka Zempska, edged with some rich furre, and set with pearles and stones. Though they haue of late begunne to disdain embrodering with pearles about their caps, because the Diacks, and some Merchants wiues haue taken vppo the fashion.

In their cares they weare care-rings (which they call Sargee) of two inches or more in compasse, the matter of golde set with Rubies, or Saphires, or some like pretious stone.

In Sommer they goe often with kerchiefs of fine white lawne or Cambricke, fastened vnder the chinne, with two long tasselles pendent. The kerchiefe spotted and set thicke with rich pearle.

When they ride or goe abroad in raynie weather, they vse to weare white hats with coloured bands, called by them Scapa Zemsky.

About their neckes they weare collers of three or foure fingers broad, set with rich pearle and pretious stones.

Their vpper garment is a loose gowne

(called Oposhen) commonly of Skarlet, with wide loose sleeues, hanging downe to the ground, buttend before with great gold buttons, or at the least, silver and gilt, high as bigge as a walnut. Which hath hanging ouer it fastened vnder the cappe, a large broad cape of some rich Furre, that hangeth downe almost to the middes of their backes.

Next vnder the Oposhen or vpper garment, they weare an other, called a Leitnick, that is made close before with great wide sleeues, the cuffs or halfe sleeue vp to the elbowes commonly of cloth of golde: and vnder that a Ferris Zemsky, which hangeth loose buttoned throughout to the very footes.

On the hand-wreasts they weare very faire Bracelets, about two fingers broad of pearles and precious stones. They goe all in Buskins of white, yellow, blew, or some other coloured leather, embrodered with pearle. This is the attire of the Noble woman of Russia, when she maketh the best shew of her selfe. The gentlewoman apparrell may differ in the stufes, but is all one for the making or fashion.

As for the poore Mausick, and his wife, they goe poorly clad. The man with his Odnoraskey, or loose gowne to the small of the legges, tied together with a lace before, of course white or blew cloth, with some Shube or long waist-coate of Furre, or of sheepe-skinne vnder it, and his furred cappe, and buskins.

The poorer sort of them haue their Odnoraskey, or vpper garment, made of Cowes haire. This is their winter habite. In the sommer time, commonly they doe weare nothing but their shirts vpon their backes, and buskins on their legges.

The woman goeth in a redde or blew gowne, when she maketh the best shew, and with some warme Shube of Furre vnder it in the winter time. But in the sommer, nothing but her two shirts (for so do they call them) one ouer the other, whether they be within doores, or without.

On their heads, they weare caps of some colored stufes, many of veluet, or of cloth of gold; but for the most part, kerchiefs. Without care-rings of silver, or some other metall, and her croffe about her necke, you shall see no Russia woman, be she wife, or maide.

Cruelty of these Ruffe people.

Vagrants begging poore.

As touching their behaviour, and quality otherwise, they are of reasonable capacities, if they had those meanes that some other Nations haue, to traine vp their wittes in good nurture and learning. Which they might borrow of the Polonians, and other their neighbors: but that they refuse it of a very felle pride, as accounting their owne fashion to be farre the best. Partly also (as I sayd before) for that their manner of bringing vp (voyd of all good learning, and ciuill behaviour) is thought (by their gouernors) most agreeable to that State, and their manner of gouernement. Which the people would hardly beare, if they were once ciuilled, and brought to more vnderstanding of God, and good policie.

This causeth the Emperours to keepe out all meanes of making it better, and to be very wary for excluding of all peregrinitie, that might alter their fashions. Which were lesse to be disliked, if it set not a print into the very mindes of his people. For, as themselves are very hardly and cruelly dealt withall by their chiefe Magistrates, and other superiours; so are they as cruel one against another, especially ouer their inferiours, and such as are vnder them. So that the basest and wretchedest Christian (as they call him) that stoupeh and crouche like a dogge to the Gentleman, and licketh vp the dust that lieth at his feete, is an intollerable tyrant, where he hath the aduantage.

By this meanes the whole Countrey is filled with rapine, and murder. They doe make no account of the life of a man. Yet shall haue a man robbed sometime in the very streetes of their Townes, if hee goe late in the euening: and yet no man to come forth out of his doores to rescue him, though he heare him cry out. I will not speake of the strangeness of the murders, and other cruelties committed amongst them, that would scarcely be beleued to be doone amongst men, especially such as professe themselves to be Christians.

The number of their vagrant and begging poore is almost infinite; that are so pinched with famine and extreme neede, as that they doe begge after a violent and desperate manner; with, Giue mee, and cut mee; Giue mee, and kill mee; and such like phrases. Whereby it may bee ghesseid, what they are towards strangers, that are so vnaturall and cruell towards their owne. And yet it may be doubted whether is the greater, the crueltie, or intemperancie that is vsed in that Countrey. I will not speake of it, because it is so foote and not to be named. The whole Countrey ouerfloweth with all sinne of that kinde. And no matuell, as hauing no law to restraine whoredomes, adulteries, and like vncleaneesse of life.

As for the truth of his word, the Ruffe (for the most part) maketh small regard of it: so he may gaine by a lie, and breach of his promise. And it may be said truly (as they know best that haue traded most with them) that from the great to the small (except some few that will scarcely bee found) the Ruffe neyther beleueneth anie thing that another man speaketh, nor speaketh any thing himselfe worthy to be beleued.

These qualities make them very odious to all their neighbours, especially to the Tartars, that account themselves to be honest and iust, in comparison of the Ruffe. It is supposed by some, that doe well consider of the state of both Countreys, that the offence they do take at the Ruffe gouernement, and their manner of behaviour; hath beene a great cause to keepe the Tartar still heathenish, and to mislike (as hee dooth) of the Christian profession.

ridiculous (although it bee maintayned in vulgar opinion) that venoms or poysons should be limited to a certaine time, by empoysoners. For, how can it be so, seeing Physical medicines, euen such as are most profitable, whose vertue (in knowledge thereof, is limited to the composition and quantitie of the dose) cannot be apprehended, but by long and frequent experience? And that being knowne, doth not yet leaue vs any certaine act, but coniectural: wherefore, I cannot see by what reason, an empoysoner should gaine a prehension of time, for the efficacie of this poyson. For, it is not lawfull to make triall, without danger, no nor without punishment: euen as if the action of Physicall receipts, should be experimented vpon healthfull persons.

Triall of poy-
sons made on Dogs, Hogs,
Birds, &c.

It may be alleadged, and I am of the same opinion too, that they approue their poysons vpon beaſts, as Dogges, Swine and Birds, and that thereby they constitute rules to themselves; hauing obserued diuers times of death, according to the nature of the poysons. As if the natures of men, (being the most temperate of all creatures) and the other were not verie farre different. Besides, it is much more easie, that a precise and certaine houre of euent and successe, should happen vnto beaſts, then to men. For, creatures deprived of reason, haue very little diuersitie (in their kinde) betweene them, feeding on one and the same pasturage, and being not addicted to sundry studies, and occupations: from whence ensueth, that euen by and of the same things, beaſts endure (almost) passions alike.

sities betweene

Very great & strange varieties among mee,
for seldom or complexion.

But for men, although they agree together in kinde, yet notwithstanding they are so different, as seldom or neuer, shall we find two together of likeness in face: but are diuerse in complexions, conditions and occupations or professions, and no one like other among a thousand. Vndoubtedly, I am of the minde, that in the kinde of man, there is as many differences among particulars, as there is diuersities of kinde among all other creatures. And therefore, it ought to be held altogether abusive, and noway firme, and such coniecture of empoysoners; as is very easie to be proued, and made plaine to euery vnderstanding: and vpon this hopefull perswasion, wee will fall presently to our businessse.

Many haue thought and held, that Theophrastus (a very graue and approued Philosopher) was the Authour of this opinion, because he wrote thus of Aconitum. It is said to be compounded in such sort, that it can kill at a certaine time: as namely, within two moneths, three moneths, sixe moneths, a whole yeare, and sometimes in two yeares. And some affirme, that such people shall die more miserably, then if they could haue resisted longer time. For their bodies will impair by little and little, perishing in a daily languishing: whereas such as die suddenly, haue the more easie death.

But the authoritie of Theophrastus, or of our selues, can moue nothing in this matter; considering, that he wrote this, more vpon others opinion, then his own, as the words themselves doe euidently testifie. And if any one desire to know the cause of this perswasion, hee shall meete with a two-folde answer thereto. The first is, the subtile craftinesse of men, who flatter and fondly play with their owne vices. For, how many may be found, that can not so patiently endure, when they are reprobued in some euill, happening by an external accident; as if one should tell them, that it received originall by a bad temperature of their body, or of their owne intemperance? For, admit that nothing could be saide, to bee the cause of the first constitution, and therefore (by consequent) the reprooche of his imperfection concerned him nothing: yet notwithstanding, because it is our owne naturally, we will conceale and couer it, yea, and fauour it beyond measure. So that if there happen any fault on the behalfe of our imperfection, we stand most in feare to be thereof reprobued. And hence it ensueth, that we more gladly yeelde agreement, to haue the cause from some external occasion, then of any intior.

Examples in this case are very manifest, euen in such as haue least knowledge, being ignorant in good Arts and Sciences, transported by simple iudgement of fellowes. As aged, and the most part of weak witted people doe, to whom nothing admittable can be spoken, ynlesse it be referred to some Saint, or poyson closely giuen, or to the witching lookes of some old woman: whence proceeded the complaint whereof Virgil speaketh.

For there must needes be probable lying, that either instantly, or soone after the poyson is giuen, or continued in the surest manner; if any length or respite of time can be giuen thereto.

The other cause of this opinion, is the depraued interpretation of Astronomical Theoremes or Speculations. For the prooofe whereof, Astrologers constitute (which is true) the diuers manners or passions of inferiour bodies, to be from the diuers coniunction, opposition and interchanged aspect of the superiour. From hence, the ignorant vulgar take occasion, to ground and establish the varietie of effects, euen vpon the least differences that can be obserued in the celestiall bodies.

The second untrue and aberration of
the second
cause.

As when they constitute some one plant, to haue power and efficacie against feaues; provided, that it be gathered before Sunne rising. This is an error spread too farre abroad. For, not onely from these differences (triuall, light, and of no account at all) men commonly construct the diuersitie of effects in their kinds: but also would haue the accidents of those effects to be diuers, for the selfe same reason; euen as is the time to manifest the efficacie of poyson. The folly (in this point) further related by Theophrastus, he sayth: That death happeneth in as short a time, as a Plant is to be gathered. Let vs seeke then for a true solution of this Probleme, by reason rather then the testimonies of any. Which we may most commodiously doe (if I abuse not mine owne iudgement) by beginning with the definition of venome or poyson; to the end it may be the easier vnderstood, what the matter is that vrgeth our instant disputation.

A definition
of venome, and what it is vn-derstood to be

The operation
of poyson
in their owne
nature.

We properly call venome or poyson, whatsoever being receiued into the body, doth so fight against the body, as it is not to be surmounted; but contrariwise, doth so alter the body, as the body it selfe alters in diet. In all venoms there are two especiall differences: for, eyther they are enemies to humane nature, by reason of their manifest qualitie; or else they are aduerses thereto in their whole substance. Moreover, some may kill quickly, others more tardily, euen of their owne proper nature. Such kill suddenly, and in fewest daies and houres, which are immediately carried to the profunditie of the hart. Such venoms are extremely hot, and (for the most part) corrosiue or putrefactive; the Greeks call them Sepiques, endued with most subtile parts. For, colde and grosse venomes are more ydle, and insinuate into the veins and arteries more slowly.

Some there are, which infect and kill the body, by their onely vapour or insublimable exhalation. Others, that holde the prime place of atrocitie and malignitie. As certaine poisons artificial, which haue so subtile a vertue, as being but rubbed or annointed vpon the stirrups, will pierce thorow the booties of the Rider, euen till it attaine to the naked soale of his foote; and from thence ascendeth vp into the body, by the fountaines or ouertures of the skinn, and so corrupt all the members. Brides and Saddles of horses may also be infected, and afterwards, indued by naturall heat into the arteries and veins of the rider entering by the pores in his hands and thighs. As in like manner, Garments, Beds and Coverings may be poysoned. To these venoms may be referred, such as kill only by sight, smell, or being but tasted onely (without swallowing or letting downe) suddenly destroying a man; without any the least lingering.

Of some that

dles for horses, garments,

All venomes or poysons bring present death with them, for as there remains not any time of respite, for succor to saue the poore mans life, but he dies. I vnderstand, that such poysons are in frequent vse among the Turkes, and such other nations. Grosse venoms or poisons do differ from these, as being slower in performing their action; but in the end burne very strongly, bite, eat, torment, & by their lingering) beget the greater strength & cruel violence.

Such speeding poysons are in daily vse amongst the Turkes and other barbarous nations.

Now there is not onely a difference of efficacie, in poisons of diuers kinds, but also there happens to them as great a varietie of respites, to hurt according to their constitution and temperature, by whom they are taken. For some feeble the harme sooner or later then others; some are ouerthrowne thereby, others escape. Because many times it comes so to passe, that the poisons power is mitigated & overcome, by the very complexio of him that hath receiued it, else, that it is so strong of it self, as it needeth no other counterpoyson to vanquish it. So falleth it out with them that dwell in pestilent aires, & others that are attainted with the plague: some of them being sicke, chance to die suddenly, others later, and other (in the end) escape.

If it be so, it seemes then altogether ridiculous to affirme, that it is possible to giue a poison, which (at a day prefixed, & at a certaine time of that day) shall cause the parties death, & that the condition of the poison is so to doe. To which error I may well referre another, fauouring of the same taste, and which we haue long since ouerthrowne, to wit: That medicines take the beginning of their mutation or changing from our heate. Whence it ensueth, that being grossly pressed, they produce their effects the later. But if I should consent to them herein, yet notwithstanding, they can neuer come to approve their affirmation, vnlesse it be capiously. For if any man argue thus: This drugges discovereth his power later then this; therefore he will doe it at a certaine time. The argumentation is false, and Aristotle calleth it Elenchus non consequens: Euen as if a man should say, A Goate is a Beast, therefore a Goate is an Affe. For, To do a thing late, and to do a thing at a certaine time, are of diuers kinds, and differ from doing a thing in some time.

Heereby it appeareth, that these great Professours haue no other eye, but onelic on the conditions of the poysons, as in this poynt it is very euident, for we heare no distinction of bodies: but onely pre- sence of the poyson, whereunto they onely attribute the limitation of time, and not to any complexion in the parties. Obseruation hath bene made, that poison hath bene giuen at a Feast or Banquet to diuers persons, all in one houre, (when friends haue merrily met together, without suspicion of any such villanie) whereof some dyed suddenly, others died within some few dayes after, and some felt no anguish at all, yet every one received a like quantitie.

The like we see to happen daily in purgative medicines, which being giuen to diuers persons (euen all alike in measure, and all alike in preparation) they worke vpon some bodies very suddenly, others more slowly, others very hardly, and vpon some nothing at all. Moreover, the vacuities of some men is with much ease, others with great difficultie; grievously grinding or cutting, and frequent debility of the heart. What need is there then of alleading many men, when vpon one and the same man, one and the same medicine cannot produce the same effects.

Seeing then, that according to the diuers and vnparallel complexion, & conformation of the body, we see such things to happen, for the most part; and besides, that the iust temperature of euery particular man is no way to be comprehended: how then shall any one man dare to say, how long time naturall heate shall resist or withstand poison? Say I admitted, that some one man should be so expert an empoysoner, that he could weigh (in a certainty of iudgement) the power of his poyson, euen as exquisitely as he weigheth muske in the Ballance: yet notwithstanding, I will neuer graunt, that he can as exactly limite poyson, for the nature of him that is to receiue it: but he will faile somewhat of the end, or of the time by him proposed. For, Physicke it selfe is held to be a Science, grounded but vpon coniectures, concerning what is to be prescribed for euery man, in the proper quantitie and qualitie of meetest remedies. For, no man knoweth how to write or speake iustly or properly, as Galen saith in the third booke of his Methods. And a little after: In the Arte of Physicke (saith he) there is not aie thing or remedie, but may be named in his kinde: but that which cannot be spoken, written, nor entirely appointed or ordained, is the quantitie for euery one.

Hee repeateth this same matter many times, and to the purpose ensuing, as enstrueting, that euery man hath his peculiar curing, and that the naturall proprietie is vnpeakeable and incomprehensible of an exact Science. Vulgar Physitians call it Idiosyncrasis, the naturall proprietie, as Galen saith. And because all confesse, that it cannot be comprehended; they attribute the true Art of Physicke to Asculapius & Apollo. For the principle, and foundation (as it were) of perfect, compleate, & infallible Physicke (which Galen calls; The true Arte of Medicine) is the particular knowledge of Naturals. Whereupon he makes this addition. If I knew how to acknowledge iustly, the nature of each one in particular: I should verily thinke to be such a one as Asculapius, and to know as much in my understanding. But because it is not to be doone, I am determined to exercise my selfe so much, to come so neere him as a man may, and to exhort others therein to follow mine example.

If Physicke then be coniecturall, and not certaine in the party that prepareth or appoineth remedies to euery body, & the issue is not to be seene, but finally by a long obseruation and experience; who can perwade himselfe herein concerning poysons? For, if in the Art of physicke, Experience is dangerous, as the wife & learned Hippocrates well aduise vs: it is easie to conceiue, how vncertain the prooofe of poysons are, because it is not lawfull to experiment their vertue, both without danger and punishment also, as wholesome medicines in diuersitie of persons.

And whatsoever hath bin obserued vpon brute Beasts, as I formerly saide, is very vnapt for any accommodation to a man, because the natures of men and beasts are greatly differing, as namely by this prooofe: that Stares feede safely vpon Hemlocke, and Quails on Helleborus, which are both physicke and poyson to vs. From these reasons then we may collect finally, that the Arte (if it may be termed an Arte) or coniectures of empoysoners, is to be esteemed very erroneous, and of slender firmnes: considering, that one selfe same poyson produceth his action, sometimes quickly, and sometimes slackly, and that not so much by any reason in it selfe, as by the nature and complexion of the body, widensse or narrownesse of the passages, strength or weaknesse of naturall heate; and the plenty or scarcity of semblable excrements, & diuers other meanes.

For the power of poyson remaineth sometimes vaine and fruitlesse, or mightily rebated, according to such bodies, as haue their faculties of the soule stout and strong, by reason of an excellent good temperature. And Galen thinketh, that the building and composition of the body, is the cause why Hemlocke killeth a man, & nourisheth Stares. Whereto he addeth, the strength and vigour of heate, diminishing and subtilizing, in regard he is perwaded that it happeneth so, that colde poysons better and sooner doe declare their force, when they are giuen to hott natures. Which may appeare a Paradoxe to many: but hauing bin made most euidently apparant by the said author, I dare

As for the nature of excrements, they weaken the actions of poysons, being repugnant to their qualities. For if there be any abundance of phlegme in the entrails, the power of hot poyson will be greatly rebated: and on the contrary, hot moyltre hasteneth the action of such a poyson. Likewise, ouer-copious chollier stoppeth and breaketh the stupefactive venome receiued, whereas phlegme fauoreth it. And all that these wicked empoysoners do know, is nothing else, but what poysons onely kill, by euident condition of their qualities, and that they hurt with all their substance. Such are they as kill by corrupting or corrosion, which must haue time to enforce their mallice (as Galen saith) whereas other do weaken themselves by their tardying. For they do all purifie in time, & so much the more, as the place is moister and hotter.

Such then as worke by purtifying, time doth augment their action: because they encrease the corruption, and in regard they cease not to corrupt themselves; reciprocally they corrupt and rot the body. From whence ensueth, that death is caused long time after: especially such poysons as are of grosse and earthy substance. Thus you may see, what empoysoners haue learned by long obseruation.

First, they know how to distinguish venomes, which kill by their insigne and notorious qualities, from other that cause death by their whole substance.

Secondly, that they naturally bring to any man whatsoever, a most sudden harme, and yet doe not discouer their vigour, but vpon longer time.

Thirdly, that (of both the two kinds) they kill eyther sooner or later (without any respect to the body) according as they haue the most, or the least quantity.

Fourthly, they can deale in such sort, that all poysons shall be tempered according to their owne pleasure, and make them sweeter or sharper, because they should kill the sooner or slower, which is without any feerer or myracle of nature.

We usually exercise the same cunning, in purgative drugges, setting an edge on such as are dull and flowe, and giue them as spurs to further purpose: and contrariwise, wee retaine ouer-hasty penetration in the other, by mingling with them, such as are naturally more slacke & tardy. But that a man should limit the effects of poysons, to a certaine day, and to a point or moment named; we hold to bee merely absurd and ridiculous, because the nature of each man cannot be perfectly knowne (as we haue before sufficiently declared) from whence proceedeth the most vncertaine tearme or time of euery poyson, for procuring the death of a man. For euery naturall action meeteth with diuers effects, according to the diuers disposition, as well of that which worketh, as of that which suffereth. And this happeneth, not onely by reason of euident qualities, but also of hidden and proper: whence also it ensueth, that the thing which doth this man a great deale of harme, may bee as profitable to another.

Pedro de Albano (whom some call the Reconciler, or Peace-maker) where hee explicated this question, propoundeth: That he may do it, who hauing certainly knowne the continuance of a mans life, by the measure and quantity of his radical humour: may giue him a poyson, that shall consume in ten yeares space. From hence he collecteth, some men may bee poysoned, that droope and dry away daily (vulgarly termed in Italian, Herbati et Strigati) and so it may bee ordered sometimes, that poysoning may bee limited. But that it is to be presupposed by Astrologie, I hardly thinke to be euer diuined.

I confesse, that all such as are seene to droope and decay by little and little, being empoysoned, haue a long affliction: but yet there is no certaine time when those men shall bee taken hence. Pliny speaketh of no time knowne more certaine of death, then vs of the Sea Hare (a venomous fish) bringeth, where he saith: Such men as (in eating) feede poyson, and by the first signe perceiue the poyson: shall dye in as many houres after, as the Hare hath liued. Now, who shall diuine the age of the Hare, to the ende, that the appointed houre of death, may be fore-tolde thereby?

And yet if I did admit them, that a man did know how many dayes the Hare hath liued: I can neuer grant (for al that) that all men shall dye at one and the same time, because one and the selfe same poyson, worketh diuersly, according to the diuersity of mens bodies, as it hath bene more then sufficiently proued. So that it had bene much more truly saide (as the same Pliny after addeth) The saide poyson can haue no certainty of time, according as Licinius Macer also saith.

CHAP. VII.

Of diuers erroneous and idle opinions, conceived in fantastike braines, and verily beleued, as if they were sound truths.

People erre in many matters, concerning diuers creatures (haply not inuented of them selues) but held by elder and precedent intimation; as little also apprehended or vnderstoode by them; but, perhappes, mere fictions of their owne braines, vpon some appearing probable reasons. As wise and woorthie Poets, who haue entrusted bad and befall men, to the imitation of vertue, by witty fables and pleasant inuentions, which euer hath bene, and still is permitted as lawfull in them, euen as the like licence is allowed to Painters, as Horace testifieth, saying:

*Poets and Painters equall power containe,
To say on do, what best shall like their braine.*

As for Painters, we see that they figure an Angell in the forme of a Youth, clothed with a garment of Starres, bare headed, and hauing wings like a Bird. And the Soule of man is represented like to a young Infant, stark naked. The diuell, so haue hornes, and a dreadfull taile: And yet neuertheless, these are but spirites without bodies, and cannot carry the resemblance of any visible creature.

In the like manner, Hell, which is but a place, is figured with a hideous gaping throat: Death, being but a priuation of life, is resembled by the Anatomized bones of a dead man, carrying a Scithe in his hand. Loue, which is but a passion and accident, not subsisting any way of it selfe, is painted and presented like a naked child, childe, and blind; wearing wings, a Bow, and a Quiuer furnished with Arrowes. The Windes, which are but a moued agitated Ayre, are figured with mens heads, hauing their Cheekes hugely swolne, euen as we see one founding of a Trumpet.

As for Astrologers, though they want paintings, whereby to enstrut ignorant people: yet haue they demonstrations likewise, and presentation is made of the twelue Signes of the Zodiack (which are but certaine Starres) yet disposed into diuers figures, as one of a Ramme, another of a Bull, the third of two twinned infants, &c. And so the images of heauen which are out of the Zodiack; one in forme of a Beare, another of an Eagle, others in riuers, in an Harpie, Dogge, Dragon, &c. And next the Planets, which are but stars, as Saturne, Iupiter, Mars, Mercurie, and Venus; these beare the forme of personages, in diuers habites and countenances: but the Sun and Moone are otherwise shewne and distinguished.

Painters also, haue euermore denoted the figure of a Starre with five rayons or beames, thereby expresting the twinkling splendour: although all the Starres do not sparkle in that manner, and well wee know beside, that they are all round in figure, without points or corporeall beams. As for the Elements, they figure the fire (which is inuisible) like vnto our artificial fire, which is not much amisse to the purpose. The Ayre cannot be painted, no more then heauen, cleare and transparent bodies; but yet they are represented by a blew or azure colour. Water is figured by Waues, and the Earth in shape of a Globe, rounde as a Ball.

Of Creatures, they counterfeyte some fabulously: as the Salamander, which is no such thing as it is painted; nor the Dolphin likewise: as it is presented in Armes and Deuices; Nor the Flower de Luce, as it is commonly knowne to euery one. And the Heart, be it of a man, or of other creature, it is of no such shape as Painters giue it.

The Pellicane is figured, with her sharpe Beake turned vpon her breast, which she launcheth therewith, to make hir blood yssue forth, for the nourishing of hir young ones, euen to the price of her owne life, dying thereby: And yet we see and know that the Pellican hath her beak edgelesse, flat, and broad; iustly like in fashion vnto the Apothecaries Spatule or Slice, as being no way able to wound her breast. Also, the Greeke worde [Pellican] signifying an Axe or Coopers Adge or Ads, plainly declareth that her Beake is flat, & as it should be.

Moreouer it is sayde, that the Sire or Hee-Bird, beatech the young ones, euen as with blowes on the face, or (as we vse to say) boxes on the eare, vntill they are almost dead; and then the Dam woundeth her breast, to resume them with her blood: blowes commonly are giuen with flat, and not pointed things.

The Phoenix, being painted burning her selfe in a fire, prepared purposely for her; is much more fabulous. But al these things are lawfully permitted to Painters and Poets (as we saide before) vpon some good respect and secret reason, needlesse to bee reported here, making mention onely but of certaine erroneous opinions, which the vulgar holde for sure and most certaine, and which are the more excusable, because many great Philosophers and ancient Physitions, haue defended the like opinions.

1. Of the Viper.

I hath bin a very ancient opinion, that the Viper ioyneth with her male, by reueyning his head in at her mouth (through defect of other genitall partes) and that the female by the delight shee feelleth, locketh her teeth so fast together, as thereby shee biteth off her males head, and so conceyeth. Afterwards, when the time for deliuey cometh, the yong ones hauing no other yssue, and (euen as it were) to reuenge the death of theyr Father: bite and tear the belly of their mother, whereby shee dyeth. Here is the reason why its saide of a Posthumus, of whome the mother dieth in deliuerance. He is like the Viper, that neuer seeth his father nor mother: This hath sometime serued as an Embleme with this deuice or motto, Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris.

All this is false, and fauored by fables, but badly; that being well vnderstoode, which Aristotle hath said. The Viper (saith he) is conceived of Egges which she hatcheth

in her belly, and become little Vipers: they come forth all formed, being depoyled of the membrane or thinnie skinne, which contained them within the wombe; and that is their seconde. But the later-most (mooned with impatience) bite and tear that membrane, to issue forth the more hastily. For the damme or mother bringeth above twenty, and yet deliuereth but one daily, which maketh the him-mot impatient, and constraineth them an-gerly to gnawe the tunicle or membrane; but neither the mothers sides or belly, as is vaine-ly imagined.

Many may be deceived also, concern-ing the original and etymologie of the word, as if Vipera were to say, Quasi vi-piens: whereas it is (indeed) of Vreum pi-rens. For there is not any Serpent, that produceth her broode or young alive, or liuing, but the Viper. Others lay egges, which (out of the belly) are conuerted in-to Serpents.

2. Of the Beaver, called Castor also.

IT is vulgarly helde, that this beast tea-reth away his testicles with his owne teeth, when he perceiueh himselfe to be pursued by Hunt-men: hauing a kind of knowledge naturally, that they seeke him only for them. Whereupon some thinke, that this name of Castor was giuen him: because he geldeth himselfe, and so (by consequent) becometh chaste.

Which is mcerely false; for, as Disco-rides wrote long since; hee can by no means reach or touch his stones. Those are onely two tumours, which (by yeares) comes to him, & are as imposthums, full of fatte matter or suppuration, called Casto-riam, which also hee can not teare away. And he is not rearme'd Castor, of gelding; or of chastite; but of the Greeke word Gaster, which significth a Belly, because he is full paunched, and this is nothing else, but by changing the letter Ginto C. Read hereupon the most learned History of M. Ronsdelius, of Fishes, in the last chapter of the second Tome.

3. Of the Salamander.

Great error is there also, concerning the true Nature of this creature, which is said to liue in the fire, and hath power to extinguih it. From which coniecture, was taken the deuice of great King Francis, the first of that name (father of Arts and Sciences) Nutrisco, & extingo: I feed and extinguih.

Disco-rides hath very learnedly deli-uered the contrary, and Galen also saying: That the Salamander can resist the fire for some time; but it burneth, by carrying any long while therein. Neuthelesse, it were better to hold with Aristotle, in saying; That the Salamander is not burned in the fire, but walks aloft vpon it, extinguih both the flame and coales.

Experience, which is more strong then all authorities of the wisest in the world, teacheth vs, that this is a matter no way to be credited. As for the figure of the Salamander, the portraiture thereof also is mcerely fabulous, and contriued by Painters, who haue thrust such an ima-gination vpon it; making shew also of it, to be a farre greater Beast then it is. It is like to the smaller sort of Lizzards, which frequent the wallies in Languedoc, named Langroles, and in Daulphine Larmules. But the Salamander is somewhat greater, marked with many spots. His body is full of a white moysture, and thicke like Milke, which issueth forth by the pores of the skinne, pressing it neuer so little. Which milke or moysture is so colde, that the Sa-lamander may (for some time) withstand the fire, but yet not long, without burn-ing, roasting and dying, as we haue many times made good triall of. Farre is it from quenching the fire, or much lesse liuing in it: like as the Chameleone liueth by the ayre, and I iudge both alike in truth: albeit I neuer saw any Chameleon alitue to make proofe of.

4. Of the Shee-Beare.

IT is said also, that the produceth a peece of flesh, not hauing the forme of any creature: and afterward shee licketh it in such manner; that thereby onely shee gi-ueth it both fashion and forme. This is but a kinde of hyperbolical speaking, for to say truly, the yong one is very vnlight-ly after the birth, being all couered with foame or froth, and in such a quantity, as it seemeth indeede but a hump of flesh, without any distinction of parts. The Dam or Mother cleanseth it immediately thereof, by licking al the filth away, wher-

So may we see a W helpe (or a yong Lambe newly yeaned) much muddled and befouled at the first, as it is hardly knowne at the prime view: but when the Damme hath doone her louing and naturall Office, then all the parts are plainly scene and distinguihed.

CHAP. VIII.

An vniuersal Question: What Language a child should speake, that neuer heard any speech. That a man or woman borne dumb, is necessarily deafe. As also, bee that is Nurst among dumbe people, And not on the contrary, that one dumbe by Nature, should be deafe: And whence it ensueth, that a man is so tardie, in knowing howe to speake.

Vulgar people beleue, and hold it as a thing most as-sured, that a man shoulde naturally speake the Lan-guage of Adam, if he neuer learned any other speech from his infan-cie; even as if hee had bene nurst by a dumbe Woman, among dumbe people; or in a Desert vterly vninhabited of peo-ple, where neuer any speech had bene heard.

Herodotus declareth in his second booke, that Sammetich, a King of the Egypti-ans, was desirous (on a time) to make proofe hereof, to the end, that he might iudge thereby, what was the most auncient and naturall Language, of all them that were spoken in the world. He caused two Children to bee nurst in a Forrest, where neuer any voyce of man was, or could be heard. After two yeeres were past, and they being brought before the King, sometimes they could pronounce this Word Ede, which in the Phrygian tongue, significth Bread. Whereupon some gathered, that the Phrygian was the first language of man.

But as Saint Augustine sayeth, these children might haue learned the Word Rec (and so retained it) of Goats, among which they were nourished. For, as hee sheweth in his worke of the quantitie of the Soule; all manner of speaking is by hearing, and by imitation. Notwithstan-ding, in his Booke of the Cittie of God, hee thinketh and beleueh, that before the confusion of Tongues (which happened at the building of the Tower of Babel) the Hebrew Language was natural-ly to all. As if words were an action pro-ceeding from naturall instinct, or the sim-ple and proper motion of the soule: even as if they had power in themselves (and of themselves, with some naturall inclin-ations) to bring forth in euidence and effect speech, without any enstrueting. Such knowledge is to sucke, to cry, mourne, laugh, mouing hands and feet, & when strength serueth, to go.

The Goate, Lambe, Chicken, and other such like creatures, so soone as they are bred and brought forth, bring them-selves to the teates, knowing naturally, that there is their nourishment. Beeing grown greater, they make choise (among a thousand diuers plants) such as best dig-est and agree with their complexion. They bleate and cackle, euen from their production, which answereth to the cries of children: and this is done without tea-ching, or any enstrueting, or so much as example or imitation.

Man hath the like actions and repre-sentations, euen as other creatures, sim-ply naturall of his owne, and without any apprenticeship. But the worde or Speech, which is a voyce significative, expresseing the conceptions of a reasonable Soule: they proceede onely and wholly from a Science or Discipline, which is comprehended by the means of hearing. So that it is impossible, that any one being deafe, from his birth, and persevering in the same deafenesse, should euer knowe how to speake, although that his tongue, and other parts thereto appointed, rare most exquisitely compoled and ordain'd, as none more formally can be any way de-fined.

What then shall wee say of him that neuer heard anything? Speech is a Dis-cipline, no lesse then that of Musick: both the one and the other, are apprehended by hearing. From whence it cometh, that a child (in what place soeuer it is nourished and brought vp) apprehendeth

Adam could neuer have spoken any naturall language of his owne, no more then we: but God inspired him with an understanding soule, capable of such a language as pleased him: As he did likewise to Eve; and their first children learned to speake by them, even as ours now do of vs.

Heere wee are to know, that from the corruption of our first Parents transgression, we haue and hold all our naturall conditions and inclinations, and namely, the very greatest imperfection that can be, of enclining more vnto euill then good, more truly learned Original sinne. But as concerning speech or speaking, we haue it not but by aptitude & habilitie, euen as all other disciplines or instructions.

What is truly
naturall of
the Soule.

That which is truly naturall of our soule, is enclined or carrected into a body of such quality, temperature and complexion, as man ought to haue for his perfection. For the sonde nicenesse of birth, is like the infant in his first yeare, vnapt to reason, by the imperfection of his body, and likewise as they, who by accident of sicknesse, or passion of minde (as Loue and idle disturbances) become weakly brained, foolish, fottish, lunaticke, and mad. In all which imperfections, the soule is euermore her owne, remaining still in her integrity: and yet (neuertheless) cannot exercise her reason, by not hauing the body at her command.

Aristotle instructeth (to singular good purpose) That our soule is ignorant of all things, and like vnto a new Table, newly polished, and prepared, wherein nothing hath bene depicted or engrauen, when it was infused into the body of man, but sent downe from Heauen as we beleue. Shee hath nothing but simplicity, sincerity, purity, facility and conueniencie, with inclination and aptitude to every Arte and Science, and to all knowledge of things diuine and humane (which is the true definition of Philosophy) Alwayes referred and excepted, those faculties and actions, necessarily required in a liuing soule, as those in Beasts; which our soule exerciseth in the body from the very beginning, and before the infant is borne, without doctrine or discipline (as already hath bene related).

Doctrine is not requisite in her, but for Artes and Sciences, hauing nothing in her, whatsoever diuine Plato sayeth to the contrary, affirming; That the reasonable soule hath knowledge of all things, when it cometh into the body: but being plunged and submerged in the great humidity of the body, it forgetteth all. Like to him that becometh obliuious, or (as they say in Greeke) sicke of a Lethargie, in regard of the Phlegmaticke humour which drowneth his braine. But afterward, in such measure, as the body loseth this great humidity, and drieth it selfe by little and little: the Soule also recouereth it selfe by paucity of degrees, and comprehendeth all things demonstrated and shewne vnto her, as in remembering and acknowledging her selfe, and not in learning any nouelties.

This was the opinion of good olde Plato, which maketh well for such as affirme, that wee haue some certainty of Language, which came from our first Parents, Adam and Eve: and that wee should (in time) speake the very same, if the other, which wee ordinarily heare in our houses, did not preoccupate it. But in truth, our soule neyther knoweth, or holdeth (of it selfe) any Language, nor is affected or giuen to any one in particular: but enclined equally, and is indifferent to all tongues, and in so good manner, as one hindereth not another, which (perhaps) a naturall tongue would, if it had any at all. At leastwise, some slippes or branches were to be remembered thereof, as in such, that could not altogether forget the accents, or the prolations, with some certaine words and phraes of their mother-tongue.

The reasonable soule then, hauing not any language of it selfe, is very proper and apt to comprehend, and well to expresse by found and entire instruments,

Chap. 7.

Of Naturall Speech.

The happy memory of King Michridates.

That the voice is only of nature, and not of words or speech.

Every creature hath properly a voice.

Aristotle lib. 7. lib. 1.

What it is to speake, how it is formed, and to what end.

How an infant beginneth first to practise, and attaineth to speech.

ments, all diuersity of tongues. As it is recorded of King Michridates, to haue so happy a memory; that he could well and properly speake two and twenty diuers Languages.

By nature, we haue no more simply then a voyce, common to all other creatures that breathe, and different onely in them, by and according to their kindes. For every animall hath a proper voyce, which grossly signifieth his affections or passions: Which is no way knowne how to be expressed (saith Ammonius vpon Aristotle) or represented by letters or syllables, no more then the sundry murmures of the Sea, and of the Windes. Euen so, man in his prime or first moneths, when hee liueth simply as a beast, hath nothing but a voyce onely, before hee learns to speake: whereof being deprived, he is said to be dumb, although he hath not lost his voyce. Whereof Aristotle speaketh very notably in his Problems: That Man onely is dumbe.

Speech then is nothing else, but to fashion and articulate the voyce naturall, by addition of a vocall consonance, in the composing and enterlacing, for the exprelling of significant words, which explicate, and (as a man may say) do infan- tize and produce the conceptions of man: which are infinitely more diuers, and in farre greater number, then those of other Creatures, exempted of reason and discourse. And therefore it greatly behooueth, that a man should know extraordinarily, how to diuersifie his voyce, for answering to that which the great capacity of his spirit containeth.

An infant collecteth and assemblith diuers conceptions in his vnderstanding, and the words which he heareth (accompanied with some actions) strue to make signification of all: which he comprehendeth by little and little, and then retaineth by frequent reiteration. Afterward, when his tongue is growne more firme and able; hee strueth to represent that which he hath retained, by imperfect fumbling, and at the end of a little long apprenticeship, speaketh like to a young Parrot, after a long time spent in listening. For otherwise, as well the one as the other, would haue but his branches or slippes, which is the naturall voyce, without any other signification, then of certaine affections or passions, as we haue already said.

Lets now obserue that which Aristotle saith, in his Historie of Creatures. Those creatures which speake, haue voyce also: but all such as haue voyce, speake not. For, such as are deaffe by nature, are also dumbe: where by they may yet render a voyce, but not speake one word. And in his Booke of the Sences, and their organs, where he maketh a comparison of such as are blind and deaffe borne, he saith, Deaffe and dumbe are as accidents, which necessarily follow one another. Also Alexander Aphrodisieus produceth in his Problemes, that being demanded, why men borne deaffe, should be dumbe likewise; answereth familiarly, They can neuer speake that which they neuer heare.

For better confirmation of this matter, we must necessarily adde that which Aristotle writeth in the same place before alleged, concerning the Voyce, and the singing of Birdes, which is in part simply naturall, and in part of some intelligence and learning as his owne amongst them. For, I will not heere inferre, that some man may reach a Bird, to tune another Song beside her owne: and the enstrudition of the dammes (both he and she) to their young ones. Whereby we may easily comprehend, that if Birdes haue one naturall song (which is the voyce common to all their kinde) and another taught or apprehended in time of continuing with their owne: that, they could not so keepe and enioy, as if they had bin immediately seperated, and taken out of the nest. Euen so in like manner, an infant to be frequented with all people that speake, and (by their meere conuerration) instructed to speake; would else haue none other but his owne naturall voyce, as at the infant of his birth, and bringing into the world.

The voice (saith Aristotle) displaceth, what difference is made to be among the languages of Beasts & Birdes, euen among them of one and the same kinde, in diuers places. Let the Partridge in sundry Countreies; serue for example, hauing diuers notes; for some chucke or iouke, and others clacker or chirpe. And there are diuers smaller Birdes, which chaunt no such notes as their Dams doe; but being taken out of their Nests, are quite changed from paternall education: and so learne the tunes of other enstrudted Birdes, or of mens voices: inuring themselves to their notes, customes and manners. Sometime it hath bene obserued in a Nightingale, that taught her to sing to her young ones, and so gave them imitation to diuers songs. For, speech cannot come of nature, as the voyce doth: but is to be attained by study and discipline. Thus you may perceiue also, why men make vse of diuers Languages, albeit they are like to one another in voyce, &c.

Me-thinks this should seeme prooffe enough, that speech is a thing properly learned by the means of hearing, from whence it enueth inuitably, that such as are deaffe borne, & they that neuer heard any speech (without being deaffe) are dumbe by consequent, except (by succellion of time) they doe enioy hearing, and their eares be vnstoppt; as we haue diuers times obserued, and made practise of, by children that haue not spoken before seauen or eight yeares.

Now I come (in passing along) to touch a point not impertinent to our purpose, to wit: What difference there is in the speech, which an Infant learneth of himselfe, from that of a Parrot, a Starling, a Pyca Larke, a Linnct, a Thrush, a Raven, a Iaye, and such like, as they haue learned. Very certaine it is, that as their soules are different, euen so is their Language: in regard that a childe vnderstandeth what he speaketh, and would speake so and so, or better if hee could, to explicate and make his conceptions vnderstood: whereas on the contrary, a Bird hath not any intelligence, of the signification of whatsoeuer it prateleth. So that, if a Bird demaund, or answere sometime (praising to purpose) it is by hap or aduerture, and not ordinarily: except it bee suggested, remembered, or else expressly made to speake it.

Morouer, a Bird will alwaies adde some crosse thwarting word or other, which argueth sufficiently, that it hath not any intelligence at all. Vherupon it hath bin commonly said, that who soeuer speaketh, and knoweth not what he speaketh, prateleth like a Parrot. So a simple man may learne some folly, or vnfitting words, in the Germanes, Polish, or any other unknowne tongue to him, and ignorantly vse it as a salutation, and be derided for his labour: like others, that thinking to bee reputed learned, will vse many Latine sentences and phrases, quite contrary to their owne meaning in the speaking.

It remaineth now to know, seeing the naturall dumbe man is deaffe by consequent: if likewise the man dumbe by nature (by reason of some defect in his tongue, or in other parts requisite for speaking) bee also deaffe consequently? Laetantius Firmianus, in his Booke of the workes of God, would haue it to bee so: but being too grosse an Anatomist (as is easily comprehended by his reasons) hee is not in this point to be credited. Alexander Aphrodisiens, in the place before alledged, seemeth to say no: but he buildeth vpon no good foundation, when he saith; That there is a paire of nerves, which come from the Braine, one portion whereof goeth to the tongue, and the other to the eares. And that by this means, the affections of the tooing and of the eares, doe easily communicate themselves together. Also, so far as that one of the said portions may bee offended and corrupted, without the other: it hapneth also, that a man may become deaffe by some disease, and yet (on the contrary) not be dumbe.

But his supposition holdeth no place in this point, no more then the reasons of some moderne men; following Pedro de Albano, rearme the Peace-maker, saying: That the sixth likenesse in the Nerves of the Braine, which mooueth the tongue, is firmly alied to the fifth likenesse, which serueth for hearing. For, as I will neuer grant, that defect of speech followeth deafenesse, by any consent or sympathy of the tooing with the eares, but only through want of enstruction, which should be receiued by the eares: so can I not consent, that by the vice or incongruity of those parts dedicated to speaking, hearing should any way be offended.

In the acte also there is no likelyhood or coherence, considering that those parts worke not; eyther for the integrity, not for the construction of the eares, & lesse for the enstruction of hearing; who (for her selfe) hath no neede of any teaching, no more then the sight, or any of the exterior senses. And as for them, they require nothing else, but to be free and open, without any impeachment or hinderance, and that their object should bee neere, within a certaine distance. Why then, we see and heare naturally, without any doctrine or discipline. Seeing then, that hearing neyther taketh or apprehendeth any thing of the verbal instruments;

The second Argument: whether the dumbe man by birth, is al to deaffe by consequent.

Leffan in Op. Didi. s. 127.

Alex. Aphrodisiens lib. Prob. 133.

Diuers both ancient and moderne writers discussed in this point.

An especial note well worth the observing.

What the exterior senses do necessarily require.

Hearing apprehendeth nothing of the verbal instruments, nor of words.

nor of words themselves (as concerning her owne simple action to heare) he that is dumbe from his birth, by the imperfection of his tongue, shall not be deaffe in that respect: no more, then as if from a braue discoursing man, the tooing should bee come out of his head. And it hath bene commonly obserued, that such as haue their tongues cut or slit, haue heard neuer a iot the lesse in that regard, neither found any defect in their hearing.

If be true then, that the instruments of speech, conferre not nor communicate particularly with the eares, and that speaking worketh nothing with hearing, as (on the contrary) hearing doth, and is necessarie for speech; it enueth plainly, that the dumbe by nature, shall neuer heare in that respect (supposing, that the organ of the eare or hearing, is no way therein interested. And that the deaffe by birth, must be dumbe necessarily: although in his tongue, and those other parts, requisite for speech, there is not any defect at all. Obserue then I praye, that in all this purpose, I speake of birth and of Nature, indifferently, to signifie the deaffe or dumbe from the beginning. And I name the dumbe from birth, not he that cannot speake (for so wee should bee all dumbe) but hee that is not any way apte to speake.

Lets vs come now to the third point. From whence it proceedeth, that a man hauing so prompt and able a spirite, that hee comprehendeth all things in small compasse of time; is yet (notwithstanding) so slow and tardie, in knowing howe to speake, and articulate his voyce. Whereas on the contrary, beasts & other creatures, immediately, or soone after their production, haue their voyce absolute & perfect, euen as well and fully, as euer they shall haue.

Aristotle in his Problemes, maketh answer hereto, saying; The voyce of man hath great diuersities in it; other creatures expresse no Letters at all, or very fewe, (as two or three onely) and without Consonants, which, ioyned with Vowels, make the words. Speech (saith he) is not sly and simply of the voyce, but is perfected and accomplished of the affection or condition of the voyce, with signification; and the affections of the voyce, they are the letters. Children therefore, before they know how, or can pronounce letters, expresse their passions (no other-wise then as beasts do) by a natural voyce and no way taught or enstructed, which is common to all infants, of any country whatsoeuer. But yet speech is different in Towne and Towne, nay, in one and the same Towne or City, by reason of the voyce artificially distinguished, thorough the great diuersity of letters coupled, and intercalled of infinite kinds; whereof proceedeth diuers words, signifying an infinity of things. Seeing then, that there are so many manners or fashions of speaking, and that (of five or six letters) may be made fifty several words, and al differing the one from the other: wee may easilie thereby vnderstand, why an infant formeth his voyce so late, in regard of beasts, who haue their voyces merely simple, & (as Alexander Aphrodisiens sayth) most natural of all creatures.

For, whatsoeuer is extreemly diuers, & must be diuersified by many differences; cannot bee attained in any short space of time. Be it in regard of the foile, which apprehendeth the science of speaking; or be it in the tooing, which ought to expresse it, & require time also, both to break and enable the words in their vttering, as we vse to say of the hand, for instruments of Musick. Vherupon he that is dumbe, beginneth at the first to mumble and stasse in the mouth, being not able to make a found of all the Letters, nor to pronounce words with any habdility; onely by reason of the tongues softnes, whereas her rudenesse requireth a new labour.

There is another doubt vpon the same purpose, which is much more vnease to explicate, & Aristotle propoundeth it in his Problemes. From whence it cometh, that some infants begin to speake before due ages; to whom commonly the words are formed, and after they haue wel expressed some words, become dumbe again, and returne to the first condition, until the ordinary terme and time of speaking? Many haue held this to be prodigious, & especially, when it is told them, that some haue spokē at the very point of their birth. Questionles, it is very rare, and hardly to be credited: and yet it may well happen by naturall reason, as thus. An infant, at the same instant it heareth, it vnderstandeth, & then it may speake. But ordinarily, hearing goeth far before vnderstanding, & vnderstanding likewise precedeth speaking: the instrument for speech and words, is not (as yet) of such temperature as is convenient for explicating those things which the spirit hath conceived.

Of such instances as too-neit prattle to speake, and yet saile there of afterward.

On the contrary, some speake much sooner then they knowe how to vnderstand (as we haue already saide of Parrats and other Birds that prattle) counterfeiting such words as they heare: vntill time convenient for them both, that is to say, ability to vnderstand and speake. Such children then, to whom the obiectes of hearing make much sooner impression in the soule, then the instrument of Speech knowes how to perfect: it happeneth to them sometimes, that after they haue vnderstood diuers things, suddenly they pronounce them. And especially after they sleepe, when the spirits haue made themselves more copious; they haue the more strength and impetuous vigour, to moue the tongue in distinct manner. But this endureth not, neither can be of any long continuance; but the infant will returne to his first dumbnesse againe.

An apt comparison of some conditions in our felices, answerable to children's imperfections.

In like manner, sometimes wee shall finde our felices so disposed as (without thinking thereon) words and sentences will merely flow in our mouths: whereof againe (at other times) we shall be so delayed and hindered, as wee can scarcely, or with any easie possibility, expresse things well knowne and familiar vnto vs. Euen so it may come to passe, that an infant shall speak something, and afterward his tongue returning to the first ordinarie condition: he becommeth dumbe, vntill the vttermost time of his perfection and strength.

It is a contrary case, in an infant that becommeth dumbe by deafnesse, after he hath spoken some gibbrish or prattle, yea spoken intelligibly; as we haue heard credibly reported, concerning all the male children of M. Anthony Butin (a famous Apothecary in Tolosa, dwelling at the signe of the three Kings) from which his daughters were exempted. They all spake, till about the age of foure years, & afterward became deafe in such sorte, as they could not heare any noyse; and so (by little and little) ceased to speake. This hapned, in regard that their hearing continuing no longer, they did easilie forget the little Language, which they had learned in their first yeares. As an infant (indeed) is very obliuious, by reason of his great humidity: and particularly the saide Butins children, who were verie rheumaticke. And so hauing no longer means of continuance, to apprehend and speake by hearing, they became dumbe. As any one, who hath learned some few French or Dutch words, through want of continuing conference in those Languages, forgets the little he had before. Or hee that discontinueth his Grammer, or some other Science, or playing on Instruments of Musicke, easilie forgetteth all by want of vse.

A rare example of dumbnesse.

Men learning Languages, may sometime lose them by want of vse.

These and such like accidents hapning dayly, confirme our first proposition, in fauour whereof, we haue thus largely discoursed. For, if one may become dumbe, by reason of deafnesse, which happeneth by accident, & after he could speake: who will make any doubt at all, but that the deafe by birth, must needs be inevitably dumbe?

Deafe by birth, is inevitably dumbe.

I will adde heereto a very notable accident, which maketh some-what to this purpose: of some, that by a Wounde or hurt, or some sicknesse beside of the braine: haue wholly lost remembrance of all things, yea euen of speech, which they learned againe by little and little, like as children do, hauing hearing at their command, and the instruments of speech no way engaged. Graue men, and woorthie of faith, doe testifie, to haue scene some wounded in the head, from one side to the other, and euen in the eye (whereof M. Rondeletius relateth an History in his practice, and the appendix to the 21. Chapter) who forgot so much as their owne Names, and were faine to bee taught all things, euen like young children. So came they wholly to the first condition of an infant from birth: except vulgar speech, which yet some of them retained. But other impressions of their tongues became estranged, concerning Artes and Sciences learned before, and things which they had formerly both scene and knowne; all quire defaced out of their soules, by the inundation and ruine of the harme.

Of such as haue forgot all things, and their owne very names.

CHAP. I.

Of the Kingdome of Ireland: The Antiquity, Original, and first Inhabitation thereof, according to the confirmation of the best approved Authors.

The warning given by Noah of the worlds vniuersall destruction by water.

In the yeare of the world 1525. the holy Patriarch Noah, began to admonish the people, of vengeance to follow, for their wicked liues and detestable sinnes; and hee prepared to builde the Arke, as thereby foreshewing to his kinsfolke and friends, the vniuersall Flood or Deluge that was to ensue, and wherewith the whole face of the earth should be covered within few yeares, except amendment grew from them in short time; all which he did before the Flood, one hundred and fiftie and twenty yeares. But when every man seemed to neglect his worthe admonitions; & Neece to Noah, who was named Cetur, hearing this dreadful prophesie of her Vnckle, and doubting least it would come to passe indeed, determined (with certain friends of hers) to seek their fortune in some forraigne Region. Persuading her selfe, that if she could find a Countrey neuer inhabited, and (consequently) vnspotted with sin: the generall sentence of Gods wrath would not there take effect.

lost the residue of her company, by misfortune of sundry shipwrackes, sustayned in that her long and troublesome voyage. The names of the men were these, Bithi, Laigria, and Fintan. The coast where shee first set foote on land, and where also shee lyeth buried, was cald Anaunculara Littus; The Shipping riuaer or Shore. The Stones; wherein the memory hereof was preferred from violence of the Waters, haue bene scene of some, as they themselves haue reported, but how truly I haue not to say.

Within forty dayes after her coming on Land there, the Vniuersall Floud came, and ouer-flowed all that coast, as well as the other parts of the worlde. But whereas this tale bewrayeth it selfe (too manifestly) to bee an vntueth, if time and other circumstances be thorowly examined; I will stand no longer about the prooffe or disproofe thereof. Onely this is sufficient (I thinke) to bring it out of credite, to consider: that the Art of Navigation or sayling, was vnkowne to the world, before the vniuersall Deluge, and no part inhabited, except the continent of Syria, and thereabout.

This tale can carry no likelihood of any truth in it.

Rab. Isaac in Gen. 1.

But to let passe such a forged fable, with the record thereof engrauen in a Stone, (a deuice borrowed, as some thinke, from Iosaphus;) it shall bee sufficient for the glory of the Irish nation in their Antiquity, to graunt, that Ireland was discovered and peopled by some of Noahs kindred, euen as the first Islands of the Worlde (if they will needs haue it so, as the likelihood is great) according to; which is set forth in their histories. When about 300. yeares after the generall floude, immediately vpon the confusion of Tongues; Iaphes and his posteritie (imboldened by Noahs example) aduencured by ship, to commit themselves to passe the seas, and to search out the unknowne corners of the world, and so finding out diuers Isles in the west parts of the world.

There was (say they) in that retinue, one of the same progeny named Bartolemus, or Batholomew, who, encouraged with the late attempt and successe of Nimrod, kinsman to Ninus (then newly intruded vpon the Monarchy of Assyria) searched so farre west-intending to attaine to some gouernement, where he might rule without any partner in authority; till at the length, Fortune brought him and his people vpon the coast of Ireland. Heree he seiled himselfe with his three sonnes Langaine, Salanus and Ruthburgus, right aduise and stout Gentlemen, who, searching the Land from side to side, and from end to end, left remembrances of their names, in certaine notable places, and named after themas Langaine, Stragrum & Mount Salanga, since named Saint Dominicks hill, and Ruthburgus his Poole. Little is remembered of Bartolemus, sauing that in short space (with many hands working at once) he ridde and made playne a great part of the Countrey, ouer-growne with woods and thickets.

Thus became Ireland inhabited by this people, vnder the gouernement of the three Sonnes to Bartolemus, and their offspring, for the space of three hundred yeares. Together with Bartolemus, arriued in Ireland certain vngodly people of Nimrods race, woorthily reamed Giants, as those that (in bodily shape) exceeded the common proportion of other men, and vied their strength to gaine soueraintie, and to oppress the weak with rapine and violence. That lineage (Chams brood) did grow, in short while, to great numbers, and alwaies endeouored themselves (wherefoeuer they came) to beare the rule ouer others. One cause thereof was their bodily strength, inflexible to their hugeness of stature; another, the examples of Cham or Zoroastres the Magitian, & Nimrod, grandfather to Ninus. Which two persons (in themselves and progenie) were renowned through the world as victorious Princes, ruling ouer two mighty Kingdomes, Agrip and Assyria.

A third cause also there was, namely, they repined at the blessings bestowed on Sem and Iaphet, thinking it necessary to withstand all lawfull rule and dominion: left the curle of slavery (prophecied by Noah) should light vpon them, as at the length it did. Whereupon, rebelliously withdrawing their obedience, from their lawfull Gouernours heere in Ireland, and taking head; they set vp a King of their owne fashion, and maintayning his estate to the oppression of the subiects, by bringing them into continuall bondage. The successe was variable on both sides, betweene the lawfull Gouernours and these vnrulers, with daily risings and skirmishes, so much to the griefe of them, who coucted to liue in quiet order vnder their rightfull Princes: that they determined, with the chance of one generall battell, either wholie to subdue those proud rebellious tyrants, or else, to end their liues in freedom, and so be rid of further misery.

But first, whereas there had growne certayne debates and enmities amongst themselves, whereby they had weakened their owne forces, they held it not amisse, to make peace together, before they put their whole state in hazard of one battell against the Giants: concluding therefore an agreement, & ioyning in league (with promise) to assist each other in subduing the common enemy. Growing to assemble their power, out of all partes of the land, and coming to ioyne battell with the Giants; after they had fought fiercely together for the space of certayne houres: victorie enclined to the rightfull part, so that the lawfull Kings preyailing against the vnruling tyrants, great slaughter was made on the whole broode of that mischieuous generation. For the Kings, meaning to free themselves from all danger in time to come, vied their happy victorie with too great crueltie, which after turned to their owne confusion. For, sparing neyther man, woman, nor child that came in their way, for meere despite, & fuller satisfying their intended reuenge; they vouchsafed not to bury the carcases of their slaine enemies, but cast them out like a sort of dead dogs, through the noyesome stench whereof, such an infectious pestilence ensued in all places, only thoro the ayres corruption, as few escaped with life, besides such as got away by Sea.

the Irish, that one of the Giants named Riannus, chancing to be preferred from this mortallitie, liued 2041 yeares, which is more then twife the age of Methusalem. By this man (say they) Saint Patrick was informed, concerning the whole estate of the Countrey, and afterwards, (vpon request) hauing receiued Baptisme of the sayd Saint Patrick: hee decessed in the year after the birth of our Saviour foure hundred and thirty, as in the Irish historie hath bene very vnaduisedly written. But, letting that passe, wee finde it recorded, That an infinite number of Giants were slayne and destroyed, in manner as hath bene already related: yet some got themselves into lurking Caves and Dens, and kept closely there, till lacke of food caused them to come forth, and make shift for subsistence. When, perceiving no resistance, because the Land was (in a manner) left desolate; they waxed bolder, and when they vnderstoode how matters had passed: they seiled themselves in the best parts of the Countrey, easily subduing the poore silly foules that remayned, and so reuiving their lineage, they became lords of the whole Land, keeping the same in subiection, three score years together.

Among the sons of Iaphet, we read in Genesis, that Magog was one, who planted his people in Scythia, neare Tanais, from thence, about the yere of the world, 2117 Nemodus, with his four sonnes, Starnus, Garbancles, Aninus and Fergusius Captaines ouer a faire companie of people) were sent into Ireland: who passing by Grecia, and taking in such as were desirous to seeke aduentures with them; at length they landed in Ireland, inhabited the Countrey, and multiplied the Land, although not without continuall warre, which they helde with the Giants two hundred and sixtene yeares. At the end of which rearme, the Giants preyailing, chased them thence agayne, so that they returned into Syria. This was about the year after the Creation (as by their account it should seeme) two thousand five hundred thirtie three; from which time, the Giants kept possession of the Land (without forraine inuasion) till the year two thousand seauen hundred and foureteene. But yet all that time, they were not able to fraime a Common-wealth: for, falling still at variance among themselves,

Which comming to the knowledge of the Grecians, it moued these bretheren, sonnes to one Dela (being notable Seamen and skilfull Pilots) to rigge a Nauie, & to attempt the conquest of this Land. These were all of the nextest posteritie to Nemodus, and named Gandius, Genandius, Sagandus, Ruthernius and Slanius. When all things were ready, and their companies assembled: they put to Sea, and landed at the length in Ireland; where finding the power of the Giants greatly weakened, by their owne quarrells and ciuile dissensions; with the more ease did they come to the end of their owne purpose, winning the whole Countrey, and vterly extirpating that bloodie generation, deadly enemies to mankind: diuiding also the Island into five parts, and in each of them they feuerally reigning. Furthermore, to satisfie all sides, and auoide contention; they concluded to fixe a Meare-stone in the middle point of Ireland, to which each of their kingdomes should extend; so that they might be equally partakers of the commodities found within the Countrey soile.

These bretheren also are supposed, to haue inuented the distribution of Shires into Cantreds, euery Cantred or Barony to containe one hundred townships. At length, desire of soueraintie, set the five bretheren at variance, and greatly hindered their growing wealth. But Slanius, getting the vpper hand, and bringing his foure bretheren to a lowe ebbe:ooke on him as chiefe about his other bretheren, intruding round about the Meare-middle Stone, for the space of certayne miles, which plot of ground (in time) obtaigned the priuilege and name, of one intire part, and now maketh vp the number of five parts (into which Ireland is sayd to be diuided) and is called Meth, and in Latine Media; taking this name (as some haue supposed) because (in respect of the other) it contained but the moitie of Cantreds, viz. sixtene; whereas each of the other Cantreds comprehended 32. a peece: or else, because it lyeth in the midst of the land. This part Slanius ioynd as a surplussage (ouer and aboue his inheritance) to the Monarchy; which part (notwithstanding) grew after to be a fullall kingdome.

Thirty yeares the Monarchy yet continued in this order; but finally, Slanius departed this life, and was buried in a Mountaine of Meth, which till now (as they say) beareth name after him. Then the Princes, subiect to him, began to stomacke the matter, and denied their obedience to his successor: whereupon ensued continuall Warres betweene them, which (in long time) could neuer be fully ceassed. In the necke of these troubles also, there arrived in Ireland a new Army of Scythians, who made claime vnto the Land (by a title of right) which they pretended from their fore-father Nemodus: and for taking and making parts, they set all in such an vpror, that haucke vvas made on each side hostily, in most miserable manner.

To be short, they spent themselves, in pursuing one another with such outrage: that they began to grow carelesse, what Nations or Soldiers they receyved to their ayde, either to keepe vp, or beate downe a side. By which occasion, the Brittaines also stept in among them, procuring Brennus, the brother of Belinus, to direct his course thither with the same Navy, which he had made ready to passe oyer into Gallia, now called France, to the ayde of Segwine, then King of the Allobroges, that invaded the Countreyes of Sauoy and Dauphinou.

But his enterprize into Ireland tooke small effect, though there were other Kings of the Brittaines, that got dominion there; in so much that Gurguntius, or Gurguntius, the sonne of Belinus, accounted Ireland (among other his dominions) to belong to him by lineall descent. Notwithstanding, the British Princes neuer enjoyed the quiet possession thereof, longer then they held it by maine force; but were often repelled, and put to the worke with seeking after it, finding there little other gaine then stripes, whereof they carried away good store. But now to come to the Spaniards, that lastly (vnder the conduct of foure Captaines) passed into Ireland, from Biscaye, and inhabited that Island: it shall not be impertinent (following the order obserued) to speake somewhat of their originall, that it may the better appeare, from whence the Irish nation had their first beginning.

This noble Gentleman, being very wise, valiant, and well spoken: gotte honourable entertaine of Pharaoh, furnished Ormus. And afterward departing that Countrey, trauesed the seas, and landing first in Portugall, after some bickerings with the inhabitants: at length, yet hee got (by their consent) a portion of the Countrey, lying by the banks of the River, anciently called Munda, and nowe Mondega, where (shortly after) he began to builde a City, first named Brachara, but now Barfalo, as Hellor Batium affirmeth.

After this, when the people vnder Gathelus began to encrease in power; thorough perswasion of the Spaniards their neighbours, they removed into Gallicia, where they also builded a City, named Brigantium, which is now called Coruna. Finally, when they grew into such a huge multitude, that Gallicia was not able to sustaine them; Gathelus, with a certain number of them, passed ouer into Ireland and there grew into such estimation with the barbarous people, that for his knowledge especially in Languages, hee was highly honoured. For, he not onely enriched and beautified the Irish tongue; but entrusted them in letters also: he sought vp their Antiquities, and likewise practised their youth in warlike exercises, after the manner of the Greekes and Egyptians, from whence he was descended.

To conclude, hee was so acceptable and welcome to them, that (to gratifye such a worthy benefactor) they agreed to call the Island Gathelia, and after his wife Scotia. This is one opinion, but yet incredible, not onely to Humphrey Lhuid, but also to other learned men, and diligent searchers of Antiquities: by reason of the sundry arguments of improbability, as well in the miscount of yeares, as other vnlikehoods found therein, when the circumstances come to be duly examined, thorowly weighed, and well considered. Yet certaine it is, that Ireland was aunciently named Scotia, and the people Scots, as by diuers old writings it may be sufficiently proued: albeit, by what occasion it took first that name, or from whence they came, it is yet doubted. But to proceede with the History, as we finde it. The residue of Gathelus his people, which remained in Spain, founded the City of Bayon, in the Confinnes of Gascogne, and replenished the Sea coastes of Spain, with store of inhabitants. And wel-neere about two hundred yeares, after their first arrivall there (when they were againe pestered with multitudes of people) they began to fancie a new voyage: but whether at that time, or some other els, they crossed ouer into Ireland, is altogether vncertaine.

Notwithstanding, sure it is, that in the dayes of Gurguntius, King of the Brittaines, the cheefe Gouernour of Bayon, with four Brethren Spaniards, two of which are saide to be Hibernus and Hermion, not the sonnes (as some thinke) of Gathelus (as Hellor Batium affirmeth) but (some other perhaps, that were descended of him; who vnderstanding that diuers of the western Isles were empty of inhabitants: assembling a great company of men, women, and children, embarked with the same in three score great vessels, and directing their course Westward, howered a long time on the Sea, about the Isles of Orkenney. At length, they met (by good hap) with Gurguntius, then returning from the conquest of Denmarke (as in the Brittish history it appeareth) whom they besought in consideration of their want of victuals and other necessities (being such, as they were no longer able to endure the Sea, being cumberd with such store of women and children) to direct & appoint them some place, where they might inhabit; promising to hold the same of him, and to become liege-people to him and his heires for euer.

Gurguntius aduising with himselfe hereon, remembered, with what trouble he held the Irish in subiection, & conceiuing hope that these strangers might either subdue, or wholly destroy that vnuly generation; accepted & took those oathes of the Spaniards with hostages, & furnishing them & their ships, with all needfull things; set them ouer into Ireland, where, alighted with such Brittaines as Gurguntius had appointed to go with them for their guides: they made a conquest of the whole countrey, & settled themselves ioyfully therein.

Some write, that Ireland was (before that present) voide of all inhabitants: but yet they agree, that these Spaniards were guided thither by the Britains, & vnder such conditions as before is recited. Vnder which it appeareth, that the kings of Britain had an elder right to the realm of Ireland, then by the conquest of K. Henry 2. which title they euer maintained, & sometimes presented in pursuit thereof, as in the daies of K. Arthur, to whom the Irish (as in diuers histories is remembered) acknowledged their due subiection, with paymēt of their tribute, & making their appearance at the city, called in the British tongue, Caer Lhonor. Vnder unto, when their free assent, the submission of their Princes, with lawfull conquest & prescription are annexed, an inuincible title must needs be enforced.

But now to our purpose. The Spaniards substantially assisted with the Britains, settled themselves, and diuided their seats in quarters; the foure Brethren reigning severally apart in sidry portions, with good quietnesse and encrease of wealth: vntill pride & ambition armed two of them, against the other two; as Hibernus and one of his brethren, against Hermion and his Brother. In this dissention, Hermion slew his brother Hibernus; of whom, at the same time (as some hold) the countrey was named Hibernia. Although some are of opinion, that it tooke name of Iron, by plentifull Mines of that kinde of Metall, wherewith the land abounded: & so those Authors of Antiquity, which call it Tennus, name it more aptly after the speech of the inhabitants, then others which call it Hibernia.

Proceede wee now to Hermion, who to auoyde the ill opinion of men, by attaining thus to the Souerainty, making his way through his brothers blood most vnaturally, and in an unhappie Ciuill-Warre: purged himselfe to his subiects, that neither maliciously, nor contentiously, but for his necessary defence and safety, hee had borne Armes agaynst his brethren. And to witnesse, how farre he was from all desire to rule alone: hee appointed certaine Captaines, as Kings, to rule (vnder him) severall Countreyes: referring to himselfe but one fourth part, and the portion of Meth, allotted to the Monarchy, for the better maintenance of his estate.

that the Spaniards of the North parts of Spaine, inhabiting about the Countries of Biscaye and Gallicia, came and peopled Ireland (as both their owne Histories, & the British do agree wholly) but from whence they came first, to inhabit those Coun-

An hundred and thirty chiefe Kings are reckoned of this Nation, from *Her-

Magnus*; in whose time, that holy eftec-med man, S. Patricke converted them to Christianity. But now, while the Irishmen liued in some tollerable rest & order, vnder their severall Kings; one Rodericke, a Scythian Prince (with a small company of men, being weather-driuen about the Coasts of Britaine) was by chance cast vpon the shore of Ireland. These were Picts, and the very first (that had bin heard off in those parts) as some good Authors haue recorded) a people (euen from their cradle) naturally addicted to contention, land-leapers, mercilesse, fierce and hardy.
They being brought & presented to the Irish King, desired Interpreters; which being granted them; Roderick their chiefe Commander and Leader, made this request for him and his, as followeth.

The Oration of Roderick, King of the Picts, to the King of Ireland.

As degenerate, or falling cestours, but forsaking our clues to Fortunes course, wee are become to craue of Ireland (as humble Suppliants) who neuer before this present, haue embased our selues to any other Nation. Behold Sir King, and regard vs well: no light occasion causeth these lustie bodies to stoop. Scythians we are, and Picts of Scythia, no small portion of glory remaineth in the two names.

What shall I speake of the ciuill warre, that hath expelled vs from our native homes, or rip up olde Histories, to mooue strangers to bemoane vs? Let our seruants and children discourse thereof at leisure. Our instant motion is, to grant vs some time of abode in your Land, for which effect & purpose, our urgent necessity befeetheth your fa-uour: A King, of a King, and men of men, are to craue assistance.

Princes can well discerne and consider,
how neereit toucheth their honour and reputation, yea, and their owne surety, to uphold and releue the state of a King, decayed by treason. And manifest it is to all men of reasonable consideration, that nothing more be seemeth the nature of men, then to be moued with compassion: yea, euen (as it were) to feele themselves hurt, when they heare and vnderstand of other mens calamities.
Admit then (we beseech you) and receive among yee, these few scattered remnants of Scythians. If your roomes be narrow, yee are not many: If the soile of your Country be barren, we are borne and inured to hardnesse: If you liue in peace, wee are as your command as subiects: If you warre, we are ready to serue you as Souldiers. We demand no Kingdome, no State, no pompous triumph: in Ireland. We are heere alone, and haue left such vanities behinde vs with our enemies.
How soeuer you extreme of vs, we shall content our selues therewith, and learne to frame our likings to yours: as calling vnto minde, what we haue bene, not what we are.

Great consultation was had about the request of these strangers, & many things debated to and fro. In conclusion, the Irish gaue fourth for answer, the opinion of their Antiquaries, such as were skillfull in olde Histories, & graue sayings of their Elders. Whereby they gathered, that it could not be expedient for the, to accept the Scythians into their Land; because commixture of Nations in any Realme, bringeth quarrels. Moreover, the multitude of their owne Inhabitantants was such, that roomes in the whole Isle was scarce able to receiue them: and therefore

The Answer of the Irish King, to the Oration made by King Rodericke.

WE haue considered on your request, as also those extremities vrging thereto: And though we may not (conueni-ently) receiue you among vs; yet shall you finde vs ready in furthering ye to our neighbours. Not farre hence lyeth the great Isle of Britaine, in the North-part whereof (being void of Inhabitants) your manhood and pollicie may purchase roomes, to place your selues at your ease. We shall appoint Captaines to guide you thither, and wee shall assist yee with our Forces in that Country.
Make ready your Shippes, that you may passe thither with all conuenient speed.

Encouraged by this perswasion, they tooke their course towards the North parts of Britaine, now called Scotland, where (contrary to their expectation) Marius, King of Britaine, was ready to a-waite their coming, and with sharpe battaile vanquishing them in field, slew Rodericke, with a great number of his followers. Those that escaped with life, & fought vnto him for grace, he licensed to inhabite the vttermoost ende of Scotland.
This Marius, Humphrey Lhuid taketh to be the same, whom the Romaine Writers name Avragus, who reigned about the yeare of our Lord, seuentie: A Prince of noble courage, and of no small estimation in his dayes, as appeareth by that which is written of him. His right name (as the said Lhuid auoucheth) was Mewig.

But now concerning the Picts, whether those that escaped with life, got the Seas by King Mewig graunt, or getting to their Shippes, with-drew into the Isle of Orkeney, is doubtfull. Vniuersally also they wanted to encrease their issue, & because the Britaines thought scarce to match their daughters, with such an vknowne and new come Nation: the Picts continued, rish, and (by entreaty) obtained Wiues from them, with condition, that if the Crownes should hap to fall in contention, they should yeelde thus much to the prerogative of the woman: that the Prince should bee elected rather of the blood Royall of the Female kinde, then of the Male. Which order (saith Beda) the Picts were very well knowne to keepe vnto his time.

Heere I could enter into a long, various and fruitfull discourse, concerning great combustions, warres and bloody contentions, happening (for a very long time) betweene the Irish, Picts and Scots:
but being impertinent to my intended purpose, and little beneficiall to the Reader, I will first describe the parts and divisions of Ireland into Shires and Countries, and then proceed to shew, how it receiued the Christian faith at the first.

Ireland became diuided into foure Regions; Leinster East; Connacht West; Ulster North; Mounster South: And in-
to a fift plot, defalked from euerly fourth part, yet mearing on each part, called thereof Media, Meeth, comprizing as well East Meeth, as West Meeth. Leinster butteth vpon England; Ulster vpon the Scottish Islands, which face with the Hebrides, scattered betweene both the Realmes:
wherein (at this day) the Irish Scots, Successours of the elder Scythian, Pict or Redshankes dwell. Each of these fiue, where they are frame-able to ciuility, & answer the Writs of the Princes Courts; are funded into Shires or Counties in this manner.

In Leinster lyeth the Counties of Dublyn, Kildare, Wexford or Gueisford, Catherlach, Kilkenny, the Counties of Lesse and Ophalie, called the Kings and Queenes Counties: these two were so named by Parliament, in the Reignes of Phillip and Mary, hauing Shire-Townes concordant, as Phillips Towne, and Mary-Borough.

Connacht hath the County Clare,
Ulster, the Counties of Louth, Downe, Antrim, one moiety of the Towne of Drogheda (for the rest is in Achel) and Car-refergus.

In Mounster lyeth the Counties of Wat-terford, Limerike, Cork, the County Palantine of Tipperary, Kerie, & the Croffe of Tipperarie. In eckertime, Mounster was diuided into East Mounster, Ormond, West Mounster, Desmond, South Mounster, and Toonenmond. Now the reason why Ireland was thus diuided, you have heard already, by the five brethren arriving there, valiant and Martiall Gentlemen; Gandius, Genandius, Sagundus, otherwise named Gangandus, Rutheragus or Rutheranus and Slanius.

The empyring at the English Pale.

Fingall excell'd in husbandry.

Collonnet of Fingall clowne

Fingall and why it was so named.

The great civility in ancient times among the impaled dwellers.

There was also another diuision of Ireland, into the English Pale, and Irishry. For, while Ireland was subdued by the English, diuers of the Conquerours planted themselves neere vnto Dublin, and the confines thereto adioyning, and so enclosing and impaling themselves (as it were) within certaine lists and territories; they forced away the Irish. Insomuch, as that Country became meere English, and thereof it was termed the English Pale: which (in ancient time) stretched from Dundalk to Catherlagh or Kilkenny. But afterward, what by the slacknesse of Marchers, and encroaching of the Irish enemy; the scope of the English Pale became greatly impaired, being cramped and caught into an odde corner of the Country, named Fingall, with a parcell of Meeth the Kings Land, the Countries of Kildare & Louth, which parts were applied chiefly with good husbandry, and taken for the richest and ciuilest soyles in Ireland. But Fingall especially (from time to time) was always so addicted to the chiefe points of husbandry; as that they became nicknamed by their neighbors (for their continuall dudgey) Collonnet, of the Latine word Coloni, wherunto the clipp English word Clowne, seemeth to be answerable.

The word Fingall countervaileth in English, the race or sept of the English or strangers, because they were solely seized of that part of the Island, grying with their Talents that warme nest so firmly, that from the Conquest, to this day, the Irish enemy could not rouse the thence. The Inhabitants of the English Pale, haue benee (in older time) so much addicted to their civility, and so fast sequestered from barbarous Savage-nesse; that their only mother tongue was English. And truly, so long as these impaled dwellers, did suffer themselves (as well in land, as in language) from the rude Irish rudenesse was day by day supplanted in the Country, civility engrafted, good lawes established, loyalty obserued, rebellion suppressed, & in the ende, the coine of a young England was like to shoote in Ireland. But when their posterity became not altogether so wary in keeping, as their Ancestors were valiant in conquering; the Irish language became free-dennized in the English Pale. This canker tooke such deepe roote, that the body, which before was whole and found: became festered by little and little, and (in a manner) wholly purified. And not only this parcel of Ireland grew to that civility; but Wexford also, and the greater part of Mounster. Albeit, of all other places, Wexford, with the territory baied, and percolled within the River called the Pill, was so quite estranged from Irishry (which was rare in those dayes) that if a trauailer of the Irish, had pitcht his foote within the Pill, and spoken Irish, the Weisfordians would command him forthwith, to turne the other end of his tongue, and speake English, or else to bring his Troughman with him. But afterward, they so acquainted themselves with the Irish, making a mingle-mangle of both languages, that (commonly) the Inhabitants of the meaner sort, grew to speake neither good English nor good Irish.

Wee come now to declare, in what manner Ireland came to receiue the christian faith: And finde, that immediately after Christs time, Saint James the Apostle & other, trauailing into these West parts; did first instruct the Irish people, and teach them the glad tydings of the Gospel. So that diuers among them, euen then were christened, and beleueed: but not in such numbers (as may be thought) whereby it should be said, that the Country was generally conuerted. Notwithstanding, the Scottish Chronicles doe avouch, that in the dayes of Fingomarke their King, who departed this life in the year of our Redemption, 358, Ireland was conuerted to the faith, by this meane.

A woman of the Pictish blood (say they) chanced in those dayes to serue the Queene of Ireland; which woman herselfe being a Christian, first instructed her Queene and Mistresse, in the faith & true points of Christianity, & the Queene her Husband the King, who conuerted the whole Irish Nation. Howbeit, by the report of the Irish Writers themselves, this should not seeme altogether true.

For they affirmed, that their Country was rather till esteemed as one of the vnchristified Isles, till about the year of our Lord, foure hundred twenty and sixe: when Celestine, the first of that name, gouerned the See of Rome, who, on conference had with his Cleargie, touching the restoring of the Christian faith in the West parts of the world (greatly there decayed by the heresie of Pelagius) vnderstood that Ireland also, by reason of distance from the heart of Christendome, and rudenesse of the Nation; had receiued little fruit at all of true Religion, a thing much to be lamented.

Among other, that then were assembled to treat of those matters, was one Paladius, Arch-deacon of Rome, who offered his charitable trauaile, towards the conuersion of those lands, whither it should please them to appoint him to goe. Celestine knowing the sufficiency of the man, consecrated him Bishop, authorized his journey by Letters vnder his Seale, furnished his wants, and associating to him, such religious persons and others, as were thought necessary to assist him: deliuered vnto him the Bible with great solemnitie, and other monuments, in furtherance of his good speede, for so long and tedious a journey.

At length hee landed in the North of Ireland, from whence he hardly escaped (with life) into the Isles adioyning, where he preached the Gospell, and conuerted no small number of Scots to the Christian faith and beleefe; purging also that part which was christened, from the infection of the Pelagians, as in the Scottish historie more at large appeareth. He was required by the Scots, that dwelt in Britaine, to leave the Isles, and come ouer to them, there to instruct the people in the way of true saluation: to the which (with the Popes licence) he seemd willing enough. And the bishop of Rome, the more readily compendised thereto, because at that instant time, when Paladius was to depart: one Patrick attended at Rome, suing for licence to be sent into Ireland.

The Pope therefore graunted, that Paladius might passe ouer to the Scottes in Britaine, and appoynted Patrick to goe (with authoritie from him) into Ireland, where, vpon his arriuall, hee found the people so well bent to heare his admonitions (contrary to their accustomed forwardnesse) that a man would haue imagined, vpon sight of their readinesse; that the Land had bene referred for him to conuert. And because it pleased God, to bestow such an vniuersall benefite on the Land, by his meanes; wee thought good (by following our Author herein) to touch some part of the course of his life.

This Patrick, in Latine called Patricius, was borne in the Marches betweene England and Scotland, in a Towne by the Sea side, named Eiburne, whose fathers name was likewise called Calphurnius, a Deacon, and sonne to a Priest: his Mother, named Conches, was sister to S. Martine, that famous Bishoppe of Tours in France. Patrick (of a child) was brought vp in learning, and well instructed in the faith, being much given to deuotion. The Irishmen (in those daies) assisted with some Scots and Priests, were become arch-Pirates, greatly disquieting the Seas about the Coasts of Britaine, and vied to sacke little small Villages, that lay scattering along the shore, and would leade away the Inhabitants captiue home into their Country. And as it chanced, Patrick being a Lad of sixteen years olde, and a Scholler then in secular learning: was taken among other, and became slave to an Irish Lord called Machutus, from who (after the terme of fixe yeares) he redeemed himselfe, with a piece of gold, which hee found in a clod of earth, that the swine had newly turned vp, as hee followed the in the time of his captiuitie, beeing appointed (by his Maister) to take charge of them, and keepe them.

And as affliction (commonly) maketh men religious; the regard of his former education, had stamped in him such remorse and humility, that beeing thenceforth weaned from the world: hee tooke himselfe to contemplation, euer lamenting the lacke of grace and truth in that Land. And withall not despairing, but that (in continuance of time) some good might be wrought vpon them; hee learned the Language perfectly. And, allowing one of that Nation, to beare him company for exercise sake; hee departed thence, and got him into France, euer hauing in his minde, a desire to see the conuersion uerfion of the Iriſh people, whoſe babes yet vnborne, ſeemed to him in his dreaming, from forth they mothers wombs, to call for Chriſtendome.

In this purpoſe, he fought out his vnkle Martine, by whoſe meanes he was placed with Germanus the Biſh. of Auxerre, continuing with him as Scholler or Diſciple for the ſpace of fourtie yeares: all which time hee beſtowed in the ſtudie of holy Scriptures, Prayers, and ſuch godly exerciſes. Afterwards, being renowned through the Latine Church, for his wiſedome, vertue and learning: hee went to Rome, bearing Letters with him in his commendation, from the French biſhops vnto Pope Celeſtine, to whom hee vntered his whole minde and ſecret vow, which long before hee had conceived as touching Ireland. Celeſtine inueſted him Archbiſhop and Primate of the whole Iſland, ſet him forward with all fauor he could deſire, bringing him and his diſciples onward to their Countrey.

In the 23 yeare of the Emperour Theodoſius the younger, being the yeare of our Lord, 430. Patrick landed in Ireland, and becauſe he ſpake the tongue perfectly, and withall, being a reuerent perſonage in the eyes of all men; many liſtened and gaue eare to his preaching. And the rather, becauſe (as ſome Writers haue recorded) he confirmed his Doctrines with diuerſe miracles. But eſpecially thoſe men regarded his words before all others, that had ſome taſte of the Chriſtian Faith before, eyther by the coming into thoſe partes of Paladius and his Diſciple one Albius, an Iriſh Biſhop, or otherwiſe by ſome other. For, it is to be thought, that continually there remained ſome ſpark of knowledge of Chriſtianity, euer ſince the firſt preaching of the Goſpell, which was ſhortly after Chriſts Aſcention, by S. James as before is mentioned. But in continuance of time, Patrick wonne the better part of that kingdom to the faith of Chriſt.

Laiſgerius ſon to Nealus the great Monarch, albeit hee receiued not the Goſpell himſelfe; yet he permitted all that would embrace it. But becauſe hee reſuſed to be baptiſed, and apply to his doctrine; the Biſhop denounced againſt him a curſe from God accordingly, but yet tempered with mercy and iudgement, as thus: That during his life he ſhould be victorious: but after him, neither ſhould the kingdom ſtand, nor his lineage inherit. Thence hee tooke his way to Conill, lord of Connagh, who honorably receiued him, and was conuerted with all his people: ſending him afterward to his brother Logan, king of Leinſter, who hee alſo conuerted. In Mounſter he found great friendſhip, by the means of an Earle there, called the Earle of Daris, who honored him highly, & gaue him a dwelling place in the Eaſt Angle of Armagh, called Soria, where he erected many Celles and Monafteries, both for religious men and women. Hee travelled 30. yeares in preaching through the land, planting Biſhops and Prieſts in conuenient places, whoſe learning and conuerſation, by the eſpecial grace & fauor of God, eſtabliſhed the Faith in that rude nation. Other 30. yeares hee ſpent in his prouince of Armagh, among his brethren placed in thoſe houſes of Religion, which by his means were founded. So hee liued (in all) about 122. yeares, and lyeth buried in Downe.

Now, concerning the chiefe cities and townes of Ireland, we are fiſt to ſpeake of Dublin, termed the beautie and eye of Ireland. It ſeemeth it recorded, that about the yeare 155. three noble Eaſterlings, being brethren, arriued in Ireland, whoſe names were Auellanus, Sitaracus and Thornus. Auellanus being the eldeſt brother, built Dublin, Sitaracus, Waterford and Thornus, Limerike. Of the founder Auellanus, Dublin was termed Auellana, and after, by corruption of ſpeech, Eblana, and ſo Ptolomie calleth it. Some termed it Dublin, other, Dublinia, many Dublinum, but Authors of better ſkill name it Dublinium. This citie, as it is not inferiour for Antiquity to any in Ireland, ſo in pleaſant ſituation, gorgeous buildings, multitude of people, martiall Chiuallry, obedience and loyalty, abundance of wealth, largeneſſe of hoſpitality, in manner, and ciuilitie, it is ſuperiour to all other cities and towns in that realme: whereupon it is commonly called, the Iriſh or yong London. The Charter of this citie is large, King Henry the 4. gaue it the Sword, in the yeare 1409. and was ruled by a Maior and two Bailiſſes: which were changed into Sheriffs, by a Charter granted by king Edward the ſixt, 1547. But it appeares by the ancient Scale of this citie called Signum propoſitura, that the Citie hath (in elder times) bene gouerned

Waterford was founded by Sitaracus, in the yeare 155. being a Citie properly builded, and very well compact. Both yong and old there are giuen to thriving, free from factions: the men deale in trafficke, the women in ſpinning & carding; and as they diſtill the beſt Aqua vita, ſo they ſpinne the cheefeſt Rugges in Ireland.

Of this Citie Waterford it is written, to haue continued ſo loyal to the Crowne of England, that it is not found regiſtred (ſince the Conqueſt) to haue bin ſtained with the ſmalleſt ſpot of treaſon, nor withſtanding the ſundry aſſaults of traitorous attempts. And therefore the Cities Armes are deckt with this golden word: In tacta manet.

Limericke, called in Latine Limericum, was builded by Thornus, about the very ſame yeare of 155. coaſting on the Sea, hard vpon the Riuer Sennan; whereby are moſt notably ſeuered Mounſter and Connagh, the Iriſh name this Citie, Loumneagh, and therefore in Engliſh it is called Limerike.

Carke, in Latine Corcinum or Corracium, the fourth Citie of Ireland, happily planted on the Sea: their Hauens being a Hauens royall. On the land ſide they were ſo encumbred with euill neighbours, the Iriſh Out-lawes, that they were faine to watch their gates hourly, to keepe them ſhut at ſeruiſe times, and at meales. And from Sun to Sun, not to ſuffer any ſtranger to enter the Citie with his weapon, but to leave it at a Lodge appointed.

Drogheda, accounted the beſt Towne in Ireland, and truly not farre behinde ſome of their Cities: the one moiety of this Towne is in Meeth, the other planted on the further ſide of the water, lyeth in Vliſter.

There ranne a blinde Propheſie of this Towne, that Roffe was, Dublin is, Drogheda ſhall be the beſt of the three.

Roffe, a Hauens Towne in Mounſter, not farre from Waterford, ſeeming to haue bene (in ancient time) a Towne of great port, whereof ſundry and probable coniectures are giuen, by the olde Ditches, which are now a mile diſtant from the Wallies of Roffe: betweene which wallies and ditches, the reliques of the ancient Wallies, Gates, and Towers (placed betweene both) are to bee ſcene vnto this day.

Weisford, a Hauens Towne not farre from Roffe, where of no great matters are recorded: but onely that it is to be eſteemed by all the Engliſh poſterity planted in Ireland, as a Towne that was the firſt Fortreſſe and Harbour, of the Engliſh Conquerors, doing them (from time to time) many great and acceptable ſeruices.

Kilkenny, the beſt vpland, or (as they tearme it) the properſt dry Towne in Ireland; is diuided into the high Towne, and the Iriſh Towne. The high Towne was builded by the Engliſh, after the Conqueſt, and had a parcell of the Iriſh Towne vnto it, by the Biſhops grant, made vnto the Founders vpon their earneſt requeſt. Roberts Talbot, a worthy Gentleman, in the yeare one thouſand foure hundred, encloſed with wallies the better part of this Towne.

Thomas Towne, a proper Towne builded in the County of Kilkenny, by one Thomas Fitz-Anthony, an Engliſhman: thereof the Iriſh call it Ballie mac-Andan, that is, the Towne of Fitz-Anthony. But becauſe the Reader may percieue, in what parts of the Countrey the Cities and cheefe Townes ſtand, I haue ſet them downe in this order.

Drogheda, Carregfargus, Downe, Armagh, Arghaſhe, Clogher, Munneighan, Doomneaghe, Karreg mac Roffe, Nerrrie, Carlingford, Archie, Doondalke, Louth, Dublin, Bulrudrie, Luske, Swards, Tullagard, Lions, Newcaſtle, Rathenale, Oughterarde, Nias, Clane, Alainnooth, Kilcocke, Rathmangan, Kildare, Lniann, Cafle-Towne, Phillips-Towne, Maryborough, Kilkullen, Caſtle-Marien, Thiſſledermot, Alex, Athie, Caſterlaugh, Leighelen, Glanrann, Thomas Towne, Enſilia &c. Caſhelle, Callanne, Kilkenny, Knockraſer, Roffe, Glommelle, Weisford, Fernes, Filderd, Enſecortie, Taſhman, wicklow, Arche, Waterford, Lifmore, Poonegarum, Toghill, Cork, Limerike, Kilmallacke, Alanna, Galluoie, Amrie, Longbriagh, Clare, Tomme, Sligagh, Roffe, Canman, Arlowenne, Trinne, Doombaghennne, Kathlenith, Nannane, Aoir, Scrine, Taragh, Kelmec, Doonloine, Greenocke, Duneeke, Atolmargh, Fowre, Longſende, Kilkenweſſe, Mollagagh, Delunne.

transported into an unknown Country, which neuer was in any Card for Navigation. Staying there longer time, then was or could be allowed for returning; no more remayned living then the Pilote or Maister, and three or foure Mariners beside: who also falling sicke, by extremitie of hunger and tedious labour, dyed also at a Port some few daies distance from thence.

But the Pilote, whose name was Andalus, dyed in the house of one Christopher Columbus, a native of Cnquera, (as some others say) of Albizolo, a small village on the river of Genes, neare to Saona. With this Columbus remayned all the Pilotes goods of the sayd Caruell, and especially the Papers and Memories of that whole voyage, reporting the height of the lands, which by them had beene discovered, and found. Some say, that the sayd Andalus trafficked in Canaria and Madera, when this long and fatall navigation happened. Others also rearme him a hiscane, which dealt with England and France: and some repute him a Portuguese, that went and came from Myrris or India. Others againe report, that the sayd Caruell went into Portugall, or to Madera, and other Islands; but none doe assure any thing for certain. It is no marvell then, if Authors do disagree in many points, concerning things happening, or found by graue Ancients, and that the Inventors of them are not to be knowne; when our selues are ignorant of matters, within the compasse of so small time since, for finding the Occidental or Western Isles (which we call the New-found World) and which was a matter so signall, nouell, and remarkable.

But all agree together, that this Andalus dyed in the house of the sayd Christopher Columbus; who hauing (at the first) beene a Saylor or Mariner, had practised in diuers parts of the world. Afterward, hee learned diligently the measure of the two Tropicks, of the Equator, and of the Clymates, prouoing an expert Maister, in making Cardes to sayle by. And to be informed concerning the Meridional coasts of Africa, and of other places where the Portugalls had sayled: he went into Portugall, to the end he might make his Cardes the better, and there he married. Or, as some say, in the Isle of Madera: where it may be credited (as most likely) that he dwelt when the sayd Caruell coasted there; and the Patron or Pilote thereof lodged in his house, where he recounted to him the voyage he had made, and the new lands by him discovered: to the end that Columbus might see them downe in his Garde, wherein he was further instructed by him.

It is generally supposed, that Columbus was a learned man, a good Geographer, very singularly experienced in Astronomy and Cosmography; and that he laboured to finde the land of the Antipodes, and Il Rico Cipango de Marco Polo. Moreover, he was often heard to say, that (necessarily) by good coniectures, there was another world; which extended it self towards the West: whereof Plato, Seneca, and many other Authors, both Greek and Latin, did leade to Cosmographers some good and considerable arguments. Also, that he had read many good ancient Authors, who, in the place where they discourse on the great Atlantick Ile; make mention of a land unknowne and concealed, more great then Asia or Africa. And especially Aristotle, writing, that certaine Merchants of Carthage, sayling in those parts of Gibraltar, towards the West & South, after many daies found a great Island inhabited, with Riuer, &c. nup. b. c.

But, after all this so diuersly delivered, on the behalfe of Columbus, it is most certaine, that he was not learned, but of good iudgement and vnderstanding; and receiving notice of these new Lands, by the means of Andalus; he conferred with diuers learned and iudicious men, concerning what had auiently bene written of other lands and worlds. And the sayd Columbus, wanting meanes to bring to passe what he so earnestly desired, because he was poore; stood in neede of some farre greater fauour, whereby hee might discover those lands.

Perceiuing then, that the King of Portugall was hindered by his enterprize of Africa, & navigation into the East, which he had then in readiness, and that the King of Castile was busied about the warre of Granada: he sent his brother, named Bartolomeus, to Henry the sixteenth, King of England, a very rich and potent Prince, (who had at that present time no waies or troubles) to furnish him with fauour and shippes apt and fit for the enterprize, promising to bring him home from those vnknowne Islands (and in small time) vnvaluable treasures. But Bartholmew returning thence without any resolution; he began to negotiate with Alphonfus the fifth King of Portugall: of whom he could neyther haue fauour nor money, to finde such wealth as he had promised; because the Bishop of Vise, and one Master Roderick, men greatly experienced in Cosmography, contrariet him therein, confidently assuring; that there could not bee in the West, any such gold or treasure, as Columbus spake of.

Columbus hindered in dealing with the King of Portugall.

Columbus though discouraged, will not yet be wholly disheartened.

The 3. Dukes of Medina acquainted with this great offer, refused it also.

His petition to the Catholique King Ferdinand & his Queene, neglecting where he had greatest hope.

was no way beleueed, and much worse listened vnto; whereat Columbus grew very greatly displeased.

Alphonso Quintavilla, Great Chamberlaine or Treasurer to the King, kept him in his house, and dieted him at his owne table, taking great delight to heare him talke of such things, as he made promise of in vnknowne Countries. By the helpe of this Great Treasurer, Columbus found the meanes, to haue access & audience with Gonzales de Mendoza, arch-Bishop of Toledo, and Cardinall, who had great credit and authority with their Majesties. This Lord brought him to the Kings presence, and, after the case was well examined and vnderstood (notwithstanding all was esteemed vaine and false, which Columbus had spoken off in the beginning) yet hope was giuen him of expedition, and imployment in his voyage of Navigation, to those Islands vnknowne so soone as the King had taken order for the war of Granado, which then lay heauily on his hand.

Columbus, vpon this answer, began to mount his hopes farre higher then before, and was then graciously both heard and esteemed of all the Courtiers, who laughed and made a mockery of him at the first. After the surprisall of Granado, he prevailed so successfull, that the Catholique King consented vnto his requests, for passage into those vnknowne parts: assigning vnto him in gift, the tenth part of the Rents and Royall tributes, in all the Lands found and conquered: but without preiudice (notwithstanding) to all rights belonging to the King of Portugall. And because the King was then vnfurnished of money for this expedition; Lodowick, Secretary for his accounts, lent him seuenteen thousand Ducats: by means whereof, Columbus armed & furnished three Caruels at Pally de Maguera, and in them fitted 120. men, all well Marinners as Soldiours.

Of one, hee made Martino Alphonso Pinzono the Guide and Conductor. Of the second, Francisco & Vincentio Aeneio, Brethren to the said Martino. And himselfe was Capitaine and Commander of the greatest Caruell among them, taking also with him his Brother Bartholmew, who (in like manner) was very practicke and well experienced on the Seas. Christopher Columbus (by meane of the Catholique King) armed three Caruels to goe first out the New World. Paulus Institutione of the Caruel, and setting forth his Voyage.

Pally he set forward on Friday, being the third day of August, and held on his voyage between the West and South, passing by Gomera, one of the Canary Islands, where he stayed for a small refreshing; & thence onward, followed the directions giuen him in the papers and memories of deceased Andaluso.

Having sayled eight dayes, he espied so much grasse or Herbage, as if it seemed to be a Meadow; whereof (at first) he & all grew doubtfull, although ther was no danger at all, and backe they would haue returned, but that they saw diuers Willow trees a farre off, which gaue an euident and most certaine signe, that some Land must needs be neere.

On the morrow following, which was the eleauenth day of Nouember, in the year 1492. Rodericke de Traiana, beganne to cry out aloud, Land, Land: at which words, all ran to see whether they were true or no; and hauing likewise discovered that it was firme Land, they beganne to praise GOD, and sung Te Deum Laudamus, mourning euen with great excess of ioy, and proud of a hopefull proceeding.

After 8. dayes sayling, Roderick de Triana was the first man that discovered Land.

The first Land which they saw, was Guanabany, one of the Iles Lucages, situated betweene Florida and Cuba; where suddenly they went on shoare, and there tooke possession of the New world. From Guanabany they went to Barncon, the Porte of Cuba, & there tooke some Indians, and returning backe to the Isle of Hayti, cast anchor in the Port, which Columbus called Porte Royall. There hastily they were faine to land againe; because the chief Caruell smote against a rocke, and began to rise; but yet no person was in perill. When the inhabitants of the Isle saw the Spaniards come on shore so speedily, and with their Armes: they fled from the sea side vp to the Mountaines; imagining them to bee the Carybes or Cambibles, that came to assaile them.

which caused them presently to come downe againe to the Sea side, to speake with the Spaniards, without any vnderstanding on either side; otherwise then by signes, euen as dumbe folke vse to do. They brought Birds, Bread, Fruits, Gold, and other things, to giue in exchange for Ballads, Beads, Glasses, Needles, Sizets, Pinnes, and other such like things, to the no little ioy and comfort of Christopher Columbus, who saluted, embraced, & reuerently entreated the Lord of that land, being of his people called Cachico, & gifts passed betweene one another, in signe of loue and amity.

The Indians brought boats of theyr owne, wherein to bestowe the goodes of the cheefe Caruell that was broken, and brought them on Land with the Spaniards, so louingly, euen as if they hadde dwelt all their life time among them: falling downe in reuerence to the Crosse, and beating themselves on the breasts, like vnto Christians.

The kind offices of the Indians to the Spaniards.

Now Columbus, thinking no time soon enough for his returne to Spaine, with newes to the Catholique King, of what he had scene and done, prevailed so wel with the prompt and sodaine consent of Cachico, and the assistance of his subiects: as to build a Castle of Wood and Earth; wherein hee left eight and thirty Spaniards, vnder the charge of Captaine Roderigo d'Armas, of Corloua: to the end, that during his voyage, they might learne the Language and seueres, both of the Nation and Countrey. And this was the first inhabiting of the Spaniards in the Indies.

Columbus, by consent of Cachico, & help of his people, builded a Castle of Wood and earth.

The Castle being finished, Columbus tooke with him tenne Indian men, forty Parrats, many Tortoiles, Conies, and other strange things, farre differing from ours in forme and nature, as testimonies of the places where hee had found them. He brought aboard also into his ships, all the Golde which the people of the countrey had giuen him, in exchange of those toyces and trifles which hee returned for them. And, after hee had taken leaue of his friendly Companions, appointed to remaine there in his absence, as also of Guacanari (for so was the Cachico or King of that Countrey named) who was verie sorry and loath, that hee should depart thence, he sent away with two Caruels,

King and Queen

The Catholike King and queene were then at Barcelona, whither Columbus went to see them; and although it was a long way, and he had many things to carry: yet notwithstanding, they were all conveyed with him by Land, and hee was welcomed vnto the Court with great Honour. Infinite people flocked about him, to see the things which hee brought from the New-found Worlde, which were of extraordinary wealth and riches, beside the strange men, of such colour and habit, as neuer hadde the like beene seene before. Some sayde, that hee had found the Navigation, concealed from the Carthaginians. And others affirmed it, to be that which Plato had written of to bee lost by fortune, and by an ouer-great quantity of muddie or slime encreasing in the Sea. Some other helde another opinion, saying, That that which Seneca had foretold was now accomplished, speaking in his Tragedy of Medea after this manner. The time will come, that (many yeares hence) New worlds shall be found, and that their Trade could not bee the furthest part of the earth.

Finally, Columbus entred the Court of Spaine, the third day of April, a yeare after he had departed thence, presenting to their Maiesties, the Golde and all things else which he had brought from the New World; whereat the King, Queene, and all then present, marvelled not a little, to see such rare things, all (but the gold) newell and vncustomed vnto their sight. They highly commended the Parrats, being of so many goodly colours; some of an extraordinary shining green, others of a liuely red or Vermillion colour, intermixed with many other of choise splendour, little or nothing at all resembling them that were brought from other places. The Conies were small, hauing their eares and tayles like vnto Rats, and their colour grizzeld. Also they greatly praised the Cockes of those Countreyes, being all farre more beautifull then Pea-cockes, wondering besides, that those Countreies yielded no other Corne, and no other bread was yet fedde on there, but such as was made of rootes and the like things. But their cheefest meruaile was at the men, who had little circleters or Buckles of Gold hanging in their eares, and finely pierced through their nostrilles: their bodies being neither white nor black, or browne, but like vnto an Oliue colour, or boyled Quinces.

Very attentive was the King, to heare what a worthy Relation Columbus made, wondering greatly, that the people should haue no Habite, Learning, Mony, Iron, Corne, Wine, neyther any Animall which was greater then a Dogge, nor Shippes or Boates of any bignesse. And much was his patience moued, when he heard him tell, that they did eate one another, being all Idolaters. But he promised, that if God pleased to blesse him with life and health: he would free them from that horrible inhumanity, and root Idolatry out of those Lands, that could bee reduced vnder his dominion and power. In like manner, hee extended great fauour and courtesie to Columbus, commanding that he should sit down before him, because (according to the custome of Spaine) the Gentlemen and other attendants, stand alwayes in the Kings presence, for greater honour to the Royall authority.

Moreover, he confirmed his grant and priuilege, concerning the tenth part of reuenues in the faide Lands, giuing him the title and Office of Admirall of the Indies, and made his Brother Bartholomew Lieutenant or vice-Admiral to him. All which being done, a Courrier or Post was dispatched vnto Rome, with letters concerning the New-found lands, to his Maiesties ambassadours, whom (but some few months before) he had sent to congratulate Pope Alexander the fixt, at his new creation, and (on his behalfe) to do him obeyfance. Which letters of full and further information, they deliuered to his Holiness; he not a little reioycing at these good newes, as the like did at the Roman Court. In regard whereof, the holy Father, with consent of the whole Colledge of Cardinals, made a new donation to the Kinges of Castile and Leon, of all the Isles and firme lands that should be found in the West: with charge to send Preachers thither, for conuersion of the Infidels.

When the Catholike King had receyued this ioyfull answer from the Pope, he sent Christopher Columbus againe, with more store of people, for further trafficking in this New-found World, and for vtter destruction of Idolatry, and adoration giuen to false Gods. For the better furtherance hereof, by John Fonqueio, Deane of Sinell, he sent eight Caruelles, making him President of those countries. He sent also twelue Priestes, of vertuous life, and good learning, with Friar Buleio Castellano, of the order of S. Benedickt, who went to be Vicar-General for the Pope: to the end, that those Ecclesiasticall persons might preach the word of God, conuerting the people to the Faith of Iesus Christ, and do all things appertaining to the conuersion of soules.

Beside all this, many Knights & courtiers, moued by the fame and desire of riches in the same Countreies, and earnest affection to see them; went along with them in company, having diuers Artzans among them, as Goldsmithes, Taylors, Mafons, Carpenters, Laborers, Fishermen, and such like persons, fit for diuers employments.

The King called also (at his own charge) to be bought some store of Horses, Kine, Sheepe, Goates, Swine, and Asses; that breed might there ensue of them. Great store also was sent of Wheate, Barly, and Graine of all kindes to sowe; with Slips, Sprigs of Vines, Sugar Canes, and Plants of sweete fruites, as also Chalk and Lime to build withall. In breefe, they carried diuers other things for the like needefull vses; entertaining into this seruice 1500. Soldiers, which Columbus shipt at Cadix the 25. day of September, 1493. and good provision of Artillery.

Proceeding on in his voyage, & much more neere to the Equinoctiall then hee did before in his first passage, he came to arrive and take landing in an Island, which hee tearmed by the name of Desire, and without any staying there, won the Port D'Agen, in the Ile called Hispaniola. Pass- ing on thence to Porte Royale, where he had left the eight and thirte. Spaniards, who were all illaue by the Indians, because they had lustfully forced their wives and done them many outrages besides: Columbus being displeased hereat, yet the- wing no outward discontentment, immediately commanded his Mafons & other men to fall to worke, for the building of a Towne, which (in honour of the Queene) he named Isabella.

He builded also a Fort or castle among the Mines of Cibao, where he established as Governour, Moyles Marquarito, & sent twelue Caruels thence into Spain by Antonio de Turco, which carried many grains of Golde, one especially amongst them, weighing eight ounces, which was found by Aphonso de Houeda. Hee sent likewise many Parrats, very faire and goodly, and certaine Indian Caribes, being such as fed on the flesh of men, bred and born in the Island of Acy, which hee called Santa Cruz, and hee himselfe, went with three Caruels more, to finde out other Lands: where he found Cubo on the South-side, and Laniauca, with other small Isles in diuers parts.

At his returne backe, he found many Spaniards dead and sicke, and some that hadde carried themselves scarcely honestly with their companions: whereof hee commanded some to be hanged, and others to be well beaten, that had giuen forth euill speeches of him. By means whereof, he had some talke with the Vicare to the Pope, who had written to the King, accusing Columbus of cruelty and couetousnesse: which caused his Maiestie to send thither his Chamberlain John de Aguado, who sent Columbus into Spaine prisoner, to render an account of his behaviour to the King.

Christopher Columbus obeying the kings command, went away to iustify himselfe. And arriving at Medina del Campo (where as then the Court was) hee came before the King and Queene, presenting infinite grailnes of Gold to them; some whereof, weighed fifteene, and twenty Ounces a peece, with great lumps of Amber, goodly wilde Oliue trees and wonderfull huge plumes of Parrats Feathers, vfed & worn by the Indians, beside many other strange things.

He made report also vnto their Maiesties, concerning the Countreies founde by him, greatly commending the Islands for their admirable riches; declaring besides, that in the month of December, which hee hold to be the heaviest time of all Winter, that the Birds there, do then produce their young ones on the trees; &

Greatly did the King both commend and thanke him for his good ſeruiſe, and knowing, that hee had doone no more then Iuſtice, declared him to be abſolued of all imputations layed vnto his charge, furniſhing him with eight ſhippes, for the finding out of other Countries: two whereof Columbus ſent before with victualles and munition, and with the other fixe ſhippes, himſelfe ſet away from Saint

On hee went coaſting three hundred leagues, beyond the Cape with full ſayle, and thwarſing the Sea, came to Saint Dominico, a towne belonging to his brother Bartholomew, and builded on the Riuer Oxama, where hee was receiued to be gouernor, as was contained in his Letters of priuiledge and grant, which the King Catholique had made vnto him, and which hee brought thither with him. Columbus hauing taken on him the gouernement, and made many enterpriſes againſt them of the Countrey, finding out many other Iſlands beſides; grew to be enuied by the Spaniards, and in ſuch ſort, that a man named Roldan Simenes (a great Potefſtate or Iudge) mutined againſt him, and three ſcore and ten men more, all leagued and coniuered againſt him, who forſaking Columbus, went to Siragua, and wrote infinite cuilles of him and his brethren to the King. His Maieſtie, being not a little moued, that matters ſhould be thus combuſtious in the Indies; and the Queene taking it very heauily: ſuddenly ſent Franceſco de Bonadello, a knight of good repute, to be gouernour in thoſe parts, and giuing him authoritie, eyther to puniſh or imprifon the faultie.

This man came to the Iſland of Hiſpaniola, and foure Caruells with him, in the yeare, one thouſand foure hundred nintie and nine; and after hee had made in-quiſition in the Citie of Dominico; he ſent Chriſtopher Columbus, with Bartholomew and Diego his brethren, all priſoners to Spaine, with yron fetters on their feete. Being landed at Cadez, they were deliuered, by Commiſſion ſent from the King, and commanded to appeare at the court. Columbus readily obeyed thereto, and could ſo well ſhape his excuſes (mingled with teares and ſighes very paſſionately) that the King hauing heard him, and knowing his fidelitie, ſent him againe (three yeares after) with foure Caruells, to diſcouer more new Countries, and this was in the yeare of our Lord God, 1502. or thereabouts.

Columbus being come to the Iſland of Hiſpaniola, and arriuing neare to the riuer Oxama, Nicholas de Ouanda Gouernour of the Iſle, would not ſuffer his entrance into the Citie of Saint Dominico, whereat Columbus being much diſtaſted, ſent in to tell him: That if he might not come into the citie, which he himſelfe had cauſed to be builded; he would goe ſinde out another Port, where he might be in better aſſurance. So parting thence, and coueting to ſearch the Straits, for paſſing beyond the Equinoctiall, which he had promiſed the King to doe: hee drew directly towards the Weſt, withall, turning to the Cape of Nigueria, following till the Meridionall coaſt, returning then to Cuba, and after to Ianica, where hee loſt two Gallies, and with two other he went to diſcouer new lands. But not without great harmes and perils endured before, for ſome of his followers grew ſicke, and certaine other Spaniards made warre vpon him.

Wherevpon, Chriſtopher Columbus calling ſome of them to him, reproued their lacke of kindneſſe and charity, entreating them to ſell him ſome victuals; aduiſing them further, that except they did ſuccor them, all they in the Iſland ſhould dye of the plague. And to giue them a ſigne as witneſſe of his words, he tolde them, that ſuch a day it would ſo come to paſſe; as they ſhould ſee the Moone whollie aſred as bloode, and quite contrarie to her former condition.

Afterwardes, when they behelde the Moone Eclipſed, at the ſame houre of the day, as Columbus had foretolde (not knowing any rules of Aſtroglogie) they verily beleued his words. And, crating pardon of him, deſired him not to be offended with them; & brought him what victuals he could deſire. Before wee cloſe vp this Diſcourſe of the New-found World, it ſhall not varie much from the matter, to ſpeake of a ſtrange opinion, among the people there naturally liuing; concerning the firſt men that euer were in the world, and likewiſe of the generall Flood or Deluge, as I doe finde it ſet downe by the worthy Gentleman of France, Anthony du Verdier, lord of Vaſprinas, in this manner.

Among the Inhabitants of the Weaſt Indies, or New world, a common and generall receiued opinion was embraced with them, that (at the beginning of the world) from the Septentrionall or Northern partes, there came a man called Con, or Conon, who had no bones in his whole body, and therefore went verie quicke and lightly, much ſhortening the wayes, abating the hills and mountains, and raiſing the lowe-layd vallies, onlie with his word and will, and named himſelfe to be the ſonne of the Sunne.

This man filled the earth with men and women, which hee produced, giuing vnto them diuers fruites, and other things neceſſary for humane life. But by a diſpleaſure hee receiued from them, hee conuerted the earth (which hee before had freely giuen them) into a drie and barren ſand, and tooke away the raine alſo, that it ſhould neuer more ſhowre downe, nor moiſture any place. Yet, as pitying their miſery, hee left them riuers onely, to the end, that they might conſerue themſelves, in watering the grounds by theyr owne paine and labour.

At length came one Pachamo, who was like-wiſe ſonne both to the Sunne and Moone; and (hauing expelled or baniſhed Conon) conuerted thoſe men into Cattes; and afterward created other men. The people tooke this man to be a God, and ſo he was generally reputed: vntill the Chriſtians came into thoſe countries, hauing erected a very good Temple vnto him.

CHAP. III.

¶ Of the Excellencie and Dignitie of Marriage: with many singular and worthy examples, tending to that purpose.

Concerning our present argument, we haue had a chapter already in our former Volume, declaring verie much good matter to that effect, but yet iustly deferring this addition or supplement; in regard, that nothing can be sayd too much in the honour of Marriage. This holy institution of Marriage, was made in the earthly Paradise before sinne, in the time of Innocencie, when as God said to our first Parents, Bring forth fruit, and multiply, and fill the earth. But it was not brought to effect, untill the offence by them committed, and for which, they were expulged out of the terrestriall Paradise: as Saint Ierome hath obserued in his Booke against Iouinian.

After the vniuersall Deluge, God gaue command to the good Patriarch Noah againe, To encrease and multiply, which is the principall occasion, wherefore Marriage was ordayned, and hath euer since beene so generally recommended: that it hath beene, and is permitted to aged and decrepite people (free from all power of encreasing, and out of hope of any linage) to marry: which yet is expedient for them (if I might say so) to the end, that they may passe their age the more ioyously, as in the kinde company of husband and wife, receiuing pleasure, solace, consolation, and comfortable seruices each to other. Euen as hereof we haue an example by David, who (in his very old age) tooke a yong maiden to wife, as namely, Abigail the Shunamite, with whom hee ordinarily lay, and shee slept in the bosome of the King, warming and comforting him, and yet the King knew her not carnally.

They beleeue an end of the world; but that a great drought shall goe before it, and that the Sunne and Moone (which they all adore and reuerence) shall loose themselves. And, vpon this occasion, they make cries and lamentations whensoever the Ecclypses happen: but especially them of the Sunne, as fearing then, that the Sunne, they, and all the whole World, shall be quite consumed and destroyed together.

What more holy, chaste, assured, and acceptable societie can be amongst men, then that of the husband and wife? Oh! how heavenly an harmony, when the one is as the other, two bodies, one soule, one spirit, one will, and one mutual consent (sympathizing in two bodies) The sole married man and his wife, enny not one another, but loue infinitely together, each depending vpon the other, shee reposing in him, and he in her: euen as one selfe same flesh, one and the same concord, alike equally in all things; and all but one: One ioy, one sorrow, one wealth, one poverty, one gaine, one losse, and one selfe same dignitie. They are alwayes companions of one selfe same bed, one and the same table. Therefore they shall be two in one flesh (said God) and not three, or many.

God would by no means haue in the Ark of Noah, to be any more women then men, to the end that they should all be as one sole woman. In briefe, the loue of the husband to the wife, and of the wife to her husband, surpasseth that of father and mother to their children, of children vnto the father; and that which brothers and sisters ought to haue together. And like as the Ring which the husband (euen as God) puts on the finger of his Spouse or wife (as the soule to the Church) ought to be of golde, and round, as gold, being the most excellent of all metallies: euen so this coniugal loue exceedeth all other, and ought to continue perpetually. And as Propertius saith: Omnis amor magno, sed aperto in coniuge maior. Enery loue is great, but in wedlocke it appeareth to be much greater. For, Father, Mother, Children, Brethren, Sisters, Cousins and Friends, all these are the workes of Fortune: but the Husband and the Wife are Mysteries of Almightie GOD: And man had his Wife, and Wife had her Husband, before there was eyther Father, Mother, or Children.

The fruits of Marriage are of Almightie GOD, and of not of Nature, from whence it ensueth, that children borne out of Marriage, that is to say, Bastards, are called Naturall onely, but they which proceede of loyall Marriage, are sayd to be Legitimate. And therefore, the opinion of Lawyers, is, That a childe borne out of marriage, hath no certaine father, but we may well say, a bad or lewd mother. He (say they) is the Sonne of the people, or else the Sonne of no body, that is the Sonne of an unmarried woman. Onely marriage then (which Baldus calleth, The principle, origi- nall and foundation of Mankind) maketh Children and Heires certayne, augmenteth kindred, engendereth amitie among Allies, reuerenceth and pleaseeth God.

Holy Marriage was so pleasing to the Authour thereof, that he would haue his onely Sonne, to be borne of a married woman, and although it was his will, to be borne of a Virgine, without the feede of a man; yet was it not without the honour of Marriage. For it pleased him, to proceed from a Mother married, yet pure neuertheless, exempt from any carnall soyling: elected to be the Arke of the Testament, the Bush not burning, and the Violl of golde to contayne the celestiall Manna; as well to declare the wonders of his infinite power, as to make that sacred estate so much the more honorable. Witness the presence of the same son of God himselfe, at the matiage of Cana in Galilee, where expressing his gracious loue & furtherance, he conuerted water into wine, by an especial and extraordinary miracle.

Moreover, there is not the name of any house or stocke, but (without a woman) it would be quite extinct: neither kindred perpetuated, family increased, or a Common wealth continue in intire condition, or any Empire hold, without such help which the first founders of the Romaine Empire approued; for, they hauing no wiues, desired the Daughters of the Sabines, their neighbors, but they would not grant the. Whereupon, there followed rape or stealth of 683, of them, which procured a mighty & mortall warre, betwixt the Romans and the said Sabines: albeit Romulus well foresawe, that his Empire could not last, without women. For, the Citty being composed of houses, and the Common-wealth of chosen Princes, both domesticke and familliers, how shall he gouerne a Citty, that hath not learned what it is to gouerne a priuate house? The Philosopher Socrates testifieth, to haue learned more morall Philosophie of women, then euer he could naturall, of Alexander and Archelaus.

Assuredly, Marriage giues exercitation to morall Philosophie: there is a domesticall Common-wealth conioyned therewith, and in it selfe. For the gouernement whereof, a man may easily experiment the power of wisdom, temperance, pietie, & all other vertues whereby louing his wife, enſtrucking his children, ruling his family, protecting his goodes, ordering his houſe, and encreasing his race; the yeares of his life, will pace on the more happily. Whereas on the contrary, hee that ſeeketh to ſpend his life time without being married; is miſerable, and worthe to be abandoned of all men.

For this cauſe, Lycurgus made a Lawe to the Lacedaemonians, that all ſuch as had attained vnto the age of eight and thirty yeares, without enioying women in marriage; ſhould be baniſhed in ſomer time, from all publique playes, ſpectacles and paſtimes, iudging them as vnworthie, to be ſeene there amongſt other in an open aſſembly. And in winter, they were led out naked, in the common view of the people, becauſe they ſhould be outraged and abuſed by words and exclamations of every one, deteſted as vnworthie the name of men. And themſelues enioyned to confeſſe, that they ſuffered theſe afflictions iuſtly, as hauing ſcorned and deſpiſed that religion: whereof they were preuaricators, and diſobedient to the ordinance of Nature.

As concerning the Romans, they were not altogether ſo ſtrict and ſeuere, & yet ordained, that ſuch as had liued without marriage till their olde age: ſhould be condemned in payment of a great ſumme of money to the publique Treafury, according to their quality and facultie. Plato appointed in his lawes, that ſuch men as were not married, ſhould enioy no honor eſtate, or publique dignity: but to be more charged with fines and mulcts, then any of the other Citizens.

A yong man of Lacedaemon, would not ariſe out of his place in the publique Theater, to giue way and honour to a valiant ancient Captaine (neer married) named Callidus, who was come thither to ſee the paſtimes. And the Captaine growing offended at the arrogancy of the yong man becauſe he diſdained him in that manner, gaue him ſome words of heat and choler, whereto the yong man returned him this anſwer. O Callidus, thou haſt not (as yet) begotten, neither occaſioned the birth of any one that being now at mine age, and unmarried as thou art, may ariſe hereafter to giue me place, and therefore no other eſtimate is to be made of thee. The Romans in the time of Metellus Conſull, eſtabliſhed many fa-

CHAP. III.

Of Partharites, King of the Lombards, who being purſued by Grimoald, fledde firſt to Cacanur, King of the Auarians or Huns, afterward into France. And in the end of ter many heavy and troubleſom Trauayls; was (with great honor and renowne, ſeated in his owne kingdom.

Partharites was ſonneto Albert King of the Lombards, who (after the death of his father) reigned at Myllaine; and Gondebert his brother, at Pauiæ.

A ſtrife and quarrell, growing betwene the two Brethren, Gondebert

Paulus Diaconus ſets down this hiſtorie more at large.

ſent Garibald, Duke of Thurine, towards Grimoald, Duke of Beneuentum, a verie generous Captaine and Commaunder, requiring his aſſiſtance againſt Partharites, with ſolemne promiſe, of giuing him his Siſter in marriage. But Garibald intending treaſon to his Lord and Maſter; perſwaded Grimoald, to come and poſſeſſe the kingdom to his owne uſe, which (thorow diſcord betwene the two brethren) was growne to weake eſtate, and verie neare vpon viter ruine.

Grimoald gaue ouer his Dukedome to his Sonne, in hope of a Kingdom.

When Grimoald vnderſtood this, hee gaue ouer his Dukedome of Beneuentum to his ſonne, creating him there as abſolute Duke, and, with the greateſt forces he could get together, prepared his iourney for Pauiæ; and in all cities and towns as he paſſed along, begot himſelfe ſtore of friends, for his better helpe in obtaing the kingdom. Being come to Pauiæ, and entering into priuate conference with Gondebert: by cloſe praſtice and intelligence with Garibald, Gondebert was ſlaine at a Banquet, and he made poſſeſſour of the kingdom. No ſooner did Partharites heare theſe ſad tydings, but, leauing faire Rhodolinda his wife and Queene, and a yong ſonne of his (both confined by Grimoald to Beneuentum for cloſe cuſtody) fled ſecretly away, making his recourſe to Cacanur, king of the Auarians or Hunnes.

Grimoald hauing made ſure his Kingdom at Pauiæ, and vnderſtanding, that Partharites ſecured his ſafetie with Cacanur: ſent Ambaſſadours to him, to let him know, that if hee kept Partharites in his kingdom, no long peace ſhould continue betwene him and the Lombardes, but he muſt expect a King as his enimie. According to this Ambaſſage, the King of the Auarians called Partharites to him in ſecrecy, deſiring him, that he would wander whither himſelfe pleaſed: becauſe (thorow his meanes) the Auarians might not fall into the hatred of the Lombardes. And ſo, vpon a royall, ſad and mutuall interchange of woſull lamentations on eyther ſide, the two kings parted, as might haue moued pity in Marble to behold it.

Grimoald ſuffered not Partharites to abide with Cacanur.

A hard caſe, when a King is conſtrained to truſt to his enemy for ſuccour.

Partharites, fruſtrated now of all helpe and comfort, returning into Italie againe: purpoſed his repaire to his enimie Grimoald, conſiding on his kingly clemencie, becauſe hee waſt delitute of any other ſuccour. And being come neare to the City of Lody, he called to a Gentleman of his, named Vnulpus, in whom his intimate truſt wholly conſiſted, ſending him before, to acquaint Grimoald with his coming, and to deale iuſtly for his ſafetie. Vnulpus preſented himſelfe before the new-made King, viſing ſuch wife and honourable language to him, concerning Partharites his King and Maſter, making recourſe to his royall mercie, and truſting only in his goodneſſe; that he would ſeely ſubmit himſelfe to him, if he (with the like benigneſtie) would vouchſafe to embrace him.

Vnulpus a loall ſeruant to Partharites

So effectually did Vnulpus deliuer his meſſage, and Grimoald (eyther in pride or pleaſure) accept it: that hee promiſed and ſware vpon his faith, no diſpleſure ſhould any way be done to the King his maſter, he might come when he would, & builde ſecurely vpon his faith. Vnulpus, hauing brought backe this anſwere to Partharites, hee went and preſented himſelfe before Grimoald, meercely proſtrate at his feete, who took him vp graciously, & in moſt friendly manner kiſſed him: where vpon, Partharites beganne thus: Siſth I am your humble vailſaile and ſeruant, and knowing you to be moſt Chriſtian, and a faithfull louer of pietie: though I might liue ſafe among Pagans, yet, building vpon your mildneſſe and mercy, I am come, and heere yeeld my ſelfe at your feete.

Conference between Grimoald and Partharites.

Grimoald viſing his accuſtomed oathes, promiſed him, ſaying By him that made me to be borne, ſeeing you haue put your ſelfe into my power, you ſhall ſuffer no harme anie what ſoener; but I will take ſuch order, that you ſhall liue well and honorably. So he commanded him a conuenient lodging, with entertainment anſwerable to his quality, and all things afforded to him in plentifull maner. Partharites being departed from the King, to ſuch place as was appoynted for him; it came to paſſe, that the people flocke and referred daily thither (hauing formerly knowne & honoured him) earneſtly deſiring to ſee and ſalute him.

Grimoald his proteſtations to Partharites and the honorable intertainment he gaue him.

But ſee how ready euill tongues are to commit miſchiefe, diuers flatterers and audacious Informers, obſeruing the peoples kind greetings to Partharites: reported it in ſuch maner to Grimoald, that they incited him very ſtrangely, perſwading him, that if he did not the ſooner procure the death of Partharites, hee would bee shaken out of his kingdom, yea, and lose his life likewise; for Partharites lodging seemed now, rather to be a Court then his. Grimald being a man over-easie in beleefe, and led away with the least persuasions; became so confounded with ieaousie and distrust, that (never remembering his solemn oathes and promises) he fell into an extraordinary rage, and in extremity of heate and choller, swore the death of innocent Partharites, wanting nothing but aduice and meanes, how it might both safely and sodainly bee effected.

Now, because it grew somewhat late, and on the morrow the deed must needs be done; he caused (that Evening) great store of delicate meates and wines to be sent to Partharites, purposely to make him drunke: that being overcome with eating and drinking, and all his senses possessed with drowinesse, hee might haue the lesse care of his health, and so his life be the sooner betrayed. But a Gentleman who before had serued the father of Partharites, and brought him these Juncks from the King: stooping his head lowe beneath the table, as doing him reuerence and embracing his knee, secretly reuealed to him, how Grimald had concluded his death, and that this nightes iouial drinking supper, must be a solemne induction thereto.

Heereupon, Partharites immediately, (but very couertly) gaue order vnto his Cup bearer and Taster, to fill and bring him no other drinke all supper while, but some small quantities of water onely, and in his private siluer Bowle. So that the Courtiers (who were sent to keepe him company) gawling and carowling many healths of the King to Partharites, desiring him still to pledge them in like manner, as thereby expressing his loue to the King: Partharites accepted all their feuerall charges, procteling all honor and reuerence to Grimald, rowling vp cup after cup as readily as they, seeming as merrie as any of them all, and yet drank nothing else but water. Supper being ended, and the Courtiers returning back to the king, reported the iocund behavior of Partharites, and how forward still he was in turning off his owne Bolle, as readily as they did theirs, and neuer refused to pledge his Highnesse health, thinking him to be very farre spent with wine. Whereat Grimald heartily reioycing, merrily saide; Alas poore silly Drunkard, little thinkest thee, that the Wine and his blood will mingle on the earth to morrow together, in despite of all the friends he hath.

The same night, he sent strong guards to watch about the house where Partharites was lodged, because he should haue no meanes to escape, nor any friends com to giue him assistance. But the poor harmlesse Prince, when supper was past, and all the Courtiers departed thence (relying alone in his Chamber, & none with him but Vnphus, and a Page that vied to waite neerest about, to helpe his Garments both off and on, they being both his faithfull seruants, and in whom he reposed most confidence:) he discovered plainly to them, how peremptorily his death was concluded on by Grimald, and what a strong watch was set round about his lodging, so that now their poor Lord and Maisters life must needs penith by his treachery.

Vnphus hauing a prompt and readie witte, louing his Lord deere, & caring for no danger to himselfe, so hee might set him free from perill: by means of certaine Blankets belonging to a bedde, and a Beares skinne which he found there in his chamber by chance, so substantially he disguised Partharites, that it was impossible to distinguish him from a mere Country Boore or Pezant, and his counterfeiting drunkenness, made the matter to seeme the more likely. Vnphus had gotten a good Taggot-slick, and pretending sweating, with beating that drunken Raicall (for so, and sometimes worse he commonly called him) tumbled him first downe the staires, and lastly out of doores, labouring still as if he had giuen many fore blowes. Which when the Guardes there attending perceyued, they demanded of Vnphus, what was the matter? Hee answered, saying: Here is a drunken laue, who while the Lordes were heere at Supper with Partharites, hath secretly gotten in, and stolne himselfe stark drunke, keeping such a terrible noise, that my Lord (who is as drunk as hee) I feare can take no rest, and by no meanes would I haue him to bee disturbed.

The best and quickest witted drincker, may somtime be deceived.

The cleauntly thurst of Vnphus to loose the life of his kingly master

Vnphus cunningly beguiled the Guard and gaineth the escape of Partharites.

The death of Partharites is vowed by Grimald.

One of Grimald's owne Gentlemen bewayed the treason.

The wisdom of Partharites in preventing the Treason prepared for him.

No doubt at all made the Guardes of Vnphus his words, but laughing, to see the slaue belabored so lustily, suffered him to driue him on before him, bidding him beate still, and spare him not. While the Guardes stood laughing at this merry iest, no man needed to bid them make haft, & Partharites being quickly got out of sight, Vnphus returned to the lodging, which made the Guardes the more confidently perswaded, and secured the King from all pursuite. Moreover, after the Kings departure in that manner, the faithfull Page kept the doore lockt vp fast, till Vnphus was returned againe: where they two onely remained in the chamber, praying for their Kings prosperous successe; who arrived that night at the Towne of Aste, and from thence (passing the mountaines) went into France.

On the morrow mornng, messengers came from the King, to bring Partharites to the Pallace, and beating at the doore, the Page spake out at the windowe, saying: Good Gentlemen forbear, his Maicestie hath drunke somewhat hard, is very sleepey, and therefore I pray yet trouble not his rest. Where to they in modestly yielding, went and reported the same to Grimald, who well liked that he should sleep so long: yet sent them againe in all haste, and howsoever (awake or asleepe) to bring him away with them. The Souldiers learning to displease the king, came and knocked earnestly at the doore; but being intreated by the Page, as aforesaid, they boldly broke the doore open, & seeking for Partharites in his bed, found him not, which made them to demand, what was become of him; & the Page said, he was fled.

Prefently were Vnphus and the Page seized on, and haled furiously to the Pallace, where being brought before the king, with vnappalled countenance, they tolde, that the King had escaped with life, discovering the manner truly how, and dreading no infiction for the fact. When Grimald had aduicely considered on their faith and loyalty, he called them feuerally againe before him, wishing he had such an other faithfull Page, exhorting him earnestly to keepe his loyalty to his Lord Partharites, promising to recompence him worthily for it. Vnphus afterwards was brought againe before him, and the king greatly commending both his wisdom & honesty, demanded, whether he would chuse to liue with him in good grace and acceptance, or follow Partharites in the extremity of his fortunes? where to Vnphus said, with an oath, That he would rather chuse to die with Partharites, in all torments whatsoever; then liue any where else, with all the pleasures and delights that the world could giue him.

The same demand was also made to the Page, & his answer was the like in effect: whereon the King highly extolling their vnpareld loyalty; prayed them both, to command whatsoever his Court afforded, & go in all safety to seek their master. Provided of all things they could desire or carry with them, and securitie granted for their safe passage; they set onward to France, in a longing desire to meete with Partharites; as soone after they did, to great ioy and comfort on euery side. But first, newes being abroad, that Grimald had vnited peace with Dagobert King of France: it made Partharites fearful of some close ambushes to be layed for him, & so he might be sent backe to Grimald againe: which made him forlake France, & to ship himselfe for England: all which calamities happened to him, before his two faithfull seruants could any where finde him.

Being on the Sea all together, and (in hope of good successe) bound for England, they had not past a full league from land: But Partharites heard a voyce, seeming to come directly from the shore where hee took shipping, demanding in this manner: Speake there, is Partharites in the ship, or not? Partharites replied without pausing: I who is it that calleth Partharites? I am that most unhappy man, and (blessed be heauen) heere I am. Tell him then (answered the voyce) his native Country calles him home, and further he may not goe, for, within three dayes, Grimald is dead. Partharites amazed at this strange accident, required fauor to be landed with his seruants againe; but could neuer know him that tolde those tidings of Grimald's death, which made him verily perswaded, that it was no mortal man, but his owne good Angell, that thus entrusted him, after his passing thorow so many miseries.

Partharites returning home againe, towards his owne native Countrey, hee was no sooner arrived at the limites of Italy; but he met there with a goodly company of Lombards, with Laurell wreaths on their heads, and Palme branches in their hands, who purpofely attended there for his coming, and fo conducted him joyfully to Paula; from whence, the Sonne of Grimoald being expelled, he was there (by generall confent) created abfolute King of the Lombards, within three moneths after the death of Grimoald. He difpatched Pofts to Beneuentum, in queft of Rodefinde his Queene and Wife, as alfo his Sonne Cunibert. And being a man pious, Catholique, a great obferuer of Iuftice, and charitable to the poore; fofoon as he was quietly feated in his kingdom, he builded a goodly Monaftery, neere vnto the Riuier Theffina, in which fometime he had concealed himfelfe, when he was enforced from place to place; dedicating the Temple to Gods feruice, and in honour of S. Agatha the Virgin & Martyr, planting therein many religious virgins, and endowing it with great liberality of rents and reuenues. His Queene alfo, after her many troubles, and long feparation from her husband, erected the Church of our Lady without the walles, beftowing infinite rich and precious ornaments thereon. And at length, Partharites (having reigned eightene yeares) changed this mortall life for a better, to the great greefe of his loving Subiects the Lombards.

Nor may we here omit to fay fomething of Garibald, Duke of Thurine, the beginner of this poore Princes calamities. He hauing infligated (as hath bin related) Grimoald, Duke of Beneuentum, to murder Gondebert, King of the Lombards, treacheroufly: within no long while after, a certaine meane man, of little or no refpect at all, coming to the City of Thurine, and vnderftanding, that Garibald would be in the cheefe Church on Eaft day neere enſuing; flood on the ſteps of the Font for baptiſme, leaning careleſſly on his left arme, by a collome of the Tabernacle, being at the very entrance into the Church, hauing a weapon ready drawne vnder his Cloake. So ſoone as Garibald came to bee neere him; he (not fearing all the traine about him) ſuddenly ran the Rapier quite through his body, that inſtantly he fell downe dead. Such as attended Garibald, being ſomewhat amazed at ſo vnexpected an accident, purſu-ing the murderer, could faſten no hold on him, vntill they had ſlaine him, with many weapons being in his body at once. So, although he loſt his life; yet courageouſly he reuenged the iniurious act, committed on Gondebert his Lord & Maſter.

CHAP. V.

What manner of men thoſe were and are, that be called Doctōrs of Sorbonne, or Sorbonnifts.

Am ſure there are many, that neuer ſaw the goodly, rich, populous, commodious, and well gouerned City and Vniuerſity of Paris; yet diuers that haue ſeene it, or read the Antiquities thereof, may perhaps be ignorant, what kinde of men they are, that beare the title or name of Doctōrs of Sorbonne. For all other Doctōrs are honoured by thoſe Cities names, wherein they receiued their degrees: As Doctōrs of Louaine, of Poitiers, of Down, of Tholeſſa, of Montpelier, of Paula, of Bologna, of Tubinge, of Fribourge, and ſo of diuers other. But the Doctōrs in diuinity of Sorbonne, beare their name, not of the City where they receiued their licenſes and degrees Doctōrall; but of the place peculiarly. A matter which hath much amazed many, & raiſed doubt in diuers others, that neuer had the happineſſe to viſit Paris in which reſpect, I purpoſe to ſet down the true originall thereof, how, and vpon what occaſion it came ſo to paſſe.

It is to be vnderſtood, as I haue elſewhere ſaide, that the courſe of nature will ſooner faile; then people be any other but as their Princes are, as Caſiodorus ſaith. King Lewis, ninth of that name, reigning King in France, whereas other Princes deuiſed (euen as to this day many do) how to build Palaces & vnprofitable houſes, for pride, luxury and prodigality: this holy & religious King cauſed Churches to be erected, Hoſpitals, Abbeyes, Colledges, & other places of piety in imitation of whom, many of his Subiects, & other other ſtrangers did the like.

Amongſt other, there was a Diuine of the Kings houſe, his Almoner, and one of his Preachers, who was thought to be provided of ſome good Benefice; yet neyther enriched his kinned, or ſpent his reuenues in vanities, as too many churchmen now adayes vſe to doe. This good man was called Maſter Robert de Sorbonne: but to relate further, of what Nation hee was, or of what Family, hath ſcarcely (as yet) bene diſcouered by any. In briefe, mooued in great pietie, and by the example of his King; hee bought a place, which vſually was called in Latine, Locum Termarum Caſaris, that is to ſay, The place of Caſars Bathes: And it is ſayd, that Julian, Nephew the Emperour Conſtantine, Gouernour of the Gauls, cauſed thoſe Bathes to be builded, and the Lodgings of Clany, which then were without the City of Paris, and as plaſes of pleaſure: according as we read in ſome Epiſtles, which Julian wrote to them of Antioche. The ſaide Julian was afterwards Emperour, ſinamed the Apoſtata by the Chriſtians. And then, ſuch as pretended to the Imperiall Crowne, termed themſelues Caſars: as now at this day, ſuch as are deſigned Emperours after him liuing, are called Kings of the Romaines.

In this place there is apparance, that there the Caſars Bathes were, as evidently may be diſcerned, by the channells of hewne ſtone, which were found in the yeare of our Lord God, one thouſand five hundred forty and foure, at the gate of Saint James, when Baſtions and Rampires were then made, to reſiſt the forces of Charles the ſixt, Emperour, who was entred into France with a mighty army. Which gutters or cōducts of water, were continued from the village of Arceuil (ſo named, in regarde of Arches builded of Bricke, as yet to this preſent are to be ſeene; or of the Latine compounded word Aqua ductio) and reaching into Paris. Thoſe conduct of water ſerued well for thoſe Bathes, and were needfull now to be renewed, to water the higher parts of the Vniuerſitie of Paris (which haue great neede thereof) if my maiſters the Eſchenins, would therein employ their paines.

As already hath bene ſayd, this place was builded to bathe or waſh the Romain

Emperours, Conſulls, Proconſulls, and ſuch like, and was bought by the ſaid Maſter Robert Sorbonne, in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand two hundred threeſcore and foure. If you deſire to know, to whom (as then) that place appertayned; I muſt therein confeſſe mine ignorance, although I haue made good ſearch in the euidences, belonging to that place of Sorbonne, & elſewhere (ſpecifying large rents & reuenues thereto belonging, yet much enlarged by the bounty of K. Lewis 9 King of France, and others, calling it only Sorbonne) and finding it appoynted, to maintain a certayne number of Doctōrs, who ſhould reade publickly in Diuinitie, and alſo of Batchellers to ſtudy, there to be lodged and maintained. Whereupon, from that time to this preſent, the Profeſſors, Batchellers, and other Students in this Colledge, did endeouore themſelues ſo induſtriouſly, and became ſo capable; as there is hardly any other Colledge throughout all Chriſtendome, wherein may be found men ſo ready and exact in Diuinitie, as they are that belong to this Sorbonne Colledge.

The Students in this Houſe, are not (as commonly elſewhere) young men, but wel ſtept in yeares; becauſe they haue read publickly, enſtruing the courſe of Philoſophie, which is perſormed in three yeares, in regard there are as many parts, which are Logicke, Phyſicke and Metaſphyſicke. And many times ſome ſuch are there, that haue made three courſes, which are nine yeares, and employed by them in publique Lectures; before they will adventure to ſtudy or reade publickly in Diuinitie; and therefore it is no matter of maruell, that there ſhould continually be ſuch ſingularly learned men in that Colledge.

The Doctōrs and Batchellers, ouer & beſide their being great Philoſophers, are likewiſe very ſkillfull in humane learning, and vnderſtand the tongues, Greeke, Latine and Hebrew, ſpeaking them (for the moſt part) eloquently. They are held in ſuch reputation, that (commonly) they deale in the greateſt difficulties, and in all Eccleſiaſtical occaſions, their aduice is wholly vſed; the Colledge being reputed as one of the beſt Bulwarks to the Romain Catholique Church, and ſo accounted through Chriſtendome.

CHAP. VI.

Very laborious are they in their disputations of the sacred Scriptures, resolute, and of great vnderstanding, and the generall disputes vsed in this Colledge, are on euery Friday after the Feasts of S. Peter & S. Paul, in the Moneth of Iune, vntill the Solemnity of the Feast of All-Saints, the answerer standing there from morning till evening, and bound to answer all the Batchellors Questions, which commonly are about two hundred in number, euery one keeping his ranke and place: nor is there any President, to support him that answereth, whereas all other faculties do not obferue any such order. It is reported, that this custome was introduced by a religious man, of the order of S. Francis, who (to make prooffe of his knowledge) kept open the Schoole all the whole day: and his fellowes, coueting after as much honour as hee had; continued the same course, so that whatsoever consisted in the will of the arguers and answerers, became conuerted into an inuioable loue.

Learned Doctors are as Assistants there, to the end they may iudge on the merit of men, and vnderstand withall, to whom the prime places for Licences are to be giuen. And thus you see, why all Doctors in the facultie of diuinity, which receiue their degrees in that place of Sorbonnes, are stiled by an Emphasis, Doctors of Sorbonne, or Sorbonnists, because that there are principall acts obserued, to approue the learning of any, that would aspire to haue the degree of a Doctor. And this place is particularly noted, as well for antiquity (hauing bene one of the appurtenances to the Pallace Imperiall, at such time as the Romanes were Lords of Gaule, as I declared in the beginning of this Chapter.) As also in regard of the famous men, renowned for their learning and knowledge, that liue (ordinarily) in a sacred society in that Colledge. In which respect, the most part of the best Cities in France, Bishoppicks and Collegiate Churches, resort thither, to make choyse of their Diuines, to provide them of Prebends, and other reuennues meete for such men.

That the Law of the Emperour Senerus, and that of Solon, for promoting any one to Office and Authority in the Common-wealth (being first informed, of a mans life & good manners) was much better then those of the Venetians, Florentines, Genewayes and Lucanes; examining after the time of their In-risdition is past.

He Emperour Senerus, the eighteenth, reigning in the yearre of Iesus Christ, 196. albeit that he was no Christian; yet (after the example of Christianity) wold ordinarily say: That it was great shame, to bee lesse careful of the life of a Governor, or one that exerciseth the place of iudgement; then the Christians were, in the quality of their Shepheards and Watchmen ouer their Flocks. For they obserued a kinde of Siquis, or a Bill fixed vpon Posts, wherein were set downe the names of such as aspired to any Ecclesiasticall dignity, and examined their liues and behaviour with strictest severity. In the very same manner, this good Emperour, when hee intended to provide any man for the gouernment of a Prouince, or place where iudgment was to be vsed, or whatsoever else appeared requisite: wold first set vp publike Placards, or Bills of inscription, in diuers places about the City, to the ende, that if any notorious vice were knowne, or criminall cause deseruing open detection, in such as were named in those publike Placards: it was lawfull for all men, to accuse or set downe their blemishes & incapacities, that no wicked or vnworthy person, might be aduanced to such degree of eminency. Thus euery one, and all in generall were permitted to accuse; but yet on penalty of life, if it should be proved to be scandall or calumination, and thereupon, an especial Law was ordained and enrouled expressely.

In my poore opinion, this Law seemeth much more honest and equall, then those

those now adays in vfe, with the Venetians, Florentines, Genewayes, and Lucanes, who after the time of a mans Office is expired, or, that the limitation of his gouernment ceaseeth: do then make enquiry, to cause him render an account of his administration, and then proceed against him according to his demerits. A wicked Magistrate, and publike Conculsionary or extortioner, by giuing a piece of bread to dogs barking at him, so to stop their mouths: may thus salue his thefts, and other depredations of his vile life.

It is much more expedient, to prevent a diseale, then to tarry till it come, & then to expulie it: notwithstanding, it is better late, then neuer, to the ende (at the least) that feare of search and syndication, may reaine Officers within compasse of their duty.

And yet the ordination of Solon (methinks) was farre better, whereby the liues of Officers was to be examined, both before and after their authority, as we reade in the lawes set downe by Demosibenes. For by examining the life and manners of such, as couet or seeke after degrees of Offices, Benefices, Knighthood, exemptions, immunities, gifts and rewards, if they appeare to bee foule or deformed: not only they may be reiected, but also directly (in iustice) punished, & rewards distributed to honest persons, according to the merit of euery man. And by an harmonious proportion, the pursell shold be giuen to the most faithfull; Armes to the most valiant; Iustice-degree to the vp-rightest; censure to the entrest; painfull traualle to the strongest and best able; Prelacy to the most learned and deuoutest. And yet neuerthelesse, carrying respect to Nobility, wealth, age, and the power of euery one, as also the quality of their charges and offices: for it were very ridiculous, to make a Iudge a Warriour, a Prelate a common Lawyer, or a Soldiour to manage cales of conscience.

Now for the better comprehension of our purpose in this Chapter, it is to be obserued, that Alexander Senerus neuer was a Christian: but a worthy man otherwise, and when he made that Edict. As being desirous to place good Magistrats, to be diuers in the Romaine Commonwealth vnder his Empire (finding it full of exacting Officers) in imitation of the Christians; euen (as it is saide) in the second time of the Primitive Church. And when (for any particular Church) any need appeared of a Bishoppe, a Priest, a Deacon, or some other Officers; the Christians (in those times) fixt vp their Placards, setting downe the name of him or them, that sought to haue such office and dignity: they did it to such ende, that if any vice were knowne in him or them; objection might bee made against the pretendant, so to debout him of his requisition and sute.

And questionlesse, great need there was, that this pollicy shold bee obserued among the Christians; for the Pagans & Idolaters then (being their capitall enemies) sought nothing more, then some subiect or argument, whereby to iniurie and calumniate the Pastors and Prelates among the Christians, onely to make the odious to the people. And they that were promoted vnto Ecclesiasticall Offices in those dayes, had no other stipend or reward, but only some collection of Corne and other matters, among the Christians of the Churches then, to make them garments, and maintaine them poorly enough, being provided of those places, & oftentimes their best assurance was most cruell martyrdome. And that which made men then desirous of Ecclesiasticall aduancements, was not (as now adays) to deriue thence large benefis & reuennues: for then, there were not any foundations ordained, neyther were any tenths leuiod for or from them. But the Pastours then, in a most sacred kinde of charity, coueted to entrust the ignorant, and confirme in faith, intimidate, affrighted and dispersed Christians, persecuted by the Romanes and other Princes, onely for the Christian faith, and to encourage them for suffering martyrdome, according as Eusebius (who liued in those times) hath written at large.

As for the estates of the Venetians, Genewayes, Lucanes, and others now exercised in Italy, they are not during life, as it is in France: wherein yet it is not much a misse, to haue information of them, vpon the expiration of their charges, to cause terror in their offices successors, for best carriage and behavior in their dutie, least a further inquisition come vpon them. In France, estates and offices are exercised, during during life of the party in possession: but yet with caution, that if he commit any vnbecoming acte, to bee instantly dismissed, and (oftentimes) death ensueth therevpon. But before any man may bee so advanced, the Statutes of France have enjoyned, that good information must be made, concerning the life and manners of the party to enjoy it; before such persons as his Maiesty, or other soueraigne Iudges shall appoint.

The Kings of Spaine, cause information of life and behauiour, of any that aime at degrees and offices, before they are admitted to them. And moreover, at every fiftie yeares end, sometime in more, and in lesse compasse of yeares very often; severall enquiries & informations are made, of all Officers in every Seigneury: as in all the Spaines, the Kingdomes of Naples, Sicily, Milaine, the lower Countreies of Germany, the County of Bourgogne, the Dutchy of Luxembourg, and other, & namely of the places where they exercise their Offices. And if the King do finde, that they misbehaved themselves; his Councell depose them, appointing other in their places, of whom (likewise) the life and conversation is well questioned. Sometimes they are put to death, but very rarely, and many times deposed, yet without note of infamy: only giuing them to vnderstand, that the King is not well contented with their service. Heere is also to be vnderstood, that information cometh not onely against Officers of Justice, as Aduocates, Procurators, Pregnotaries, Iudges soueraigne and subalterne: but likewise against Ecclesiasticks, and men of warre. By which means, every one is compelled to containe himselfe within compasse of duty; and beside, the estates & offices are not vendible.

CHAP. VII.

Of the reason and cause, why both some Princes, and also some Common-wealths, haue alwayes prosperously flourished in the times of warre; and in peacefull dayes haue runne to decay and ruine.

Although I discourse in this Chapter, that some Princes and Commonwealths haue bin very happy and successful, in times of wars and molestation; and contrariwise, in times of peace haue become vicious, running on to ruine and defolation: yet I neither will, or do thereby inferre, that warre is to bee esteemed more necessary then peace. But I will shew the causes whereby (not all Common-wealths, nor all Princes in generall) yet many liued more vertuously & happily in the times of war, then in their easier dayes of peace. And that so soone as they came to enjoy peace; they fell into ruine, vtterly losing all their greatnesse & splendour. Euen like vnto Iron, which not being vsed or handled, or whereof no frequent employment is made; rusteth and consumeth of it selfe. And this ensued by no other occasion, but only through negligence and want of respect, that when they enjoyed the Sunny daies of peace, no discrete order was taken, for institution of good life and policie, and how to make vie (as men ought to doe) of such sweet tranquillity.

Before I come to approue my sayings by examples, I would first make a briefe relation, concerning the actions of men of warre; to demonstrate, that it is (almost) vtterly incredible, that any goodnesse can deriue it selfe from war. For, who is a greater enemy to the peacefull man, then the furious Soldiour? To the milde, meeke countiman, then the bloody Warriour? To the Philosopher, then the fierce Captaine? To the wife, then fool? Because the greatest delight and felicity of warriors, is, to forradge Countreies, rob the husbandmen, burne Townes and Villages, to massacre good men, to giue all licence to the wicked, to besiege, batter, force and ransacke houses, to kill olde and young, to spare no age or sexe, to rauish Wiues and Virgins, to bathe their hands brutishly in innocent blood, to make a spoile of sacred things, to ruinate Temples, to blaspheme the Name of God, to trample (vnder their foule feete) all right both diuine and humane. These are the fruites of warre, highly acceptable and pleasing to fiery-eye Soldiours, abhominable to good men, & detestable before God. Needlesse is it to amplye with words, that which hath bin too well seene and felt in ouer-many places, whose very memory hath startled the foules of them in best safety, and made their haire stand on ende, that thought themselves of boldest resolution.

If then the case stand thus, and that war hath so many discommodities and mischiefs waiting vpon it: how can any good ensue from it?

Further wee are to vnderstand, that when Soldiours are guided by Captaines voide of iudgement, vnderstanding and vertue: all the forenamed euils and mischiefs are ordinarily committed. But if they haue a vertuous Commander, hee will carry himselfe so much the more modestly. And like as greatnesse of courage & magnanimity, is a bright flaming Beacon, leading the way to all other vertues, and exalseth Princes vnto the very highest point of honor: euen so it is vertue (onely) likewise, that most discourageth the hearts of enemies, be they neuer so potent or powerfull warriors, and (oftentimes) gaineth the victory, without a blow deliuered on either side.

Heereof I intend to set downe some examples, that in the Roman Common-wealth, and in the times of their warre there was greater store of vertuous minded men, then when they liued in peace and quietnesse. First let vs remember Furius Camillus, who hauing sent backe the children, which the Schoole-Master had brought into his Campe, to make them bondslaves to the Romanes; conquered the City without one blow smitten, which neuertheless was very strong, and well furnished with all warlike munition.

And Fabritius, hauing sent the Phylition to king Pyrrhus, that had promised to poison him, and refused the moiety of his Kingdomes: although he was one of the very poorest Romane Gentlemen, and caused the prisoners ranfome to be paid, which Pyrrhus had freely deliuered, not suffering the meaneest of them to stand beholding to so great a King. And Scipio, who (without any paine) conquered a great part of both the Spaines: by sending a lady of rare beauty to her husband, the Prince of Celiberia, according to the example of Cygnus. These so generous and vertuous actions, tooke away all courage from enemies, to make war any longer against such magnanimous people; who neither could conquer, nor yet be conquered, by base or vnbecoming behaviour.

And yet this was much better made knowne, after the great day at Cannas, when Hanniball had put eight thousand prisoners to their ranfome, at an hundred Crownes each man, and one bearing credite for another: hoping vndoubtedly, that the Romanes hauing lost so many men, would not be slacke in paying their ranfome. But it was flatly forbidden (by the Senates especiall decree) that not one prisoner of them all should be redeemed. Whereat Hanniball (saith Polybius) was so amazed, as all his courage quite forsooke him. Whereas on the contrary, the Romanes secured their state the better, which was shrewdly shaken, and vtterly abandoned (as it were) of all friends and confederates. For the iudgement of the Senate was wise and honourable, because Hanniball, hauing so much Romane blood to spill at his pleasure, thought to empty their Treasury of moneys, and draw eight hundred thousand Crownes from them, which they rather chose to spare, than to redeeme the very scum and cowards of all the Roman Army. Wherevpon, and thence forward, every one took a resolution to conquer or dye. So became dreadfull and inuincible. And like as their hearts neuer failed them in their greatest losses; so were they neuer conquered by arrogancy in their victories. And therefore, in the time of war, the Romanes more expressed their greatnesse in courage, then in peace they could do.

Charles the eight of that name, King of France, in the voyage which hee made into Italy, to conquer the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicily, they belonging to him, as he pretended: at the surprisall of a City, a very goodly Lady was brought vnto him, whom he would not touch; but sent her away (and great gifts with her) to her husband. By this acte of chastity he sped so well, that most part of the Townes and Cities as he passed along, brought their keyes vnto him, and conquered (the more easily) the Kingdomes hee laide claime to. And yet neuertheless, this King had Ladies (sometimes) at command in his owne Court, albeit very secretly.

So long as Caius Marius followed war, he performed many braue and vertuous exploits therein, largely encreasing (with great great Prouinces) his Country and Common-wealth of Rome. As hauing conquered Iugurthe, King of the Numidians, and made an absolute surrender of his Kingdome to Rome: hee likewise vanquished the Cymbrians in Gaulle, and the Germanes that were entred into Italy, and seauen times was he made Consull, euen in iust regard of his great deferuings. But when he ceased from being a Warriour, adding himselfe to idlenesse, and desiring to liue in peace: aspiring by his ambition to tyranny, he caused about tenne thousand Cittizens to dye wretchedly, & ended his owne life in miserable exile. And the very same did Sylla, who was esteemed one of the most fortunate men in his time; who in a ranged battaile, ouerthrew Mithridates neere to Charonea; and his Lieutenant at another time after, not farre from Athens. He vanquished also the Medes, and the Dardaniens or Troyans; he put Carbo to flight, & droue him quite out of Italy; winning the battaile likewise against Marius; and so long as he followed the warres, liued most nobly and virtuously. But being returned home to his house, and liuing therein peace, hee became a tyrant and butcher of the Cittizens; so that (in one day) he commanded nine thousand of them to be slaine, promising a certaine stipend or wages, to any one that brought him a Romane Cittizens head.

While Pompey managed Armes, and was a braue Commander in Armies; hee was esteemed the most vertuous man the liuing. For he restored the Kingdome of Numidia to Masiniissa, which Hiarbas had vliurped from him. He vanquished Sertorius, King of Portugall, ending also the most dangerous warre of the Pyrats, and ouercame Mithridates, King of Pontus, contraining him to slay himselfe. He warred in the Northerne parts, conquered Albania, Morea, the Henioches, Cappia, Hiberia, and afterwards (in the East) surmounte the Partians, Arabians, and subiected Iudea beside. But afterward, the Romane people hauing no longer warre, and he returning home to his abiding; grew enuious against his kinsman Cesar, and as by the precedent warres, the Romane Empire had attained vnto vnspcakable greatnesse: so by peace it impayred too much, onely through ciuill warre, engen-dred among themselves. In which respect, many people and Kings shooke off the yoke, wherein they stood tributaries to the Romanes, and so their Empire (by little and little came to decadence.

Great Alexander, so long as hee continued warre in the East, hee was accounted most valiant and temperate. And hauing vanquished Darius, finding none other to resist against him, he grew to such insolence; that he would be often drunk, & made himselfe so contemptible, as he became despised of his owne people, his friends and kindred, who caused him to dye by poison, hauing scarcely attained to the age of thirty years.

So long as the Lacedemonians had braue warlike Kings and Captaines; and found them employment in warres, eyther, whether it were for defence of their owne Country, or for conquering others, such men as were Agessilaus, Agas, Archidamus, Brasidas, Damonidas, Euricratidas, Temistocles, Callicratides, and more such like beside; they daily prospered in all attempts they vndertooke. But so soone as they had conquered the Athenians, & pillaged and polled their City vnder Lysander, and had filled their purses with money, making no more account or care of war: the sweet ease and goodnesse of the time then seized on them, & condemning both exercise and military discipline, they became quickly ruined. For, from all former times of antiquity, they commonly employed painfull diligence, rather by stratagems and pollicies of warre to conquer their enemies, then by power: which was more commended in Archidamus, then any other vertue elfe. They alwayes shunned peace, not as disallowing it to be good; but because it continually enticed them to too many vices. For the Lacedemonian Lawes ordained, that men might walke through the City in the night time without light; because a Soldiour, most often being in war, might (by all meanes) march against his enemy, and at all houres as occasion presented it selfe, eyther by day or night. Patient also they were in all externall injuries, as raines, windes, heats, frosts, mysts, and in greatest hungers; being euermore constantly resolu'd, eyther to conquer, or dye in the field. Which extremities, could not be exercised by slothfull people, or liuing in peace.

Idlenesse and negligence was the ruine of Great Alexander.

Through sloth and idlenesse, the Lacedemonians venterly ouerthrew themselves.

* A Nobles of Sparta, son to Teles, that would adventure any danger whosoever for his Countreys safety.

The

The Grecian Philosophers banished out of Rome, and the reason why.

A poet banished out of Lacedemon for writing against warre.

The gods of the Lacedemonians were painted armed, and those of the Grecians effeminately.

The French nation entred into long continued feilds, vnto the peace.

The Romans, in those times, when they were not corrupted with forces of forren Nations, banished all the Grecian Philosophers, and would not admit any knowledge of letters among them, but for their vice: and no lesse hated they the professors of questionary sciences, then their books. They would not practise or learne any thing, but to know how they might best bee obedient to Magistrates, and endure the hardest trauels in batels, to liue or die. A Thesalian being demanded, who were the worst conditioned people in his countrey answered; Such as had withdrawn themselves from Military labour and discipline.

A poet, named Archilochus, being come to dwell in Lacedemon, was banished presently thence, being knowne to haue written: That it was much better to forsake the Target and Armes, then to die in warre. Among the Lacedemonians, it was an especial obseruation, to figure all the Images of their gods and goddesses armed, holding lances in their hands, as signifying themselves to be warriors: Because they reputed nothing to be more vile & infamous, then idlenesse and vnarmed peace, being no way so goodly in apparence, as Military vertue: and therefore they paynted their gods in such forme, as themselves alwayes wished to be. Contrariwise, the Grecians Theology instructed them; to figure their gods, idle, peaceable, and lying all along. And it seemed, that the Lacedemonians had good reason so to do, because they imagined, that all our actions should be conformable to those of the gods: for, in painting the shapes of the gods effeminately, and so to follow them in like qualities, is to be pernicious, and vnprofitable to the Common-wealth.

So soone as Henry, second of that name king of France, had contracted peace with the Emperor, the Kings of Spain and England, with all the princes of Italy, and with the countreys of high and lower Germany, they all being enemies to him: he was very shortly after slaine in a iousting, with a spield of a lance, entering in at the fight of his Beauer. All the great Captaines of France esteemed vertuous among all other Nations, in times of peace, fell to killing one another, keeping neither faith nor promise, but proditoriously massacring their very best friends: feining assemblies about the State affaires: some vnder colour of marriages; others, by pretended feasts and banquets, proceeding on so far in this wicked course, till they killed their king, yea & sought to murder his successor. In brief, they leagued themselves daily one against another, and some against the State, growing into such factions and treacherous coniurations, that the French were thought to be a most barbarous kind of people. All which had hapned, but thorough discontinuing exercise of Armes against ancient enemies, and calling them in, to depoyse them of their goods. Like as the ancient Gauls formerly did, who in mere enuy one to another, and hauing given ouer the exercise of Armes, one part called in the Romaines, and another the Almaines or Germanes, who were their vtter ruine in the end. And so they became tributaries, who were wont to bee the onely terror of the Romaines, Grecians, Spaniards, yea; and likewise of the Germanes.

Seeing then it cometh so to passe, that some Princes, and likewise some Common-wealths (as appeared by our passed Discourse) attained to much honor, and order their affaires better in their storms of warre, then in the calmer seasons of peace: and because it is not possible that warres should continually endure, but Peace must, and will haue some time of sway and dominion: Let vs now see, if there be not as good meanes of vertuous containment, as well in the dayes of peace as of warre; doubtlesse it may be done more commodiously, and the waies of compassing it I will briefly declare.

First of all, when there is no more occasion, for employing men of warre in a Kingdome or Common-wealth: a duce is to be had, what Princes, friends or confederates of strangers, haue any need of men of such martiall qualitie, and thither to send them in their assistance, with charge of returning from thence agayne, when they shall bee commoned thereto. Not onely shall the State or Common-wealth be thus disburthened of paying such wages: but also of such scelerates, as ordinarily doe follow men of warre, the more safely to commit their thefts and villanies, without checke, law, or punishment.

In like manner did Charles the fifth of that name, and King of France, who hauing taken truce with the English, Namarrians, and Brittaines, being entreated by Henry of Castile, the Bastard, who made warre vpon his legitimate brother for the kingdom. For Pope Vrbane had conferred the Crowne vpon him, in regard that Don Peter, king of Castile, had intelligence and confederacy with the King of Granado, who was of the Mahometane Religion. Morcouer, he was a tyrant, doing many things vnbecoming the name or credit of a Christian King. Charles sent him succour of souldiers, vnder conduict of the Constable Bertrand du Guesclin, who (by that voyage) purged France of an infinite number of Theues, the greater part whereof were flaine in that warre. The like did Lewes the eleuenth, who, hauing peace with all his enemies, sent all his souldiers (that rauaged strangely in his kingdom) to the Earle of Richmond, who passed them ouer with him into England, because he laid claime to the kingdome. By this meanes, hee ridde his realme of rascality, and had some reuenge also vpon his ancient enemies.

Augustus Cesar, hauing overcome his Competitor Mark Anthony, and hauing no further employment for war was not so improuident or indiscreete, as to suffer his souldiers lye idle and negligently: but sent forty Legions into remote Prouin-ces, and to the frontiers of barbarous nations, still to support their militarie discipline, and to keepe all occasions of ciuill war, so farre off as might bee. But Great Constantine the Emperour, following the counsell of diuers Bythops and Priestes, who were slenderly experienced in State affaires: threw off his Legionaries and men of warre, which was the cause, that ancient Militarie Discipline became quite lost, and opened a gate to such enemies, as (afterward) invaded the Romane Empire on all sides. For they vnderstood not,
that Lawe, iustice, and the whole State (next vnder God) are in the protection of Armes, as vnder a soueraign & safe buck-ler of defence.

Yet there is one point more, very considerable, to shew, that Militarie Discipline ought to be maintained, and warre made, vpon good and iust occasions; for there hath alwayes bene (and neuer shall we bee without) some theues, murtherers, idle loyterers, vagabonds, murmurs, and stordy vagrants, which (in any Common-wealth) do hurt and spoyle the honest simplicitie of good subiects, & notwithstanding the verie best Iustice that may be vied, yet can no country bee intirely clenfed of such Cankers. The best helpe (in this case) is warre, to send such vnnecessary members farre off from home-abidings, wherefoeuer any fitting employment happeneth. Because it serueth as a purgatiue medicine, very cordiall and conuenient, for expelling such corrupted humours, out of the Commonwealths vniuersall body. Furthermore, in times of peace, and for better enioying the benefit thereof; no tolleracion is any way to bee suffered, of such as haue not trade or vocation; for idleness and neglicence, cause too many euils in any kingdome. By this discourse then may bee obserued those reasons, why many Princes & Commonweales florished in times of war, & fell to ruine in the daies of peace;

the best meanes also in both of them hath briefly bin deliuered.

Some Flatterers cannot be sufficiently blamed, that perswade Kings and great Monarks, to builde sumptuous houses and Palaces, therby to make their names immortal, contrary to the iudgment of Count Balthazar, the Castilian, in his booke of the Courtier, who (in mine opinion) hath highly erred, to write and approoue such a vanitie.
For the end of all vertuous actions (according to the saying of Cicero, in the 3. booke of his Tuſculanes) is honour, glory, and good renown; not a dumb building, which is copo-sed of the sweat blood, and means of poor people. Palaces canot moue out of the places their names may be engrauen vpon some are often frustrated of theyr hope and in-

Moreouer, if it be well pondered and considered, the sayrest buylding is but a matter of frailtie, and subiect to no long continuance: for, when men cease from dwelling there, they runne in poasting speede to ruine and decay. And Princes are the occasion hereof: Resembling steritie euerslastingly, shee should erect some goodly Pallace; whereto shee yel-ded, after a long time of sollicitation. She had not sene the fourth part of the building out of the ground, but shee began to repent her selfe, saying: Shee knew well enough, that it was mere vanity, to hope for immortalizing by buildings, stayle, & subiect to ruine in a short time, and so left off, from proceeding any further in so friuolous a businesse.

The sayd Lady had houses of pleasure abroad, passably fayre and commodious:
but in Paris shee had not a dwelling, her children being come to age. The Louure, a royall habitation, was not sufficient to reciue her and her traine: wherefore, seeing that the Court (in those times) kept ordinarily at Paris: shee builded an other of indifferent cost, in the place where was founded the order and religion of Marie

Magdalen, for sinfull women and maides, conuerted to repentance, and transported the religious women thence, vnto the Abbey of Saint Mary Magdalen, being much more commodious for them. Reprouching the counsell formerly giuen to her, she would vtiually say: That money might be better employed, in redeeming the Crowne lands, paying of debts, easing the people oppressed with grie-uous taxation; then to bee wasted in such vaine manner, which wordes right well became so great a Princeesse as shee was.

Oftentimes she commended the good Emperour Vespasian, who neuer builded any Pallace, but contented himselfe with such as were erected by his predecessours: yet did hee re-edifie diuerse and sundry ruined Temples and Theaters, and gaue very bounteously to Hospitalls.
As the like did the Emperour Domitian, who was well satisfied with a small dwelling: and yet builded hee the Capitole, which was greatly decayed by age, and a Temple of his owne, dedicated vnto Iupiter.

The sacred Scriptures tell vs, that the magnificence and ouer great sumptuous-nesse of Salomon, in building his pallaces and houses, were the cause, that tenne Tribes of Israel did separte themselves from obedience to his heyre Rehoboam, and reigned only but ouer two. I will not speake here of the Temples building, for his father left him all the stuffe and the meanes, as needed for the erection of so holy a Temple. But the immeasurable ex-pences layde out on his Pallace, for fur-nishment whereof, the people themselves so pressed after his deceasse: that they were constrayned to seeke another King, then his Sonne Rehoboam, who would continue the prodigall expences of his father in building, and so (of twelue parts) he lost ten in his kingdom.

It is right well knowne, by the Text of the Iewish Chronicles, that King Salomon abused the Graces and Blessings both of Almighty God and men: for, it was not sufficient for him, to make walls in his pallace of the very goodliest stones, the best polished, and most plendant in all the world; but he would needs illumine them also with exquisite colors, couering them besides with maffie golde, as making lesse account of silver, then hee did of leade or yron. The like is to be understood of the planchers and floors, all made of curious and strange woods, the very worst being of Cedar and Cedrin, without corruption, and smelling most sweetly, resembling in color, the beames of the Sun, being so ingeniously handled in the working, that they appeared like most curious shapes and figures, as no men in the world were able to imuent, or counterfeit the like. And yet neuertheless, hee covered those costly woods with plates of gold, enshathed with infinite precious stones: so that the very floors seemed to be second starry Heavens; whereby may easily be presupposed, what the other parts of his Pallace were.

Moreover, Salomon did not onely build one Pallace in Ierusalem, but many more beside in diuers places, euen as rich, or rather more costly then the other. As that which hee erected for his Summers recreation, in the Wood of Lybanus, abounding in all variety of vanities. In two Halls he placed five hundred Shields or Targets, of immeasurable greatness, and all of massiue gold, each Target valuing (at the least) two thousand and foure hundred Crownes, as Empolemus hath recorded. The said Bucklers or Targets were beaten with the hammer, and engrauen with rare and costly branched workes. He builded another Pallace in Gazer, more sumptuous then the two former were: which was quickly ruined after his death, and at this day the places are not knowne where those Pallaces stood. For the building of these, hee traualled and molested his people, who reuolted from him, losing thereby his heyre and sicciflour, and (well neere) all his Kingdom; his Reigne (beside) being full of many warres and other miseries. Behold what goodly benefit redounded to him, by erecting such ouer-sumptuous buildings: for, the Egyptian people destroyed and pilled his Pallace before his eyes.

Tranquillus declareth, that Nero Claudius Cæsar, the sixt Romane Emperour, was so ambitious; that he desired to make his name immortall, by the meanes of buildings, which he intended to erect, and valued the price of his life, whereof I purpose to sette downe a brieue description.

First, he would haue had all Rome to be pulde downe, and then to be built againe at the Citizens charges: saying, that the streets were not strait nor large enough. Heereupon, diuers leud persons (by him suborned) fied the City in sundry places: hee intending afterward to haue it beare his name, and to be called Neropolis; which partly was put in execution, albeit the eight part could hardly be burned, and because many houses were built all of stone; with engines he caused them to be destroyed. And as he persecuted thus in ruining the houses, certaine conspiracies (intended against him) chanced to be discouered to him; which made him leaue off, and proceed therein no further. Cornelius Tacitus writeth, that hee caused a false fame to be noyed in Rome, throwing scandalous aspersions vpon the Christians, as if that they had fired the city. And great likelihood there was, that this imposture should proceed from him, and to be imposed on the Christians: because he was a vowed enemy to all vertuous, holy and well affected people. In which respect, so many Christians as hee could apprehend, were bathed and anointed on their naked bodies, with grease and pitch, and then tyed to pillars, and fire put vnto them; so they seemed as flaming Linkes or Torches, for passengers and night-walkers through the Citie.

For continuance of his names immortalizing, and onely by such buildings he intended; I meane to describe one, another manner of thing, then those which Salomon caused to be erected, what store of gold souer he bestowed vpon them: whereof let the Reader be Iudge, for what is heere inserted, I haue traduced out of the faide Tranquillus, who both saw that Nero, and his Pallace, and auoucheth, that Nero neuer did more harmes in all his actions, then in his buildings. He erected a house, extending from his Pallace so farre as Mount Esquiline, which hee named, The House of Gold: and being almost finished, it was wholly destroyed with thunder and lightning fallings from Heauen, and yet neuertheless, hee builded it againe. It was so spacious, that it had a place for him to walke in, which was a Gallery at the very entrance, containing a thousand paces in length, hauing three ranks of Marble pillars, all made with Arches, most proudly glittering with goodly colors, hauing infinite fabulous Histories, and Poeticall figures. In that place also was a Colossus, of an hundred and twenty foote in height, formed after his owne effigie and resemblance. There was likewise a Poole or Pond, seeming as if it had bene an huge spacious Sea: on the Bankes wherof (all round about) were stately houses builded, so that it appeared to be a faire great City.

Within the compasse of this building, were careable grounds, Vineyards, Pasturages, Medowes and Forrests, with multitudes of diuers kinds of Beaste, as well wilde as tame, enclosed within high walles, in the manner of a Parke, and formed with very artificioall cunning. All other parts of this Pallace, were richly gilded, thickly powdered with precious stones, and mother of Pearle, the floors of the Halls for Dinners and Suppers, were all in-layed with Iuory, and curious wrought plates of fine gold; so subtilly turning each against other, that flowers and sweete waters descending from the Roofe, by conuoyes of arteificioall conueinance, fell on them sitting at the Table, & after were receiued into the floors. Among all the Halls for banquetting, there was one entirely round, which (by inimitable arte) was so composed, that it turned round night and day, like vnto the world.

Ouer and beside all these, hee caused a Fifth-Pond to be made, from Misena, so farre as the Lake Auernas, all engirt with Galleries: where the warme waters of the gulfes Baia fell into it. Beside, he had a trench or ditch made, reaching from Auernas to Ofilia, for Boates to floate on, containing foure score French miles in length, and of such widenesse, that two great Gallies, with five ranks of Oares might passe on front. Because if one should mount one way, and the other come againe to meet it: they might freely passe without danger of touching one another.

Nor could these Fifth-Ponds, Lakes, Ditches, and other deuices serue the turn; but hee must also haue an artificioall Sea made, which he caused to come from very farre off, cutting through Mountraines, Rocks, pulling downe Forrests, and such like: so that it seemed a worke of no mortall power, but as if it were done by God himselfe. To perfect this mighty labour, he gaue command; that so many prisoners as could be found, were it for criminal causes, debts, or any case else whatsoever throughout the whole Romane Empire (which contained then almost all our Hemisphere) should be brought to Rome, and there to be employed in this seruice.

And because these mighty workes could not be effected without inestimable expences; he imposed on the City of Rome (without exempting people of any quality) great and extraordinary subsidies, and vpon the whole Lands of the Empire, wherein the Gaulles (among other Provinces) felt no meane affliction, although they were (well neere) quite ruined by the precedent warres, so that they were constrained to reuolt from his obedience. The like did Spain, and great store of the Provinces in Asia and Africa, and (in the end) all Italy. Heereupon, he sent out strickt prohibitions, that no Officer of the Empire should be paid his wages, no, nor the Bishops & Priests, who were paid by the hands of the publicke Receiuers; neither could the Legions haue their pay, which caused great hauck in the Provinces whether they were sent. For he employed all his monyes, about those admirable Workes and Buildings, and yet could not prouide sufficient for that purpose.

In regard whereof, the Senate and whole body of the people, being no longer able to support those prodigall expences; conspired against him. Which coming to his knowledge, & he perceiving approaching danger (being forsaken of all his owne followers) fled out of the City, to a Country Farme belonging to one of his Libertines; where, by the help of one of his friends, he had his throat cut; for he was such a cowardly slaue, that he durst not do it himselfe.

Such was the defuered and miserable end of this Emperour, which happened to him, by employing his reuenues, and the goodes of his Subjects so prodigally, in erecting proude buildings, and to no profice.

Neroes' Palace was more sumptuous than all them of Salomon.

This one worke of his, was three or foure times more costly, and of greater admiration, then eyther the Temple, or all the Pallaces of Salem, King of Israel. Of which (as also of Neroes) not anie kinde of noate or memory remayneth to be seene, and the places are not knowne where they stood. And although men commune and speake of Neroes in these our dayes, it is not in regarde of his sumptuous buildings, whereby hee thought to immortalize his name: but for his abominable whooredomes, parricides, and infamous life, which hee ledde so long as hee liued. Whereof, at this time, I desire not to make anie more mention: for so many Historians haue written thereof, and especially Tranquillus (Authour of all that hitherto hath bene spoken) as I must send them to his Volumes, which are desirous to reade any more of his life and actions.

CHAP. IX.

Who was the first, amongst all other Monarches and Princes, that commaunded, to present by writing, whatsoeuer was to be negotiated with him.

Very man of iudgement wel may thinke, that a Prince, who hath manie Prouinces vnder his charge, and giueth command to diuers people; must needs be much hindered, from answering all such as are to negotiate with him. And it would be a matter vterly impossible for him to satisfie all suites and demands made vnto him: if hee were not eased by some especiall persons, of good vnderstanding in the State affaires, as a Chancellor, Secretary, and some such other beside. In like maner, that which giueth him greatest contentment, is, when men make their suites to him by writing, as in these dayes is discretely vsed: which was well inuented (and to good purpose) by the Emperor Tiberius, who commaunded it to be so done, for any matter whatsoever, and likewise deliuered his answers by writing. The reason was, to the end that nothing might escape, till it had bene considered on so well as possibly might be: For, by ouer much talking, and communicating himselfe too often, a Prince may commit diuers errors, which will cause him to be misprised, or meanely esteemed. And it neuer ought to be (as an auncient Greeke said) That a Prince should speake any otherwise before the people, then as if he were in a stately Tragedy.

A great trouble to any Prince, to answer many suites made vnto him by word or mouth

The Emperor Tiberius, the giuing of petitions was first dustified by him

But some may obiekt vnto mee, That this is not the true state of a Prince; for, in doing iustice to his people, hee should heare their complaints and grieuances, vnderstanding from each mans mouth, the vrgent occasions constraining them thereunto, which are ordinarily suppressed, or else disguised by others manning.

I am not of the minde, to haue him so conceale himselfe, that hee should not be seene but very feldome, or neuer. As now-adayes the Kings in the East Indias vse to doe, and especially the King of Barney, who neuer speaketh, but onely to his wife and childre. When hee is to speake to other, hee doth it by a Gentleman, through a place made of purpose, where he can not be seene, but hath the wordes conueyed from the Gentlemans mouth to his eare, throw the hollow passage of a Truncke: as hee did vnto the Ambassadour of the King Catholique, and as wee reade in the Histories of the Indies.

But although he shew himselfe very little, as standing vpon his greatnesse and maiestie; regarde is yet to be had to his quality and power. For, it is not seemely, that a petty Prince should counterfeite the great Kings of Aethiopia, Iot Tartaria, Perfia and Turkie, who (indeed) will not haue their subiects to looke directly vpon them: because, they are got so much redoubted for power, as they are for maiestie, as they expresse sufficiently, when they will be seene of their Subiects. And if some say, that the Princes of the East and South should gouerne in that maner, and not they of the West and North: I holde it to be all one in the maine regard. For, it is knowne well enough, that the Kings of England, Sweden, Denmarke and Poland, do containe farre more greatnesse towards their Subiects, then the King of

An obiection in this case alledged, and to good purpose

The Kings in the East Indias are daunted of their fight and audiance.

Kings more dreaded for maiestie then power.

Discreetness in the maiesty of princes to their Subiects

Good and substantiall reasons, why princes should negotiate with writing, rather then confer in person with their subiects.

Demetrius made a scorn of his subiects suites.

Plut in vit. Demetrius.

Bold affrontings receiued by Princes, only through speaking with their people.

France, and the King of Mosconia, much more then all the rest: and yet perhaps they are not lesse, but (it may bee) better obeyed.

Now let vs returne againe to our purpose, of conferring with a Prince by petition or writing, whereby many commodities ensue vnto him. For first (as hath already bene said) he vseth no communication by that meanes, nor shewes himselfe too familiar with his people, which containeth him still in the farre greater esteeme.

Another reason is, that either if he will not, or cannot grant the demands moued vnto him: if he make refusal, he can receive no shame or disgrace thereby; considering, that the written paper will not blush.

Moreouer, answer is returned with the more assured iudgment, by the time allowed to set downe the Princes Will; which cannot be so well done, speaking with him face to face. For oftentimes, he may be incited to anger, by mouing the matter disorderly, or else vpon some other occasion, whereby he may answer farre from his owne minde. Or els it may happen in some intemperate time; for all Princes are not alike in diet, & then, gifts so immente, and of such importance may be granted, as the whole State shall fare the worse for it.

All which approueth not, that hee should despise to answer requests, being made to him by his people: least it happen to him, as it did to Demetrius, who quarrelled the kingdome of Epyre against Pyrrhus. Hee hauing receiued a great number of petitions, kept them all in the lap of his cloake; and, passing ouer the bridge of a Riuer, he let them all fall downe into the water, according as wee reade in Plutarch. Whereupon, his subiects seeing themselves so contemned, conceiued capitall hatred against him: & (soone after) he was forsaken of his Army, who yeeled themselves & the kingdome to Pyrrhus, and so he won it without fighting.

It hath bene obserued also, that princes, listening verbally to the suites and requests of their subiects, haue mette with bold and insolent confronters. As the woman, who was put off day by day by Phillip, King of Macedon, in some matter of expedition which she required of him, whereupon she sayd: If thou neither wilt, nor canst do iustice: depose thy selfe, and another will giue it me: faulcely seeming (by this meanes) to taxe the King with neglect and carelesnesse. The very like words vsed Joane de Pierre bastiere, a Ladie of Chamberiers, to King Charles the ninth, he being in the City of Bordeaux, where she demanded iustice of him against the murderer of her husband.

A certaine Rouer of the Sea was taken, who was reported, to bee the most cruell and detestable Pyrat, that euer was heard of. Alexander the Great, woulde needs see him and speake with him, to the end hee might the sooner condemne him. Wherefore he demanded of him: whence it proceeded, that he would be a Pyrate, and leade such an infamous kind of life; hauing meanes to provide for himselfe otherwise: As to be in pay with some Warlike Nauy, where hee might receiue good respect; considering, that hee was strong, stout, and a good Soldier, as it had appeared by his passed course of life? With a bold and vndanted countenance, the Rouer returned him this answer. I am sayd to be a pirate and Rouer on the Sea, because I sayle with a small Vessel, without any other Followers: and when I meete with another, being weaker then my selfe; then I make some appropriation of him. But thou, that makest thy Navigations, with great multitudes of Gallies, and other Shippes of Warre, robbing and ransacking all Maritime Townes and places, yea, and vpon the firme land likewise: Thou must be called an Emperour and a Monarch. Full well knew Alexander by the Pyrates answer, that his behaviour differed verie little from the others, and that hee deferred as well to bee punished as hee: and therefore, being ashamed of so fowle a detection, hee freely pardoned him.

Frances, Duke of Anion, and a sonne of France, not long since deceased, being desirous to settle himselfe, and to match with some Queene or Princesse that was an heire: made meanes of marriage vnto Elizabeth Queene of England, letters passing betwene them to that purpose, and their pictures. In the end, the Queen sent him word, that she would neuer contract with any that sought her, except shee might might fee his perfon, otherwise there needed no further fpeech. The Prince, being perfuaded by yong heads (as liſe aduiled in ſuch a buſineſſe, as himſelfe) and leauing the counſell of more graue experience; went into England to bee ſeene, and with a very ſlender train. But being well obſerued by that Lady, he was found ſo deformed by the ſmall pockes, which had leſt ſuch a deep driuing into his face, his noſe alſo much miſhapen, and ſome kernels riſing in his necke beſide; as might bee the cauſes of looſing the fauour of ſo fayre a Queene. Some were of opinion, that hee ſhould not haue gone, but to haue continued the treatie of Marriage ſtill by Letters; which peraduenture (at length) would haue wonne him grace and fauour.

The Arch-
duke of Auſtria, & Henry Prince of Sweden much better aduiled

More wiſely dealt the Arch-duke of Auſtria, and Prince Henry, afterwards King of Sweden, who made ſuite alſo to the layde Queene to eſpouſe her, but at ſundry times, and were ſent for likewiſe to bee ſeene. But they ſatiſfied themſelues to treat with the Queene by thei Letters, and nor verbally: for, by this means, they were aſſured that ſhe could not cauſe them to bluſh.

The Authors

I conclude then, that this inuention of Tyberius, was, and is very conuenient for great Monarches and Soueraigne Princes, not to negotiate by words with their Subiects; but to expedite by Writings, becauſe thereby they ſhall ſo much the ſooner diſpatch, and a great deale more equally.

Moreouer, if Princes or Princeſſes, haue any matters betwene them to diſintangle; to performe the ſame by Letters and Deputies ſent from either ſide: for by enter-view and ſpeaking together, liſe good can enſue, at leaſt verie ſildom.

CHAP. X.

Of ſuch qualities and carriage, as (neceſſarily) is required to be in a Prince.

Such as couet to command ouer any one whole Nation, ſhould firſt propounde two things to himſelfe: one is, to be liberal; the other is, to be clement and gentle. For the Prince, which exerciſeth liberality, ſhall make his enemies to become his friends; thoſe of all other places to be his owne; and of diſloyall, faithfull ſeruantes. Hee muſt bee affable to ſtrangers, chiefly ſuch as dwell in the furtheſt parts of his Land: And as a Prince endued with clemencie, is admired of all men, and honoured as a God: So by theſe two Vertues, Liberality and Clemencie, hee is made like vnto God; becauſe his Office is, to doe good vnto all, and to pardon ſuch as are delinquents.

I confeſſe it to bee true, that a Prince ought not (alwayes) to be facile and benigne to his ſubiectes: but that (with his facility and mildeneſſe) he may commixe a grauity and ſeuerity, ſuch as may be termed a kinde of rigour, at ſuch times as neede requirerh; to cauſe feare and terror in bad liuers, and to puniſh them rigorouſly, if neceſſity enforce it, for the prevention of a greater euill. Otherwiſe, the Prince may bee the cauſe of his peoples loſſe, if hee permit too much liſe and libertie, in the performance of diſhoneſt actions; like to Alcibiades, who thorough too much eaſie carriage in himſelfe, corrupted and ſpoyled his people. And yet ſeuerity ought to be moderated; for when it is exceſſiue, and ouer-ſharpe ſeueritie: it afflicteth Townes and Citties with great miſeries: euen as when liſe is faceriously accommodated to the onely grace and fauour of the people, it prooeth to be the cauſe of their ruine, by the lacke of a leuell temperature both in the one and other.

circumſtances and difference of perſons, the Prince ought to vie, eyther more ſeueritie, or ſometimes more facilitie (according to reaſon) and as Wiſedome iudgeth it fitteſt to be done, or ſpared for generall good.

Aſſuredly, in regard that the people is as a Monſter with many heads; there is great neede (as Sophocles ſayth) of a maine and ſtrong bridle. And as it is a principall poynt of Arte in a good Querrie, to make a horſe pace milde and obediently; euen ſuch is the office of diſcipline in a Prince, to render his ſubiect obedient and modeſt. And yet notwithstanding, to do it in gentle manner, and by benigne means, not rudely contrayning them alwayes: but perſwading, admoniſhing, and reprehending ſometimes, not purſuing euerie ſuſpition; but conuincing in light matters, deferring a buſineſſe in time of danger and doubt, to redreſſe it at ſome other ſeaſon, more apte and proper. For, by reſpreſſing and puniſhing all arrogancie and wickedneſſe; he may the more benignely entertaينه the good, when humbly they preſent their afflictions and requiſts vnto him. All which is the eaſier done, by vnderſtanding the manners and ſpirites of the people, becauſe, ſuch as are of rude and harſh brain (like vnto thoſe of barbarous nations) muſt bee gouerned with more ſeueritie; then they that be of more docible nature, who ought to be mannaed with mildeneſſe and benignitie, without ſtearne lookes, or vnkinde manner of dealing.

The complexions of men are diuers and diſſembleable; eyther by the nature of the place and ayre; or elſe by cuſtome and manner of life. The Athenians, were eaſie to anger and mercy, the Carthaginians ſad, opinionatiue and obſtinate; the Romans great, benigne, louers of their Country, ambitious and couetous of glory and honor. And therefore, ignorance in the manners of ſuch as wee conuerſe withall, doth oft deceiue and diſappoint vs in our opinions and enterpriſes; wherefore, by the diuers nature and cuſtome of the people, Lycorgus was rather a ſcator of power, then iuſtice; and Numa Pompilius of iuſtice, rather then of power.

For, as a Prince (in ciuile actions) imitateth the ſkilfull behauiour of a Lute-niſt, who tendeth and diſtendeth their cordes of the inſtrument, to bring an accord of tune as he would haue it; ſo doth hee likewiſe follow the Chirurgical, in order and means for tempering with liſe, becauſe light infirmities hee can cure eaſily; whereas to them of more perill, hee applyeth both yron and fire. In the ſame manner, a Prince maketh vie of the Rod and the Sword, according to the ſeueral occurences, and as they appeare.

It ſoloweth, that a Prince ought to entertaine good Lawes, and to obſerue the chiefteſt of ſuch as hee hath made: but aboue all other) to haue the honour and feare of God before his eyes. It is neceſſary alſo for a Prince to haue the command of himſelfe, and beare a ſtrict hand on the bridle of his owne affections; directing firſt a good courſe of liſe to himſelfe, to the ende, that it may ſerue as a Square or Rule, to meature the liues of other after his manners. For, very hardly ſhall hee command others (ſayth Pindarus) that hath not learned himſelfe to obey reaſon, which is the Queene of all things, and a Law, not engrauen in Marble, but in our ſpirites, commanding to performe lawfull actions, and prohibiting ſuch as are contrary, and bad. Her woorthy enſtructions, wicked Kings (being ſlaues to their owne affections) will not immitate: For, if ſhee were their Queene & Gouverneſſe, they ſhould bee conſtrained to contemne their vileneſſe, and honeſtly to enter faire Vertues ſeruiſe.

The Pythian Oracle, by the anſwere it gaue to King Croesus, That he ſhould know himſelfe, was not to be vnderſtoodeſt; that he ſhould know the glory and greatneſſe of his Empire: but Reaſon, Queene and miſtris of humane liſe, which appeareth the perturbations of the minde, and reſtrayneth the mightineſſe of power: For, the Poet Horace ſayth (by way of enſtruction) that it is a matter no leſſe royall, to repreſſe appetites and affections, then to rule ouer people.

then other. Alexander the Great, accounted it much more honest and glorious, to conquer himselfe, rather then to conquer enemies. A Prince should shunne flattery, for if he lend his eares to flatterers, he will not alwayes bee himselfe. Credulity is accompanied with rashnesse and folly, and there is no greater argument of folly, then credulity: therefore a Prince should not be too credulous, that is, over-light in beleefe.

Ambition also, which is the Mother and Nurse of many great evils, and the plague of Kingdomes and Commonwealths, should bee excluded from the heart of a Prince. A Prince that remembers himselfe to be but a man, and consequently mortall, will neuer mount vp his thoughts in pride; but pursue equality. If he perceiue all things prosper, and succeed according as hee can wish: hee will then beleefe, that God commandeth ouer humane occasions, whereof himselfe only hath care; and pride is highly displeasing to him.

I would aduise a Prince, to be careful of what he promisseth, and to whom hee maketh any promise; to be respectiue of mens merites and their faculties, as also the times of his giuing promise, for the better preservation of his faith: because there is nothing more vnworthy, and villainlike, then to breake fidelity, and the force of faith is so great, that it ought to be kept, euē with an enemy, if it be promised. And in regard that faith (according as our graue Auncients haue defined it) is constancy and truth in words and conuentions: a Prince ought to be true, and to loue truth, in regard whereof, our betters and elders ordained, and by them it was most wisely instituted; that the Booke of the holy Euangelists (wherein the diuine verity is contained) should daily (in the time of diuine seruice) be giuen to the Prince to kisse, to the end, that being admonished thereby, to pursue and honour truth; he should likewise remember, how studious he must be in louing her vprightly.

I could wish also, that a Prince should suffer no man to depart sad and discontented from his presence: but with cheerful lookes and gracious language, and so expresse himselfe both vnto small and great. Whosoever knoweth his Prince to be endued with temperance, dare neuer vrgē any vile or vnbeleeving motion to him. Happy Marcus Cato (said Cicero) to whom no man durst make any vnjust demand! He shall bee thought worthy of authority and soueraigne power, and bee reputed a hopefull Prince by his people; that sharply pursueth wicked men, hateth the intemperate, reiecteth liars, & flyeth (as from the plague) such as aduise him to follow voluptuousnesse: for whosoever takes pleasure in crediting such counsellors; his childhood in rule shall be immodesty, his youth effeminacy, and his age infamy.

Whosoever holdeth gouernment ouer the people, ought to be free from affections; for anger hindereth knowledge of whatsoeuer is good; hatred puffes him on to imperfect actions; loue blindeth his iudgement; pleasure and inordinate will induceth him to violence; passion pricketh him on to reuenge; and enuy enflameth him, with a more haty and fiery temper, then is expedient in him. One and the same constancy in courage (at all times) is most required and commended in a King, as well in cases of aduersity, as prosperity. And if God please to visite him, with any scourge of his diuine Iustice; he ought to reioyce, and remember, that God chastiseth such as hee loueth; learning thereby, to support all with the vertue of patience in contrary fortunes, and not to mount vp in pride, whē affaires are fitting to his owne desires.

Sloth, accompanied with negligence, is greatly hurtfull to a Prince, which in times of safety, begetteth (oftentimes) feare and distrust, whereof the Poet saith,

Otiū Reges prius et beatas Perdidit vrbes.

Wherefore, to shunne such inconveniences, some honest exercise is very fit for him; to play at Tennis (euē till hee sweates) is wholesome for him, and Musicke is very commendable; sometimes to hunt, and to ride great Horfies is necessary, for which Virgill gaue commendations to Picū, King of the Latines.

ging horses, were (above all other) frequent with King Cyrus, for encreasing the strength of his body, and greatly seruing for the enstruction of Militarie discipline. And patience, to endure both heate and colde, is laudable in a Prince, and is many times more expedient for him, then strict abstinence from meate and drinke.

It is very necessary also, that he should haue good knowledge in Histories, and (if it were possible) not to bee ignorant in Morall Philosophie, which may well be teamed the Hunt-vice: also, to vnderstand Naturall Philosophie, the Science of Ciuill right, and Mathematical Disci- plines. He should be assidue in reading Poets, as Homer, whome Alexander had alwayes in his hand: and Virgill, singularly affected by the Emperor Octavianus Augustus. A Prince being endued with all these Sciences, shall receiue inestimable benefite thereby.

First, he shall become wise; for learning begetteth wisdom; next, they will yeeld him such vspeakable pleasure, as no delectations can be thought or vnder- stand: for, inquisition after truth, is the proper worke and perfection of the Spirit. What is more woorthy in a Prince, then to vnderstand true & honest things? To discern falsehood from truth, and villany from honestie? In mine owne iudgement, I account an ignorant man, I will not say onely, like vnto a Statue or Image, or the truncke of a tree: but (almost) differing in nothing from a brute beast.

If the Prince himselfe be not seene in all these Sciences and Disciplines, it shall bee a good quality in him, to cherish and affect the Professors of them, alwayes hauing wise and learned men about him, and to execute nothing, vntill he haue first heard the counsell of them; For, Council is a sacred thing, said Epicarmus. And he should strue to be like vnto them, in so much as possibly he may: according to the example of many great Kings, Princes and Captains, who highly loued and maintained Philosophers, Poets and skilfull men.

A Prince may perceiue, what account Great Alexander made of Aristotle, and how much he admired learned men; what dignitie and praise Pericles wonne by the institutions of Anaxagoras; and Epaminondas by the study of philosophie, who (almost of himselfe) subdued the Lacedaemonians, that commanded all Greece. He may further obserue, how Scipio kept company with Panetus and Polybius, learned men; how Augustus would walke betwene Virgill and Horace; and what honours he gaue to Arrius. Finally, what deportments were vsed by many other Emperours and Kings, on the behalfe of learned men; and by the example of such persons, himselfe ought to performe the like. The Prince that attaineth to the issue of the qualities before remembered, and are required necessarily in him: shall reigne happily, and the people that liue vnder the lawes of such a Gouernor, will finde themselves more happy then he.

CHAP. XI.

That the eldest Sonne ought alwayes to bee preferred before a younger, especially in the succession of Kingdomes and Principallities, according to the Lawe of Nature. And what harmes haue followed, by doing the contrary.

In Allemagne or Germany, this bad custom they haue (I meane among the Noblemen,) that if they perceiue their youngest Sonnes able of spirit, and ad-dick themselves to Armes, and not to endure any injuries; they make them theyr heyres. And the elder, perhappes more discrete, following naturall goodness, & being nothing so turbulent; they make them beleue, that they are idioles and fooles, confining them in prison, or else appointing them to Church-seruice. This manner of dealing, hath caused much war in the Realmes where it is put in practise: and the reason is, because it becometh alwayes, to keepe the order and commandement of God. For, although that the eldest eldest Sonne be ill-fighted, lame, crooked, and wholly misshapen, provided, that hee haue a reasonable soule remaining in him; he is not to be excluded from his naturall right. This is not onely to holde, and take place, when question is made about the right of eldership: but also, when the very nearest male by the fathers side, ought to succeed in the crown, how much deformed soener he be. Because, for one inconuenience, a good law should not be infringed, and so dangerous an ouerture made in Monarchies. Nor ought that to be followed, or held as a good lawe, which was made by Lycurgus, commanding, that deformed or misshapen children, should be slaine.

Heereupon, Iudgement passed for the Realme of Hungarie, by the States of the Countrey, against the disposition of Launcelot, King of Hungarie: who adopted Alanus, the youngest sonne of his brother, to make him King, and sent Colomanus, his eldest brother to study at Paris, causing him afterward, to vndergoe the Orders of Priesthoode, and bestowed a Bishoppricke vpon him, to deprive him of all hope of succeeding in the Crowne; because he was quint-eyed, crook-backed, lame and stammered. Neuertheless, the State and people expelled the younger brother: and would haue none other to be King then the eldest, who was brought backe againe, dispensation being granted for his Orders, and he married.

Pompey, being gone into the East parts, to make Conquests, and comming into Iudaea, found it full of warre, because two brethren warred each with other, onely for the kingly dignity. For Aristobolus the younger brother, had invaded the best places of the Kingdome, and quite expelled his brother Hircanius: because hee said, that hee was not borne, & apt for Armes. Norwithstanding, Pompey adiudged the Kingdome to Hircanius, and the high-Priesthoode to Aristobolus, which was the chiefeft degree next to the King; and thus the stowt warriour was stayed from prosecution of this purpose.

Ptolomie, the first of that name, King of Egypt, preferred the youngest before the eldest; Against the Lawe of Nations, faith Justin, and so caused the one to kill the other. In the same kingdome, an other Ptolomie, named Philometus, at the entreatie of his wife Cleopatra, preferred the youngest sonne before the eldest: but after the fathers death, the people repealed the eldest, and excluded the youngest, as Paulsanias affirmeth.

In like manner, Anaxandrides, King of Lacedemon, preferred Doricus before Cleomenes his elder brother, because hee was more gentle; and yet notwithstanding, Herodotus in his fourth Booke sayth, That the people would not permit or suffer it, because it was against the right of Nations.

King Pyrrhus making election of an heyre amongst his Sonnes, chose him that had the best and keenest Sword: neuertheless, after his death, the eldest (who was lesse valiant) carried the inheritance away. For, whatsoeuer hardiness, gentleness, fayre feature and wisdom, that may be in the younger, more then in the elder: yet it is not anie occasion, whereby the father should forger himselfe, as to preferre the youngest before the eldest, as did the father of Atreus and Thyestes, who would needs preferre the youngest Sonne, because hee had better and more vnderstanding in the affaires of State, but thereon ensued bloudie tragedies.

Heereunto likewise I may adde, Lewes the Pittifull, King of France, who (at the request of his second wife) preferred Charles the Baulde, before his Elder Brother Lotharius, whereby the Realme became embraced with warres.

The like consequence came by Robert, King of France, in preferring Henry, the first of that name, before his eldest brother, who contented himselfe with Bourgonne; because he was a coward and false to his owne heart.

Charles the seventh, could neuer obtaine of Pope Pius the second, to aduance Charles the youngest Sonne, before Lewes the cleauenth, although the King had then good occasion: because the sayde Lewes made two attempts to take the Crowne, and to reare away the Scepter from his father, without anie occasion whatsoever. And in very truth (as Herodotus saith) Throughout the whole world, the eldest are aduanced to the dominion, euen amongst the most illiterate and barbarous on the earth, they obserue the course of Nature.

When Frances Bizarro, a Spanish Captayne, conquered the kingdome of Perru, he

he put to death king Atabaliba: whereof all the people were very ioyfull, to see him dye, that had slaine his elder brother, to make himselfe King, contrary to the custome of the Countrey, & conforme to the testament of the Father, who hauing two sonnes, willed, that Gasca the eldest, should succede him in the Kingdome, without any diuision.

There might also arise a doubt, to wit, if two infants be twins, which of them both should bee reputed the eldest; that must needs bee the eldest, which came fourth first to the worlds light. Another doubt also may bee moued in this case, that if any man (not being a king) hauing a sonne, shall afterward conquer a Kingdome, or some other such like dignity, be it either by Armes, or by donation. It falleth out in following dayes or yeares, that he hath another sonne; to which of these shall belong the kingdome or other honor? It is held for certain, that he who was or shall be borne, after that the Father became a king, in right ought to succede: for the eldest son was not of royal blood, but holds of his fathers first condition, who was not then royall by nature. But the other younger-borne sonne, though coming long after the first, is truly & really a Prince by blood. Like as he is not to be accounted for infamous, and out of hope for being legitimate, who was begot by a man neuer made Priest: but afterward, when he commeth to vndergoe the order of Priesthood, he begetteth then another Sonne; that Son is to remaine impeached, and can neuer come to such legitimacy, as the first borne.

Another difficulty there remaineth yet vndecided, to wit, whether the sonne of the eldest ought to succede his grandfather, or else the Crown appertaine to the younger brother (as it should seeme) because he is the nearest to the King, & the younger standeth withdrawne in degree. It was the opinion of some, and this difficulty hapned for the Kingdome of Nu-midia, where the younger son would succede next after his elder brother, without any respect to the children of the eldest. Heereupon, Scipio the Africaine being arbitrator, not knowing what to answer in this case, betwene the Vnckle and the Nephew, gaue order, that the Kingdome should be enjoyed, by a combat faught betwene them, as it hath often hapned in Germany.

Now at this instant, the Kingdome of Moscovia is deferred vnto the younger sonne, after the death of the grandfather, without any regard of the sonne to him that was eldest. Nay, which is more, the elder brother succedeth to the younger in the Kingdome, although hee haue sonnes: As great Basilus, King of Moscovia, succeeded in the Kingdome after his elder Brother, who had sonnes. And this was vsuall, not onely among the Vandalers; but also in all the Northerne countries, according to the affirmation of Procopius, as also in Eng'land. And for this cause, Richard, sonne to the heire & eldest, was defeated of the Crowne, which was adiudged by the States to Henry of Lancaster, younger brother to the Father of Richard, in the yeare 1399. And in the like case, Robert of Naples, the younger sonne, enioyed the kingdome of Naples, by sentence of the Pope, and the sonne to the elder brother, King of Hungary, was dispossessed. But now adayes, this rule holdeth not in the countries hithertoward, neither doth it carrie any practise in the Crowne of France, since then when it so happened: the sonnes of the eldest are alwaies preferred before the younger brother, and the English obserue the same course.

Some kings haue bin so superstitiously affected, and (beside) very ill aduised, that they would needs make search for the natiuities of their childre, to giue to him the Crowne, whose Stars appeared most to flourish in. In the number of whom, was Alphonfus, king of Castile, who by this means would needs preferre the younger son before the elder; but he slew the younger, and caused his father to die in prison: by which I find, that he was but a poore Prognosticator. Wherefore, to auoide ciuile war, which is the ruine of kingdomes and common-weales, the law of nature, (or rather the Lawe of God) ought to be followed, which commandeth, to conferre kingdomes vpon the eldest, as alwayes it was practised amongst the Hebrewes: and as we further finde, that the kingdome of India was conferred vpon Iehoram, because he was the eldest, as the Scripture affirmeth. Vv hich also the wife Lycurgus imitated; for, although the Lacedemonians had created him King, after the death of Charilaus:

CHAP. XII.

The Monarchy of the Cæsars, or Romanes.

Lulius Cæsar, a verye gracious Prince, and one of the Worldes cheefest Capitaines; reigned 5. yeares. He vanquished Pompey & his confederats: Ptolomy he slew, & restored Cleopatra his friend (sister to Ptolomy) to the Kingdome of Egypt. Returning home to Rome, hee was slaine in the Senate house, by Brutus, Cæsius, and other Conspirators. Discomfited then liued: But if you would haue more of Cæsars life, reade Suetonius and Florus, in the life of Cæsar.

Octavius Augustus the last Nephew of Julius, by the sisters side, and his adopted Sonne, reigned 56. yeares: he was happy in warre, moderate in peace, and liberrall to euery one. Then liued Virgill, Horace, Tibullus, Propertius, Virtrunius, Mecenas: And then died Cleopatra, and her husband Marke Anthony, Egypt beeing then reduced into a Prouince. Herod a stranger (fauoured by Augustus) was then King of Iudea. So the Scepter being wholly taken from Iudas Iesus Christ, God and man, the Sauour of the world, was then borne of a Virgin in Bethlehem, according to the Prophetes of Iacob, Genes. 49. Esay 7. Michas 5.

Iesus Christ came in the yeare of Augustus 42. and of the world. 3963. Ouid was then in exile: the City of Lyons founded: and then liued Titus Livius, Valerius Maximus, Strabo: and Francus, King of the Sircambrians, in the lower Allemagne: Aquila, Tiberius, Galba, Labenus and Caius, were then Law-giues, or Law-makers. Herod the great murderer of Innocents; and there were numbered then at Rome, foure hundred, sixty foure thousand men.

Claudius Tiberius, the sonne of Liuis, afterward Wife to Augustus, reigned 23. yeares, beginning very well, but prouing afterward to bee most wicked. Iesus Christ (for our saluation) was then crucified in Hierusalem, vnder Pilate the Pro-uost of Iudea: he saide, that A good Shepherd should clip his Sheepe, and not denoure them.

C. Caligula, Sonne of Germanus, a most wicked mā, reigned 13. yeares. This beast, the ruine of men, made himselfe to be adored as God: hee poysoned his Vnckle Tiberius, and deslorved all his Sisters, leauing them then vnto others like abusing.

T. Claudius, Vnckle of Caligula, and monster of men, reigned fourteen yeares. He preferred Nero before his owne Son, by the treason of whom, he was poysoned with a Mustrume. Messalina, his first Wife, peerelesse in all lubricity and wickednesse, then flourished: And Saint Peter the Apostle liued (reported to bee first Bishop of Rome:) Then liued likewise Philo the Iew, Perseus, Mela, Pliny the elder, and Columella. Saint Paul the Apostle went then through the World, proclaiming Iesus Christ, accompanied with Saint Luke. Then liued Dyonisius Areopagita: And then was the first council of Hierusalem.

Nero, the sonne of Agripina, afterward the Wife of Claudius, reigned thirteene yeares. He was the first Persecutor of the Church, and did put Saint Peter and Saint Paul to death: he slew likewise his Master Seneca, also his owne Mother, and Lucan the Poet. Then liued Simon Magnus, and Appollonius. Nero being expelled from Rome, flew himselfe; after he had set Rome on fire, to make himselfe palltime of a Bon-fire.

Sergius Galba, in the seventh Month of his Empire, was slaine by Otto. Suetonius, Egesius lib. 4. cap. 21.

M. Silanus Otto, hee also most wickedly slew himselfe, in the third Moneth of his Empire: confessing, that hee had cruelly tormented the spirit of Galba. According to Suetonius, and Tacitus lib. 7.

He caused himselfe to be serued at his table, with two thousand severall kindes of Fishes, and seauen thousand of Fowles, all at one supper. Suetonius lib. 9. Iosephus, lib. 5. de Bel. Iudai.

71. Vespasian, a modest & gracious Prince, a louer of skillfull men, and good Artizans, reigned tenne yeares, accompanied with his sonne Titus, who ruinated Hierusalem: Iosephus, Proculus, Epictetus. This ruine was the most lamentable that euer happened, for therein dyed eleuen hundred thousand men: Reade Iosephus, in his sixe and seauen Bookes of the Iewish wars, and Egesippus.

81. Titus, the delight and solace of mankind, reigned two yeares. He vsed to say, That no man ought to depart from a Prince, with a sad countenance: Cæsius, Neratius, Proculus & Pegasus were then Lawyers, and Saint Bartholomew was then martyred in India: Saint Matthias in Iudea: Saint Andrew in Scythia: Saint Mathew in Ethiopia: Saint Thomas in Bragman. Hierusalem was then taken; the famine beeing so extreame, as Mothers were compelled to eate their owne children.

83. Domitian, brother to Titus, was a most wicked man, and persecutor of the Christians: he reigned fifteene yeares: then liued Martialis, Inuenall, Statius, Trogus: and Saint John wrote the Gospell, as also Iosephus did the warres of the Iewes. Domitian would needs afterward bee called God and Lord of his people, wherefore (being greatly hated of all men) hee was slaine.

97. Nerva, a good Prince, and the adopted Father of Traian, reigned one yeare: he gaue more then an hundred thousand Crownes, to releese poore Cittizens. He tooke away extreame taxations, & (wanting money) he sold his garments, plate and Pallace, esteeming his owne Parents and Kindred much lesse, then hee did the publike benefit. The Christians were in great quiet vnder him, and the banished repealed, among whom was Saint Iohn.

99. Traian, a good Emperour, but that hee persecuted the Church; reigned nineteene yeares. Being admonished, that he was ouer-gracious to all men, hee answered; That he was such to his Subiects, as hee could with others should bee to him, if he were a Subiect. Then liued S. Ignatius, S. Eusebius, Pliny the younger, Plutarch, Anlus Gellius, Suetonius, Tacitus, Solinus.

Adrian, a man studious and skillfull in all Sciences, and the first Emperour that suffered a Beard on his Face, reigned 21. yeares: Iulius Cæsius, Julian, and Neratius Priscus, were Lawyers and Councillors to the Emperour. Then were liuing Ptolomy the great Astrologer, Phavorinus, Dyonisius the Milesian, and Elishodorus. Hierusalem was repaired by Adrian, who therfore had his name charged, and was called Helias.

Antoninus Pius, reigned twenty three yeares. He was a Prince of such clemencie, as strange Nations wold resort vnto him, and make him Iudge of their differences; for he had alway this saying ready: I had rather saue one Cittizen, then kill a thousand Enemies. In this time were Polycarpus, Irenæus, Iustine Martire, Egesippus, Appian, Florus, Macrobis, Iustine, Galen, and Palladius: Lucian the Atheist, also was then torne with Dogs. This Emperour tooke away the wages or hyre of Strumpets, punished idle Magistrates, and was called, Father of his Country. Reade Eutropius lib. 8. Theophorus the ninth Pope (as some report) did then institute, or rather restore the time of Lent.

M. Antoninus the Philosopher (called Aurelius borne in Gaul, with L. Commodus Verus, and called Brethren in the Bookes of the Pandectes) reigned nineteen yeares. This young Prince being unwilling to oppress his subiects, made sale of all his fairest and richest Jewels, Plate, and wearing garments belonging vnto him and his Wife. Eutrop. lib. 8.

Lucius Aurelius Verus, governed the Empire with his brother Marcus Antoninus, the space of eleuen yeares: By some Authors, he is set downe in order before his brother, and by others after him.

L. Commodus, the most wicked sonne of good Antoninus, reigned 13. yeares. He was strangled by his Concubine, & other Conspirators. Eutrop. lib. 8. Orosius lib. 8. cap. 18. Lampridius doth most amply describe his life at large.

He had refused the Empire, and being desirous to reforme the government, hee was slaine by Iulian his Successor; who bought the name of Cæsar of the Warriors. The people much bemoaned this Prince, crying out aloud: O Father of goodnesse; Father of the Senate; Father of all bounty: Farewell.

V. Iulian, reigned seven Moneths, and being hated of all men, for slaying his predecessor, himselfe was also slaine by appointment of the Senate. Dissention grew amongst the Christians, for the celebration of Easter; And the second Councell appointed the day of Sunday, and five other after, Ensch. lib. 5. cap. 24. Metianus, Secula, Marrianus and Cæsius, were now Iustit-consuls: Aphrodisius and Aphrodisius Sophisters.

Procerinus Niger, or Nigerius, the sonne of Annius Fuscus, indifferently learned, fierce, proud, and inclined to all vices; was saluted as Emperor, by the Soldiours of Syria, where he commanded, and was slaine by Seuerus.

L. Septimius Seuerus, reigned 18. yeares. He was a persecuter of the Church, but otherwise a valiant Prince, addicted both to good Letters and Armes. He was so wel beloued, and governed so nobly, that the Senate said of him: Either hee should neuer haue bene borne, or else hee deserved neuer to dye. Reade Spart. and Vell. Then liued Origen, Tertullian, Philostratus the Sophister, and Apuleius.

Cl. Albinus, issued of the Romane Families, of the Posthumians and Albines, made himselfe Emperor in France. He was surprized by the Soldiours, & brought halfe alive to Seuerus: where hauing his head smitten off, he was hanged on a gibbet, and being torne with dogs, he was throwne into the Riuer.

A. B. Caracalla, the sonne of Seuerus, and husband to his stepmother, reigned seauen yeares. He slew Geta his brother, and Papinian the great and famous Lawyer, with diuers other. At last, himselfe was slaine by a Soldiour of his Guard. Herod. lib. 4.

Antoninus Geta, the sonne of Seuerus and Iulia, borne at Milain; After the Parthian warre, wherein hee wonne great fauour, was called Cæsar Antoninus, in the life of his Father.

220.

Op. Marinius, with his sonne Diadume- nus, reigned one yeare. Both the one and other had their heads smitten off, by their men of warre. Macrinus was learned and seuer, but (withall) detestable and crafty, causing his Predecessour to bee murdered.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Heliogabalus, the bastard of Caracalla, who was a dishonest whore-hunter, and most abominable in life beside; gaue great estates to wicked Bawds, Panders, Iesters, &c. And being generally despised, hee was slaine by his Soldiours, in the fourth yeare of his Reigne: both his owne body and his Mothers being dragged along the Streetes, and cast into the common lay-stall.

Alexander Seuerus, reigned peaceably without effusion of blood, 13. yeares. He was a good Prince, & did vtterly forbid the selling of Offices. V. Iulianus, Paulus, Pomponius, Alpheneus, Affricanus, Callistratus, and other excellent Ciuill Lawyers (the Schollers of Papinian) then liued, with Dion the Historian, and Philostrophus. The Kingdome of the Persians was then founded by Artaxerxes, and after transpotted to the Sarrazins, and now commanded by the Sophi.

Maximinus, a persecuter of the Christians, reigned three yeares. Being at first but a silly Shepheard; he was made Emperour by the Soldiours (without authority of the Senate) and then by them was slaine.

241.

Gordianus, a Princee of a Noble spirit, with his Son named Gordianus the younger, a good Prince, reigned six yeares, and was slaine by Phillip his successeur. In his time was a wonderfull Eclipse of the Sunne. Reade J. Capitolinus, who placeth also Pupienus and Balbinus (created by the Senate) with Gordianus the elder.

Pupienus Maximus, a new man, and sonne to a Smith, gaue himselfe alwayes to vertue and Military fertices, prouing fortunate against the polonians and Germanes.

M. Calpurnius, and Pupienus, after they had bin Consuls, and that the Gordians were slaine in Affrica; were created Emperours, by appointment of the Senate, against Maximinus, and both of the were vnderseuedly slaine.

Gordianus the second, youngest son of Gordianus by his Daughter, borne at Rome;

was

was slaine in a sedition of Soldiours, by Phillip, Prefect of the Preterians;

C. Valens Hostilianus, is not placed in this ranke by some Historians, because immediately hee dyed, smitten with the pestilence, so that scarcely there remaineth any memory of him.

Phillip, an Arabian by Nation, was the first Christian of the Cæsars, and reigned five yeares. He gaue (by his Testament) all his rights and treasures to Pope Fabian; and heere began the riches of the Romane Church. He was likewise slaine by his successeur, as he had kild his Predecessour.

252.

Decius Traian, a persecuter of the Christians, reigned two yeares. S. Saturnine the Bishop was martyred at Tholouse. S. Laurence, Hippolita, Cecily, Agatha, and Appollina.

Q. Herennius Etruscus, is not by any Historian placed among the Emperours. Neuertheless, in this ranke is his picture found in the Booke of Hilbert Goltzius, and there it is recorded of him, that hee was the sonne of Decius, and that he was slaine in Hungary, in a battell against the Gothes.

Vibius Gallus, with his sonne Volusianus, reigned two yeares: Being persecutors of the Church, were both slaine by the Soldiours. At this time there was such a contagious pestilence, and almost so generally dispersed, that in many places ther was left no creature liuing. This pestilence continued fiftene yeares, and seemed to be partly occasioned through the wicked government of this Emperour.

256.

Aemilianus Lybiennus, borne in Mauritania, in his young yeares followed armes, and soone after he was made Emperour. He was slaine at Spoleta, being aged forty yeares.

271.

Licinius Valerianus, with his Son Galien, persecuting the Church, reigned fiftene yeares. He was Captiue to Sapor, King of Persia, who vied him as a footstoolle when he mounted on horse-backe. S. Cyprian & S. Cornelia, were then martyred. Porphyrius wrote against the christians: The thirtieth Tyrants vsurped the Empire. Reade Trebellius Pollio, &c. S. Paul the first Hermite began the solitary life.

Galien the son of Valerian, suffered the Christians to liue in quiet, and reigned 9. yeares alone, after that his Father was led captiue into Persia by Sapor. He was exceeding wife, but addicted to Lust.

Saloninus Valerianus, the sonne of Galien, was slaine with his Father, being retired to Milaine, and was but tenne yeares olde.

Cæsius Labienus Posthumus, from being a simple Souldior, attained to great dignities: and being in France, was made Emperour in the time of Galien, where he was slaine.

Flauius Claudius (of whom issued the family of the Constantines) a good Prince, of Noble Linnage, and highly esteemed, reigned two yeares. Dionysius being then Pope, diuided the Diocesses and Parishes of the Christians. Tom. 1. de Concil. Lamblicus, Plotinus, and Iuuenius Priest, reduced the foure Gospels into Hexameter Verses.

Aurelius Quintillus, brother to Cladius, after the death of his brother, was saluted as Emperour by the Senate, and slaine 17. dayes after.

Valerius Aurelianus, a cruell man, reigned six yeares. He tormented the Christians, and repulsed the Franconians, entering out of Germany into Gaul. He was the first that wore an Emperiall Crowne: a lover of Military discipline, and one that rigorously punished the vices of his Soldiours. He vanquished Zenobis, a very Warlike Lady, holding the Empire of the East.

Tacitus was slaine the first Moneth of his Empire. This good Prince caused the Bookes of Cornelius Tacitus to bee recieued into all Libraries. The Manicheans began (from the time of Aurelianus) to infect the Church.

Annius Florianus, brother to Tacitus, being desirous to reigne, vsurped the Empire as by inheritance: but in a short time he was slaine at Tharfus, by his Soldiours.

Probus, a good Prince, the Authour of peace in the high and lower Germany or Almaine, reigned six yeares and foure Moneths. He said, That he had no neede of Warriors, hauing no enemies; and that the Souldior (not doing any thing) ought not to eate up publicke provision.

Carus, a good and wife Prince, reigned two yeares, with his sonnes Carinus and Numerianus, two Brethren of very different nature. The first, was most wicked, and full of cruelty: The other was full of

goodnesse, valour and knowledge. Then liued Volcatius, Herodian, Lampridius, Spartianus, Pollio, Papius and Capitolinus Historians.

Diolejan with Maximianus Herculus, reigned 20. yeares: hee was a most cruell persecutor of the Christians, and would haue himselfe to be worshipped. Katharine, Lucy, Agnes, Barbus, Sebastian, Vincent, Cosmo and Damian, and innumerable other Martyrs through the world (in his Reign, to the number of 17. thousand) were put to death in thirty dayes.

Valerius Maximus, fir-named Herculus, a man of fierce and cruell nature, was very out-ragious in lust, especially with his owne sisters: blockish in giuing counsell, without ciuility and gouernment, & therefore had Diolejan to assist him in the Empire.

Constantius Chlorus, father of Constantine and Galerius, the one gouerned in the East, the other in the West, 4. yeares together. Constantine commaunded in Gaul, Spaine, Affrica, and Italy: The other in Greece, Arnohinus, Laetantius, Dorotheus, Bishop of Tyre, Eusebius and other learned personages liued at this time.

Galerius Maximianus, rearm'd Armentarius, because he was a Neat-herds son, was made Emperor, being a goodly person, and a fortunate warrior. Maximinus, Nephew to Armentarius by his sister, was Emperor, and persecuted the Christians in the East. Seuerus, Prefect of Italy and Affricke, was published Emperor by Galerius, and fighting with Maxentius, was taken at Rauenna, and slaine.

Maxentius, elected Emperour by his Soldiours, reigned a Tyrant, and was like vnto his Father Maximinus. Being vanquished by Constantine, neere to Pont-Mulius, he was drowned in a Gulfe, and his body neuer after found.

Licinius Licinianus, borne of Country Parents, was fortunate in the wars which he had against Maximinus. Afterward, he became a mocker of Christ, and persecuted such as beleueed in him; and because he was ignorant, he was a great enemy to all that were learned.

Martinianus, was created Cæsar by Licinius against Constantine; hee was in his Camp at night, but fled before next morning.

Constantine the Great, sonne of Helena an holy woman, with Maxentius and Licinius, reigned 31. yeares. He was religious and affable, and transported the Bible into diuers Countries. He assembled the Councell of Nice against Arius the Heretike. He builded the City of Constantinople, calling it after his owne Name: whether the Imperiall seate was translated, and changed from Rome into Greece, after he had granted Siluester to be Pope. Euseb. lib. 10. Niceph. lib. 8.

Crispus was made Cæsar by his Father Constantine, but being afterward falsely accused to his Father, he was put to death; for that hee would not consent to the inordinate appetite of Fausline his stepmother.

Constantine the second, with his Brethren reigned 17. yeares, ioyning thereto the three yeares reigne of Maxentius. Themistius, Donatus, and Libanius the Sophister then liued: and Saint Anthony the Hermit was knowne in Egipt, by many miracles.

Julian the Apostata, held the true Religion ten yeares, and was named Emperour by the men of warre in Paris, against his will. Hee forbad the Christians the study of letters: and being wounded to death, he cryed out: At length thou hast vanquished, O Galilean. S. Cyrill, Optatus, Basile, Nazianzene, Epiphanius, Hilary, Didimus, Exuperius (all learned Diuines) then flourished.

Iouianus, a kind and learned man, reigned eight Moneths, and made confession to his Warriours, of the name of Iesus Christ. Now was the first order of Monks instituted by S. Basile, vnder certaine rules of liuing.

Valentinian, a good and Catholique Prince, and Valens his brother, reigned 15. yeares. This man held the error of the Arians, and constrained the Monkes to vndertake Armes in warre: he dyed vnhappy.

Gratian, the sonne of Valentinian, during whose lifetime, he was an associate in the Empire. He reigned afterward with Valentinian the second, his younger Brother, and Theodosius sixe yeares.

Maximus, rearm'd Emperour by his Soldiours, slew Gratian, and held the Empire foure yeares: after which time, Valentinian returned to the Empire againe five yeares.

Theodosius,

The Councell of Nice,

395.

Theodosius, after that Gratian was slaine by Maximus, reigned three yeares with his brother Valentinian: the death of who was bemoaned by S. Ambrose, for the great zeale hee had to Christian Religion. S. Hierome, S. Augustine, and P. Orosius then liued.

399.

Arcadius and Honorius, the sonnes of Theodosius, reigned twenty nine yeares, as well in the East as in the West. About this time, the great empire of Rome began to decline (by the infidelity of Ruffinus & Silico their Tutors.) The very greatest part thereof was vied by the Scythians, Burgundians, Lombards, Hungarians, French, Goths, and Vandales: And Rome was four times taken by the Goths and Vandals, within one hundred thirty nine yeares. Then liued S. Chrysostome and Claudian.

Rome foure times surprized.

427.

Theodosius the second, youngest sonne of Arcadius, reigned at Constantinople 27. yeares, after the death of Honorius; hauing assisted Valentinian the third, the son of Constantius, and Placida, daughter to Theodosius, who reigned five yeares in the West. At this time, the Frenchmen leauing Francia, began to enter vpon the Gauls, vnder Clodion their second King.

453.

F. Valerius Martinianus, reigned in the East, seauen yeares, and Valentinian the third (at the same time) in the West: during their Reigne, the Burgundians and other Westerne Nations, were conuerred to the Faith. The Vandals came out of Spaine into Affrica, and afterward they tooke Rome, vnder the conduct of their King Genetichus. Attila, King of the Hunnes, entered into Gaul with five hundred thousand men: deliuered battaile to Aetolius their second King, who had ioyned with Aetius, Lieutenant vnto the Emperour. There he lost an hundred and fourescore thousand men, and fled into Hungaria, not any man being wounded behinde. About this time was great Arthur King of Britaine.

460.

Leo the first, reigned 17. yeares, associated by Leo the Sonne of his Daughter; who after he had reigned one year alone, gaue vp the Empire to Zeno his Grand-son, who reigned tyrannically 17. yeares.

476.

The estate of the Church was then very greatly troubled, as also that of the Westerne Empire. Italy had then nine Em-perors in twenty yeares, who all slew one another.

Anastasius reigned twenty five yeares: he was an Eutichian Heretique, was smitten with lightning, and dyed (as a iust punishment) for his heresie. Eugenius.

Iuliane reigned nine yeares: hee was first a Swine-herd, afterward a Cow-herd, next a Carpenter, a Souldiour, a Capraine, and last of all Emperour, gouerning very well and godly, and expelling the Arrian Heretiques. Then liued Boetius; and S. Benet or Benedict began this Order.

Iustinian reigned thirty eight yeares. All his care and study, was to reparaire the decayed Empire, and re-establish ciuill right; in the execution whereof, hee was seconded by excellent personages, especially by Belisarius, Narfes, and Tribonianus. They first chased the Vandals out of Affrica, which they had held 95. yeares; and deliuered Rome from the Goths, who had conquered it, & yet were once more expelled thence by Narfes.

Iustine the second, reigned ten yeares, beloued of all men for his liberality. Sophia his wife mocked him with Narfes, the Gouernour of Italy, whereto he being offended, called the Lombards, by whose helpe he reuenged himselfe. Now was the Kingdome of the Lombards founded by Clebus, wher reigned thirty two kings, vntill the time of Charles the Great.

Tiberius the second, reigned 7. yeares: he was a very charitable man, one that loued God and his Saints, and therefore (no doubt) was beloued of him againe.

Mauritius reigned twenty yeares: he was descended of very meane Parentage, and (in the end) was murdered for his comouersnesse: a vice as much discommendable in a Prince, as liberality is becoming, and maketh him renowned.

Phocas reigned eight yeares: and being the murderer of his Predecessor, himselfe was likewise murdered, with all his Race. Now was the contention for the Primacy of the Church, betwene Rome and Constantinople, and now was S. Gregory.

Heraclius reigned thirty yeares, who was the murderer of Phocas. The fifteenth yeare of his reigne, began the rule of Mahomet, the false Prophet of Arabia, where were the Agarens & Sarrazins: to whom the the Egyptian and Arabian princes (called Soldanes) next succeeded. After them came the Turkes, about the year of our Lord God, one thousand three hundred, Mahomets false doctrine (through the negligence of the Emperors & Christian princes) grew to such an head, that it not onely poisoned Asia and Africa, but also a very great part of Europe.

Constantine the third, reigned four moneths, being a good prince, and verie young: He was poisoned by his stepmother, that her sonne might reigne.

Heracion, who hauing his nose and tongue cut out, was banished two yeares after.

Constantians, the sonne of Constantine, reigned twenty and seauen yeares: And beeing very couetous, hee was slayne by his owne followers, in the Bathes of Syracusa.

Constantine the fourth, reigned seauenteene yeares. Hee ouercame in one battell, thirty thousand Syracusans, and afterward fell to great wickednesse. The learned and venerable Beda liued in this time.

Iustinian the second, a wicked man, reigned fixteene yeares, but not without interruption, being delected by Leontius, and Leontius by Tyberius Abfmaris, who reigned other three yeares; therefore these three are sayde to reigne fixteene yeares. Now was the beginning of the Dukes of Venice, which had beene gouerned before (for the space of two hundred and thirty yeares) by Tribunes.

Philip Bardasanes, reigned two yeres. Hee was cait out of his Empire by his Lieutenant: and after that, they plucked forth his eyes. Hee had much talke and little wisdom, disposing badly of the Empire, he became after a schismaticall Monke.

Anthemius, called also Athanasius the second, reigned three yeares: He was delected from his Empire by Theodosius chiefe of his Armie, and turned into a Monastery. He had taken away the Empire, and then pluckt out the eyes of his predecessor.

Theodosius the third, reigned one yeare. He left the Empire, seeing himselfe to be assailed by Leo his successor, and became a Monke.

Leo the third, a wicked man, reigned five and twenty yeares. Hee was called Iconomachus, a Defacer of Images, and would not suffer the Christians to haue any in their Temples. He was excommunicated by Gregorie, and by authoritie of a Councell held at Rome, against his owne of Constantinople. Blond, in his tenth booke. The Saracins besieged Constantinople three yeares together, in which time died three hundred thousand of the pestilence and famine.

Constantine, the fift of that name, the sonne of Leo the Isaurian, succeeded his father in the Empire of Constantinople, in the year of our Salvation, seauen hundred fortie and two. Hee was firamed Copronymus, because hee would discharge his belly in the Founts, appoynted for Christian Baptisme. Hee was an viter enemy, not onely to the Images of Saints, but also to their Reliques, causing them to be burned. Hee did put to death many of the best and most respected persons, and (amongst others) two Patriarchs of Constantinople. He made warre against the Bulgarians, both by Land and Sea, Fortune smiling vpon him, other-whiles lowring. In his absence, one Artabasdus was made Emperour at Constantinople. But hee receiving news thereof, returned, and either put out, or rent forth the new Emperours eyes, and caused his children to be slaine. In his time, there was so cold a Winter, that the Sea of Constantinople was frozen. After many cruelties, this Emperour dyed a Leaper.

Artabasdus, albeit he was defended of meane birth; yet notwithstanding, for the faithfulness, good vertues, and commendable qualities which were in him, he was liked of the Senate and Souldiers, & afterward was elected Emperour by the zealous Christians, for the hatred that euery one bare to Constantine the fift. Hee became a better louer of the Saints, and fortified the City of Constantinople against Constantine, who had beene expelled from thence. Neuertheless, both hee and it were besieged; and the City beeing surprized, his eyes were plucked out, and his children put to death.

Leo the fourth, was Emperour after his father Constantine the fift. He was not onely heire to the Empire, but also to his fathers vices: And his mother, who was deuout, and one that loued God, would giue no consent, that he should be Emperour. Hee made some attempts vpon the Saracins that dwelt in Syria. Heeooke the Crowne, which Mauritius had dedicated vnto Almighty God, and set it on his owne head, it being very richly beautified with rich pretious stones: But soon after, hee had an Impostume in his head, with a fiery Ague, whereof he dyed.

Constantine, the sixt of that name, and sonne to Leo the fourth, was Emperour after his father: Hee reigned nine yeares (very young) with his mother, who with his consent also, was perswaded by Theodorus Patriarch of Constantinople, to call a general Councell of three hundred and fifty Bishops. In a short while after, Constantine excluded his Mother from the Empires gouernement. Hee caused the eyes and tongue of Nicephorus to be pulled and cut out, hearing of a secret intention, to make him Emperour. Also hee did shut vp in a Monastery, his wife Marie, who was the daughter of King Charlemaine, and then tooke a Concubine, by the councell of his Mother, who pretended that her sonne was hated of the people. Heereupon not long after, shee caused him to be taken, and plucking forth his eyes, shut him vp in prison, where hee dyed, in the year 798, and then she reigned alone, about the space of five yeares.

Irene, issued from Attica, was Vife to the Emperour Leo the fourth, by whome hee had Constantine the sixt before mentioned, and reigned with him nine yeares, & afterward (alone by herselfe) five yeares, or little more, as hath already beene sayd. Shee was thence expelled by Nicephorus, and sent into exile to the Isle of Lesbos, which at this instant is called Mitilene. At the time when this Lady gouerned the Empire of Constantinople, Charlemaine was sacred and crowned Emperour of Rome, (or of the West) for his vertues.

CHAP. XIII

The ancient and honourable Historie of the life, fortunes and admired vertues, of faire Landgartha, the royall Queene of Norway.

IT is a case most certayne and assured, that a generous spirit, a gentle soule, and an vnderstanding filld with cheareful delicacie, is much sooner seized with amorous apprehensions; then that which is farre off from this quaint temper, and which subtilizeth the same perfection of the soule. Considering that loue, pure and perfectly naturall, being a vertue, and vertue cuermore biding in such fubjects, where the hearts are bold and most fantimoniously nourished, and gentle spirits hauing (I know not how) a rellish more diuine then vulgare, or apted for grosse popularitie: It followeth, without anie question to the contrary, that men, the more remarkable they are for greatness, gentleness, good spirit, & illustrious blood, doe also best discourse on louely occasions, and effect them with clearer iudgement, then such as faile in the accomplishments of the soule.

And, to sit this poynt the more seriously; Is it for a Clowne or peazant, to iudge on the raritie of vertues, on the singular giftes of the Spirit, of that which is beloued; and what offices and duties are in the partie affectionate? Effectes doe plainly approoue the contrary; for Poets, who are the very subtillest Painters of humane affections, that I know, and which trace Truth vnder the dissembled colours of wittie Fables, can not better let vs beholde the picture of such an impression; then by the iudgement (so often sung) and performed by the Trojan; on the beautie of the three Goddesses. For, the rudenesse of the Shepheard, hauing extincted the bright beams of bloud from his Parents, among the base and grosse thoughts fit for flock-keepers, not knowing the spirites forces, the beautie of the soule, the gentleness of vnderstanding, and the galliardie of the bodie it selfe, in being gouerned by interior reason; gaue the pize (he knew not how) of beauty by appearing in the exterior shape of a lasciuious Lady.

Beholde how farre Poetical Philosophy extendeth it selfe, and iudge, if the forth Shepheard degenerated not from his Parents, who should more haue cherished vertue, which liueth and continueth for euer; then that which withereth, and looseth it selfe by the steppes of age. And if that indiscreet Iudge pronounced the Sentence, in fauour of the most vwoorthie, and lent his affections to the onlie onely tickling of desire, full of wretched folly: (so was he as well recompenced according to his merit, and felt in the ende, that a manly Hellors desleignes, fauouring of that which is proper to the vertue of a man; was much rather to be chosen, then the light promise of a hurtful thing, how pleasant soeuer in wish, and alluring the sensuall part of a man.

Also, to speake truly, so many famous women, as haue honoured all the Ages past and ours, by effect and memory of their commendable vertues; if they had had no other rarities to renouwe them, but onely beauty of the body: questionlesse, their names had long since bin buried in a more obscure graue, then euer time ordained for things to be forgotten. No, no, it was vertue, generosity, height of courage, and great enterprizes; which made them immortall, and equalled their glory with the renouwe of men, yea, of the most signall and illustrious.

Against the venomous tongues of such, as neuer cease to take the reputation of so honourable a sexe; no boast need to be made, either of search into the valiances of Semyramis, whose memorie is somewhat too farre off; neyther the incredible forces of the Amazones, the History being (I know not how) doubtfull in the occurrences. Nor will I induce Zenobia the Asian Queene, the dreadfull astonishment (sometime) of the Romane Empire: whose wisdom also was as much to bee commended, as any of the very chiefeest Generals, her direction, policy and good carriage, all making her reputed (long time) for one of the Worlds Monarchs. Nor am I willing (tearing to make men bluth, by reading how many women haue managed Armes, and with no meane felicity) to insert Cinana, Daughter to Phillip King of Macedon, who made head against the ingratefull successours of her Brother Alexander, pursuing the viter ruine of his blood that had advanced them. After many foughten Battailles, hauing carried herself beyond the compasse of man-like valiancy; in the ende, the affected rather to dye, then to see the viter ruine of the famous House of her Ancestors, being vnable any way to helpe it. I will be silent also, in speaking of the braue Valaeca, a young Lady of Bohemia, who arming the Ladies of her Country against their Husbands; made a happy course of long warre against the men: vntill such time, as (being betrayed) shee crowded into the throngs of her enemies, of whom (before she could be slaine) she slew a great number.

I will not (I say) discourse so many examples, being satisfied with a History most true and memorable, collected fro famous Antiquity, and from among the Ladies of a people, heretofore accounted very barbarous: wherein (by my slender opinion) honest Gentlemen shall receiue some taste of vertue, without learning the fierce obstinacy of any; and Gdemen, may haue meanes to see and consider, how to make choyse of vertue in louing; and faire minded Maidens, obserue a rule, how to contain their thoughts in loyall affection, to them whom they haue dedicated their desires.

In the time when Dagobert, sonne to Charles the Great, reigned in France, and ouer the Empire, there was a King in Swetia, named Froll, or Frolle, a cruell man, a tyrant, and insupportable to euery one. This King, being neuer contented with his owne Royalties, began to insult obstinately on his neighbours Lands: but especially to fiesh on the king of Norway, vpon whose Countries entring without challenge or defiance, he made such great spoyle; that hauing pilld, sacked, and well-neere ruined the whole Country, he vanquished and slew the King, with all his Family. Nor did it suffice this rauenous Wolfe, to haue shed so much innocent blood, for the glutting of his greedy desire: but hee must needs also foyle his name with all kindes of cruelty and villany, in such, that hee left neyther Lady of the House Royall, nor any other that he could lay hold on; but he abused them as villanously, as wickedly hee had robbed other of their inheritable rights. They that were not (as yet) fallen into the gripes of this abhominable Goate, and not knowing how to shunne falling into his cunning and treacherous snares, made such a priuate consultation among themselves by secret intelligence; that at length, they mette together in a corner of the desert belonging vnto the Kingdome, to haue a more free vnderstanding of particular grieuances, and how Newes likewise ran curiously among them, that the Nobilitie of the Country (who had withdrawne themselves into Denmarke) solicited King Reyner, to bring thither his forces, in reuenge of a dishonourable injury done to his owne blood (for his mother was issued from Norway) and the Dane being easily spurred on to warre, in regarde he was very youthfull, his blood chearefully boyling, and desirous to archieue honour by Armes; gaue the easier eare to the motion. Beside, desire of reuenge, to see his reputation so much interessed, by the tyrannies of Swetia, with pretending a right and title vnto thekingdome of Norway: These were no meane motives to incite him on the sooner. And these considerations, gaue hart also to the distressed Ladies, for hope of good successe thereby: but fearing, that matter and meanes (in this case) were not as yet sufficiently ready; this intimated peruation vanished into smoake, euen (well-neere) as suddenly as it was concoiued, being no way able to resolue on any thing.

At length, one in their goodly troupe, and (almost) one of the youngest, fairest and gentlest Virgines, and such a one as had propounded to herselfe, neuer to submit vnder any Lawe, that gaue a man power ouer his wife: She, beholding the sad astonishment of the whole company, and what iust reason they had to be so dreadfully dismayed; making a reuerent obedience vnto them all, deliuered her minde in this manner.

The Oration of Landgartha, to the whole Company of Ladies.

Can it be (faire Ladies of Norway) that illustrious blood, appeareth onely in the strength and dexterity, which fondly wee presume proper and peculiar to men: and we that haue hearts, spirits, bodies and members like vnto theirs, must make them reuengers, and defenders of our continence & chastity? If Fate be so maleuolently affected, that our fathers, brothers and husbands, can obtaie no succour, to recover their lands, and expulse the Tyrant out of theyr territories: shall it therefore be said, that we must needs serue the inordinate appetits of a villaine? Frolle must abuse those remaining Ladies, that neuer tasted his abhominable embracements. Let Landgartha liue no longer, if she be voyde of all other duties and deuotion, then to attend the pleasures of a Tyrant, and (without resistance) suffer violence to be done to her honour and modestie.

Why Ladies, the Lyonesse and *Tygre*esse whet theyr claws and sharpen theyr teeth, to defend theyr young ones, and preserve theyr lines from the Hunts mens hands. The verie smallest Bird will rise both the Beake and Wing, to reuenge the wrong offered by rape of her brood. And we that surmount the one, in sense and reason, the other in strength, & all in wisdom: and can offer for bolde attempts; shall we suffer that a Stranger (not one: iose, fromer then our owne Countries strength) shall make a mockery and abusive pastime, of the most honourable Matrones & Gentlewomen in our Land? No, no, it is not for Landgartha to endure such indignitie, or that (without effusion of her blood) can yeeld to the beaust-like Prince of Swetia.

Are we inferiour in courage and generosity of spirit, to braue Aluilda, who so long time fought on the Seas, and amazed the very boldest warriours of the world? Are we defective in any thing shee had? We are healthfull, young, gallant, strong and rich enough, to winne whatsoeuer is needfull for vs, by service cyther on Sea or Land. And if Aluilda (moued by iust means) prosper in her actions, and had Fortune favorable to all her attempts: can you imagine, that Heaven hath not farre sayer successe in store for vs, hauing Reason and Vertue on our side, and vpright iustice to support our cause? were our iourney to death onely, and that the ending of this wretched life, could appease the Tyrants cruelty, without proceeding any further: I would be the foremost, freely offering my selfe as a Sacrifice, to satiate the furie of his raging lust. If he conieted, and would haue nothing else but our wealth and treasure; I would aduise you to deliuer all, and rather then spare aught, let vs goe seeke future fortune, and beg our bread through all strange countries in the world.

I suffer vs to enioy our wealth, for his freeer wallowing in wicked dalliances, which prey is the maine purchase wherewith hee most syneth: for hee more delighteth in our Honours violation, then, by massacring our bodies, to become Lord of all our Jewells, lands, and inheritances. What remaineth then for our deliuerance? Shall we tarry for them that are in Denmarke, expecting when they will come to succour vs? No, rather let Ladies arme themselves, and appearing in open fields, fight valiantly against the villaine, that seeketh to rob vs of our true repute. Let virgine him plainly to vnderstand, that effeminate persons are more soft, and lesse valiant then we are; that chaste and virtuous Ladies are of another temper, then Souldiers mollified by base pailiardise: yea, that they are more truly constant then the Tyrant, whose conscious guiltinesse in ydle offences, is his owne continuall torturing hangman. On then (valiant Prin esses, and Ladies of no meane lustre;) away with our wanton tyes, paintings, perriwigs, and ydle deckings: Let vs change our Spindles, Needles and Samplers into Horses, Lances, Swords and Armour, and trie, if Frolo be as furious in warre, as hee is sterie wanton in his lasciuious Pallace. Let vs reuenge the wrongs our Parents and Kindred haue receiued; or die most gloriously, in the pursuit of so holy, iust and commendable a reuenge.

This courageous remonstrance of the braue spirited Virgine, gaue such bolde animation vnto the rest of the Ladies, as (with one consent) they made a league, vowing louing alliance, and (sollennly swearing faith, loyaltie, mutual succour, and assistance among themselves;) Landgartha was elected chiefe commandresse, or Lady Generall of the Army, and well deserting that, or any other higher dignitie, being the motive to such a maine and important businesse.

Now beganne a muster of all the Women and Maidens, of the most noble and famous houses throughout the whole Countrey: but not without much amazement in Frolo, wondering whereto tended such an assembly. Hee, perswading himselfe, that they intended fight to their friends and kinned in Denmarke, sent command vnto them, that (on perill of their liues) they should returne home to their houses, for enioying the benefite of their libertie; which he was content to graunt them, in regard of their beauties and gentle behaviour.

But Landgartha, the man-like woman champion, hearing the peremptory command deliuered by the Tyrants Herald, sent them backe with blows and iniurious speeches, telling them; that they would not take their liues, in regard of any respect they had to their Lord: but onely, because they should let him vnderstand, in what deuotion and readinesse they found them, & or seeking some conuenient means and way, whereby to make him render an account for his tyrannie and cruelties.

When Frolo heard these tidings, at the first he made but a scorne thereof, laughing extreamely, at this womanish enterprise and Armie of Ladies, saying: They did well, to make a present of themselves, because he should haue the easier way to find them, and if they came into the field, the bootie would suffice for his Souldiers pay, and likewise for their pleasure beside, in regarde he would bestow wines vpon them all, and saue them a labour from any further fighting. But this pleasant humour soone forooke him, and conuerted into fury, when he was aduerted of their being in the field, & making such a strange massacre of his men, as the like was seldom seene or heard of. Nor spared they the liues of any, that durst reclaime himselfe from following his seruice, which made him curse and sweare, threatening them with a thousand kinde of torments and afflictions, going now (in good earnest) to arme himselfe; as being perswaded, that this feminine lurie had extended so farre, that it was no light matter that could allay it. Hee grew also into such suspicion of himselfe, that he kept a strong Guard about him: as holding but small assurance of his life, amongst the armed troupes of his owne Souldiers: yet hee made many large promises vnto them, of the very fairest and richest amongst them, with all their lands and treasure, to shew themselves valiant and coragious, against this giddy headed army of women; which encreased daily more and more, both in number, victuals and munitions, brought continually to them from euery part.

to his spirits, and the fauour which his owne subiects afforded to this womanish Army, tormented his soule as violently on the other side: yet he seemed to set a good countenance on his feares, declaring no outward doubt of prenying against them, though (inwardly) his cogitations tolde him dreadfull tydings. Nevertheless, being already in the field; and preparing his equipage, to get the best advantage he could, of the place where the Ladies were encamped: a Courtier came galloping in post to him, bringing newes of the king of Denmarks descent into Norway, with a very potent Armie. What astonishment sooner seized on his soule, to see himselfe inclosed (as it were) with two puissant enemies, and knowing how highly he was hated, by them whom hee had overcome and subiected: yet notwithstanding, perceiving that flight was preiudiciall to his honour; and (moreouer) almost impossible, in regard that the ways whereby he should passe into Swedia, as also euery port and passage were in the enemies power; he resolved, first to runne his fortune on the men, who being defeated, the fight would be farre easier against the women; and thereupon, in the forme of an Oration, thus he spake to his Army.

IF you were not those valiant Gotes and Swedians, that haue tamed and beaten this kennell broode of Norwegians, and now conquered their land: If it were not your valiancie, that hath often made pillage and spoile of the Danes; If your invincible force were not well knowne to the world: I should then haue now entreated you, to remember your Ancestors, and the glorious conquests of your predecessors: I should also set before your eyes, how many Kings, People and Nations were vnder-yoked, by the greatnesse and deedes of your famous fore-goers. But, seeing that your proper vertue sufficiently sheweth it selfe, and auoucheth you to be the worthy sonnes and successours, to so many valiant and famous Fathers, and that your deedes are no way indebted to the glorie of their greatnesse: Let vs goe then, gentle and worthy warriors: Let vs pace on, and giue Keyner to know, that this is no Countrey for him to reigne in, nor to deale in actions of Armes, with the most furious and brauest Nation of Europe. Let vs on (bold spiritues) to chase them againe, which haue so many times fled before vs; and let vs chastice the rebellion of the Norwegians, who falsifying their faith sworne vnto vs: haue called in our enemy to their succor, to quarrell with me for that; which is yours by right of Conquest.

In the meane space, while Frolo marched on to meete the Danes, observe the wisdome and diligence of Landgartha, and her Ladies; who stepped before him with such postling speede, that ere the time, as any intelligence could be obtained of her departure: tydings were suddenly brought him, that both the Camps were ioyned together, and came mainly marching onward to bidde him battaile. Now, although this did not alittle startle his maiesty, and intimated a suspicious kind of feare, lest Fortune should turne her backe on him, hauing formerly fauored him in all his proceedings: yet being a man of high heart, valiant, and borne for Armes: he shewed no semblance of dread or distrust, but rather still sollicit his men, to shew themselves such as alwayes they were knowne to be, and to account the enemy no stronger by the womans combination; but rather to hope, that fortune had conducted them purposely thither, for the larger encreasing of their benefit, and to heighten their corage against any, that durst presume to deprive them of so faire a booty.

On the other side, King Keyner, beeing come within the view of the enemy, rode among the ranks, encouraging his people, propoosing to them his right, and the insuasion made by the Swedian. He required them, to reuenge the wrong doone to so many honourable houses, vtterly overthrowne by the Tyrant, and to sustain the cause of womens modesties, for whom, and in whose defence, long agoe theyr Ancestours had attempted rare actions of Armes, and spent their blood in many parts of the world. He also set before their eyes, the courage and animosities of the Ladies, who marcht orderly vnder the Ensignes of valiant Landgartha, and to imitate by their force, that which weak women had vnderaken, to free themselves from the violence of a Tyrant. Also, that they might assuredly be rewarded; beside the gaine and boote, in getting the bagge and baggage of the Swetians: himselfe would (moreouer) vsue their reward and courtesie to well deservers; that they should for ever haue iust cause to commend his munificence. He declared to the Norwegians, that (for the loue to them) hee would adventure to fight against Frolo, whom if he conquered, hee would spare him no more, then he rest of his race formerly had doone. And therefore to shew themselves valiant, and now to bee fully reuenged on the Swetians tyrannies; seeing Fortune had almost (with great advantage) deliuered him into their hands.

Landgartha, beholding how every one encouraged other to the fight, and observing some rare galliardie; euen in the gracefull lookes of her female followers; in steade of further animating; thus she spake vnto them:

Another Oration of Landgartha, made to the Armie of Ladies.

Her action, gesture and behaviour inflamed the desires of all her faire followers

It is for vs (sayre Ladies) that the glorie of this battaile is referred; and to none else is due the reuenge, for our parents, kindred, friends and familiars. Men may fight (if they will) in their owne quarrell, and deale with whom themselves thinke best: but the valorous Ladies of Norway, will pursue none other then the very Squadron of the Tyrant, and there will wee die in the midst of our endeavour, or make this the last day of his miserable life. Let our horses seeme to stie among the ranks, that we may be obserued to surmount the prooves of men, and that wee can quickly reuente our strength againe, if any disorder should chauce to diuide vs. If our Fortune be our guide, and fauour vs to die gloriously, or vanquish (with hearts be- seeming our Sex) the onely infamous Prince in the world. In a spirit gentle and generous, see (I beseech you) what power Disdayne hath, to behold it selfe offended, and of what worth illustrious blood is, (touch'd with wrong) receiued by women and maydens, tender, soft, and delicately borne and bred, not inuol'd to the trauaile of Armes, but driuen by desire of reuenge onely. For the rapes made on their violated kindred and friends: must needs bee now acknowledged, by the ornament which they best embelli- shen our faces, and exposeth vs to all manner of hazards, amongst the gallantest troups of men.

King Reyner, hauing giuen the assaults signall, aduisedly obserued the behaviour and warlike order of the women, seeing Landgartha performe both the actions and discrete conduct of a good Souldier, making way through the throngs, and entering (euen in mere despite of the enemy) with her faire-locked troups of Ladies; into the Tyrant of Swetias Squadron. Hee stoode as astonied at so braue hardiment, and (in this astonishment) he felt a kind of softning in his manly soule, raiuing both his eyes and thoughts, with admiration & contemplation of this chaste Damocel: he forthwith followed her fighting, yet knew he not the cause of so sodayne an alteration, and beholding her wonderfull carriage in the fight, saw no stroke returned against her, but it seemed to cleaue his heart in tunder. Hee wished himselfe neere her, to free her from all perill and daunger; yet he rooke great delight to beholde her braue behaviour.

So long his eyes were led by this amorous contemplation, that (very soone after) he saw the Ladies presse on with such impetuous furie, into the maine body of the battaile; and where the king of Swetia was in person: that (in a short while) it became so shrewdly shaken, as, both the vanquishers, and the vanquish confessed, that the victory was more to be attributed to the wife leading of Landgartha, and valiant following of her Ladies, then to the long breathing and loose courage, either in the Souldiers of Denmarke or Norway: for they neuer ceased to pursue the point, till Frolo was heuue in peeces amongst them; as the corrupter of blooming youth, and violater of their chastities, whom he ought (in honour and duty) to defend. Thus in an instant, Frolo payed the crueltie due vnto his disgracefull life, & was punished by celestiall Iudgements, for inuading the land and inheritance belonging to another, and abusing the honor of so many chaste Ladies.

King Reyner attributes the victory to the valiant Landgartha, & her Ladies.

The victory won by the Dane, he freely confessed, that he enjoyed it by the valiancy of the Ladies, and about all the rest by the wife and hardy conduct of hir, who commanded ouer the female troups. But concealing (as yet) the fire crept into his heart, and which tole on still to the verie depth of his soule; he cunningly enquired (as one rapt with amazement, among the rest, at the dexterity of this woman VVarriour) what she was, of what house, and in what country she receiued her Originall? Answer was returned to him, that she was a Maiden to be married, so chaste as possibly might be, as vertuous as any that liued in Norway, in blood Noble, of a famous house, and inferior to no Ladie in wisdom. The vertue and wife carriage of Landgartha in war, hauing won the heart of this youthfull King; gaue yet a far larger entrance to loue, that left no part of his soule vnbesieged: when he heard say, that she was a Virgin Ladie, and of great birth.

The kings passion encreases the more, by her commendable reports.

But because he could rather hate wisht her to be his louely friend, then wedded wife; he saw how short hee came of any such hope, being truly informed of her virgin modesty, standing cleere from all possibility of corruption: neither might he dare to attempt it, seeing how respectfully she was esteemed, affected, and reuenged, & hardy enough to suppress all such sinister enterprises. Moreover, as elsewhere we haue declared, though rapes had bene too common in that Scandian country; yet it was no easy offer to her, that knew well how to reuenge such wrong, and had made good proofe thereof lately, in the iust infliction on a lustfull tyrant. In which respect, hauing a faire and gentle spirit, he resolved, to cloath with grace and good acceptance, what ouer might appear vnequall in her, to sure with the greatnes of a King, and to satisfie his owne desires, by contracting honourable Marriage with her. And because common fame had noised of her, that she had concluded to keep her virginity for euer, without admitting any man to triumph ouer her chaste honor; he laboured the more to win her, & to break this vncharitable purpose in her; affecting her as dearly as his owne life; accounting her the most compleate creature in the world, & such a Jewell, as none could be more precious.

If this opinion, concerning the rare vertues of Landgartha, had alwayes continued carraied in the soule of this prince; and if she had respected her as well after the enioying her, as before hee had the happinesse to be possessed of her: she should haue receiued no occasion to complaine of him, and he neuer had stood accused of such infidelity and ingratitude to her. But (the more the pity) there is not any thing so precious, rare, or of great consequence; but if a man bee possessed of it, and hath it freely at his owne command: he groweth distastefull of it; accounting his appetite loathingly glutted therewith, and nothing can seeme more contemptible to him.

What more court to intoy they grow careless of afterward.

Reyner, how great a King fouer hee thought himselfe to bee, and how powerfull in his chiefeest commands: yet, he felt himselfe a slave to Loue, nor daring to discover his thoughts: he was become (contrary to precedent custom) a friend to solitude, full of passions, compassed with fears, troubled in spirit, martired in his senses, scarce sustaining any hope; but very coldly and breathing forth sighs incessantly; so that all were amazed at this strange behaviour in him. Notwithstanding, no one durst enter into such boldnesse, as to demand of him, whence came the causes of such comfortlesse solitude. At length, hauing considered sufficiently on what he had to do, and finding the power of loue so potent, that it exceeded all possibility of resistance, as hauing a priuledge about nature, and Landgartha no way to be enioyed, but by the chaste embraces of a marriage bed: he sent for the Lady and her friends, imparting his mind to her in this manner.

I know well (gentle Damocel) that it may moue some admiration in you, vpon what occasion I haue thus sent for you: albeit, the obligation wherein I stande bound to your high desertings, might haue commanded me to do it much sooner. & yet a matter no more then reasonable. But to hold you in no longer suspense the hope I haue, you will continue heere in court; was the motive to my mission, & the power I might pretend ouer your parents and friends, thould wish their willing aduice to you, and enioyne you to grace vs with your company. I know what you are, and am informed of your house and breeding; but much more am I assured of your valor and other vertuous meritis, by the commendable partes and singular rarities, whereof mine owne eyes haue bin a witnesse. You also are not ignorant who I am, what my power is, and the meanes to make my selfe sensible, either offauours or iniures, from whom I happen to receiue them. I confesse, that if there be any thing extravagant in Loue, or surpasseth the greatest power in man; hath taken foundation in my soule, enflaming my best desires to wish you wel: but I am vncertaine, whether you be so courteous or no, to take a liking or acceptable allowance of this affection, and so much the rather, because you appear aboue the reach of other Ladies. Neuerthelesse, if you measure the greatnesse of a King, and of him that is your Soueraigne, with the lustre of your choise perfections: you shall see, that both these rarities paired together, do make but one vnion, & the most excellent that any man can imagine. In brieffe, all my wish, intent, and affection consisteth in this, that if you thinke good, or I may seeme worthy in your eye, to be a fit husband for Landgartha; I would take you to Wife, and make you Queene of Denmarke and Norway. You may thinke heereon, it is in you to conclude all, and to whom I referre my selfe: for, of this my submission, I make your parents and friends witness, calling for them purposely hither, to heare in my motion, and your answer.

Landgartha, who was as apprehensieue, courteous and modest, as high in courage, and strict in opinion: considering who it was that made the motion, and how much he imbased himself in the demand, returned this answer.

SIR, although my deliberation from mine infancy, and continuing to this flourishing condition of mine age, hath alwaies beene, neuer to subiect my selfe to the lawes ordained for marriage, because freedom euer seemed more conforme to the disposition of my spirit, then such obedience as a wife owes to her husband, not that I haue vowed or sworne to any citate whatsoeuer: yet notwithstanding, hauing regard vnto the duty I owe my Prince, and seeing how iustly I may deserve blame and punishment, in refusing him that hath soueraignie ouer mee and mine; I beseech you to thinke, that your thoughts being so direct as they pretend declaration, and respecting one of so meane merite as my selfe: I am also the onely Maiden of the World, ready to do you most humble seruice. Thanking the great God, that seeing I owe dutie to the fancy of a man (albeit against my former resolute) it falleth so successfull, as in seruice to the most wise and valiant Prince, that of long time hath reigned in these countries. Neuerthelesse Sir, thinke it not strange, I humbly beseech you, if I speake (perhaps) more boldly then becommeth me, to vse a silly virgins aduice, to take longer and more deliberate consideration, in a case so seriously important as this is: humane affections being so light in cases of these and the like impressions; that (many times) they as sodainly wipe themselves out of the soule, as at the first they came to be charactered there. Not that I will accuse so great a King of leuitie, nor suspect his faith any way infirme: but to this end, that hauing made a neer view of my complexions, and more exactly enquired the list of my life; you may the better censure my merit, measuring for hereafter, what you may now most valew in my meannes and insufficiency: so shall you be sure, neuer to vnsway your owne words, or be sory then for that, which you make so great account of now. For know Sir, that the honor which you please to do me at this present, is nothing in respect of the great infamy, redounding then both vpon you and me, & those that gaue you no better counsell in this case, whom it may as neerly concerne. This would be a worthy recompence, for the intire affection you beare me now, and I should dedicate my life to you in deeper deuotion, remaining for euer your most loyal & dutifull seruant.

With such a graue and seuer countenance she vttered these speeches, that the king, amazed at her wisdom, but more at the Maiestick dulness of her wordes, and freedome of so faire and compleate a spirit: I swore instantly such loyalty to hir, as fitted with a king and faithfull husband, wherein he plainly forswore himselfe, as you shall hear in this discourse following.

Vertue worthe aduice fauoring of a difference and, well settled judgement.

Consideration before marriage is vertue necessary, because repentance afterward cometh too late.

King Reyner should Landgartha to the joy of her parents, but apparent in her of his affections continuance.

At this time the Maiden was not married to the youthfull king (who longed after nothing so much, as to crosse the fayre flower of her chastity) but shee returned home with her parents and friends again, hoping, that the heate of this royall fire, would be quailed in time, and her absence would be the meane to effect it. But Reynar, who could not forget her that had so worthily assisted him, and whose figure was liuely imprinted in his soule: followed her to her Fathers dwelling; and, scorned to be delayd by many daies access, espoused her, to the vnspokeable comfort of her parents and friends, but som dread and great distrust in her self, as fearing the continuance of this feruent affection, and hauing won the heart of a King, doubted to be dispossessed thereof. Neuerthelesse, such was her wife and commendable carriage, as to conceale her fears with maiestick modesty: submitting her selfe to the Kings delightful pleasures, and the yoke of marriage, which formerly she had contemned.

But, as no ioyes are durable, being perpetually followed by worldly occurrences: so Reynar (being a yong, wanton, and lasciuious king) after hee had bene Father to three children by his Queene, two daughters, and a hopefull yong Prince, filled, or rather ouer-satisfied with the embraces of this poore Lady (who brought him no other dowry but bright beautie, and vertue vnmarchable in all the country) coueting after matter of greater moments, withdrew thence into Denmarke, leaving his truly elected spouse in Norway, nor with any purpose of sending for her, or returning to her againe, but vtterly to abandon & forsake her. Being in Denmark, he heard report of the K. of Swetia daughter, whom he desired to inioy, accusing his indiscretion, that he had embased the greatnes of a king, and much blemished his royall title, by marrying with a fillie damofell: and sending a solemne Ambassage into Swetia, he obtained (without war or any other great difficulty) her whom he coueted to enioy in marriage.

Heere behold, how constant the Kings affection stood to vertue, and how the maske of fained loue discovered it self. He had sworne fidelity vnto his best beloued Landgartha (notwithstanding her wife & worthe aduice of inconueniences to follow) with no meane admiration of her vertues and perfections: but Vertue was then bound to the Idea of pleasure, and therefore of as little lasting, as ease hath continuance in occasions of the flesh. Beside, no sooner had he receiued answer to his minde, from the king of Swetia; but forthwith, he aduertised Landgartha of a second intended marriage, although vnlawfully; yet praying her patiently to endure a diuorce.

The poore Lady hearing this determination (although long time before, she had both diuined and feared such disaster) was ready to dy with conceit of greefe, to see her selfe despised, without the least occasion of offence giuen, or why he should vnkinde refuse her. At length, considering that the king had some reason for this repudiation, by seeking better alliance, which might succour him in his serious affayres; because he had an enemy that contended with him for the Crowne of Denmark, & incited the Emperor to lend him ayd, vnder colour of becoming a Christian, if he would help him to compasse the kingdom: she began somewhat to alluage her minds perturbations, answering that that brought her these bad tydings, thus.

The King (my friends) should not thus abuse Landgartha, because he needs not to seek any further, for strengthing his house by stronger alliance: and well may I accuse him of lightnes, whereof I aduertised him in the beginning, and which (to my greefe) I finde now by ouer-deare experience. But if I were as reuengfull for the shame I suffer, as hee is vnioin to my behalfe: I could (perhaps) finde him as busy and troublefome employment, as hee can yeeld him pleasure, luccour, or defence, with whom he hath such hasty to marry. He knows what means I haue to discaise him seeing he felt part of my power in fauouring him, and should perswade himselfe, that Landgartha was neuer somuch offended by the tyrant of Swetia, as by him, who vnder the flattering name of marriage, hath wronged the modesty of her, that discerneth now, how men the greater they are, so much they thinke themselves dispensed withall, in breaking those Lawes, whereto they binde other in obedience.

Yet one thing caught me somewhat to pardon his fault, and also to accuse mine owne indiscretion, that he being blinded by loue, and I, by sole reuerence vnto the name Royall: we haue both fayled in one kinde, but not equally punishable, his shame being not so great as mine, because (being free, & without passions) I would submit my selfe to the will of him, who durst not vse any violence towards mee; whereas he was a slaue to his owne cogitations, and transported with desire, which maketh fooles of the very wisest in the world. Let him enjoy the embracings of his new elected Lady, at his own pleasure and contentment; but I pray, (in regard of the faithfull loue I beare him, and so shall doe for euer, being such as I am) that hereafter, he may neuer be so light & changeable in affection, lest some one (offar lesse cunning then himselfe) make him not doe penance for wrong to all the rest. And assure him, that although hee hath wounded the heart of Landgartha to death, by preferring another of much lesse merit, and forgetting the debt, which maketh him mine by bond: yet notwithstanding, the Image of King Reyners shall remaine perpetually engrauen in my heart, and no accidents of the greatest disaster, can euer deface the sacred and sincere affection, which his plighted faith so lately imprinted in my soule.

Men may run on in vncoustant courses till at length they chance to be over-matched.

Her vertuous and charitable conclusions at parting with the Ambassadors.

Goe and report vnto him, the offer of my seruice, and the desire I haue to please him, instead of seeking any reuenge. Set before his eyes, not any despayring cogitations in mee, but vnconquerable patience. Tell him, I am not a little ioyfull, to see my selfe free from subiection to a husband: but yet so sorie as possibly can be, to looke him whom I loue more then my selfe, and without whom, my dayes for euer are dedicated to mourning. Report vnto him, that Landgartha will liue, not to be reuenged vpon the disloyaltie of King Reyners; but to the end, that by the effusion of her owne blood, she may yet make him once more to know, that she is more his friend, and more carefull of his States conseruation, then himselfe is. Tell him also, that such Ladies as resemble me, haue their hearts more generously disposed, and farre more fairly furnished with vertue: then base minded men, that alwaies carry gentleness in their looks, but villanie truly stamped in their hearts. For a final conclusion, I pray God giue more ease to my vnfaithfull husband, then (through his disloyalty) he leaues sorrow and affliction in the soule of his loyall wife: and that she who vniuersally my place, in regard the fault is not hers) may long enjoy peace in that bed, which vertue and merite once made me Mistresse of, and the King taketh from me. I know not by what disaster, but in meere malice and hatred to mee and my fortune.

What greater constancy could be wished, in the heart of the very wisest Philosopher, that euer Greece or Asia yielded, then appeared in the inuincible soule of this Norwegian Lady? What deeper despatch could be done to a worthy woman, then to reiect and throw her off, as if she had beene wicked and immodest? Or what greater occasion may bee giuen, for betraying a husband; then causelesse suspicion, and diuorce or refusal, where reason and iustice can shew no cause why? Poets haue liuely depicted in their Verses, the desperate transports of Medea, forsaken by Iason, and the fearful cruelties vsed by her, to bee reuenged on such an injury. Marke Anthony, by refusing and forsaking the faire sister to Augustus, attracted by foolish affection to blacke Cleopatra; both Europe, Affricke & Asia, were inhumanely bathed with the blood of men, the brother endeavouring to reuenge the injury, which was offered vnto his sister and the whole Family. And tell me (I pray you) what a wound in France was sometime made, by the diuorce of Elianor, Countesse of Poitiers, and Dutchesse of Guienne; the meanes whereof gaue way to the English, & that they made themselves so strong in France?

Notwithstanding all these, and many more that I could speake of, we see Landgartha so humble, vyle, discrete, and such a louer of quietnesse, that, hauing meanes to be reuenged on so high a wrong done her; so farre was she from pursuite, heate, rage or tempest, that making Patience proude of her example: shee offered seruice to him, by whome she was contemned and despised, presenting all duty to an ingratefull husband, and promising fresh supply, after receipt of a former disloyall recompence. You which are iaculous of Ladies honour, and complaine of a giddie madnesse in their braines, and of immortall enmity and hatred engrauen in their Soules; behold this rare woman, declaring declaring truly a Christian minde, although the neuer receiued baptism: Of her you may learn, that Ladies haue something in them rightly heroycall, which men can neuer comprehend nor taste of, but by long, studious and wise experience.

And yet Landgartha stands not alone in this example, for France can make boast of many more great Ladies, that imitated her mildnesse and constancy, & of whom I could enter into a large Discourse: if French Historiours were not so frequent among you, wherein you can lose no time to bee continually reading. But yet we haue not said all, that Landgartha (not hurried with ialousie, or tempest with fury for this refusal) fought any meanes whereby she might be reuenged: but in doing much more, surmounted all opinion and iudgement, giuing aide to him that had so shamefully left her, and doing good for euill, contrary to some stearne and combustible natures of her sexe, and as the sequell will more amply deliuer.

Reyners, being a Prince greatly addicted to Armes, seeing himselfe at home in peace, and that none of his neighbours sollicitated him by warre; because his Subjects (being naturally giuen to warre, and insured to courses both by Land and Sea) might not liue ydle and slothfull: he permitted them to pursue their fortune, passing them into the Isles of Ireland, Brittain and Scotland. Whereupon, the Iutes, and some other of the Scandian Territories, that bare him but bad affection, taking occasion by the Kings absence with his Forces, elected and created for their king, a Prince of royall blood, named Harolde, who shaping his course to the Emperor Lewes the debonnaire, that made his abiding then at Magnus, hauing receiued baptism with his followers: was sacred and crowned King of Denmarke, by authority Imperiall, doing homage to the Emperor for his Kingdom.

Harolde, being fauoured of his owne people, and affected by the most of them, that embraced Christianity (to whom Reyners was no way pleasing) and re-enforced by a goodly band of Germanes, wherewith the Emperor furnished him, to put him in possession of his lands: went into Denmarke, to expell Reyners thence, and all such as followed his Faction. Reyners, waxing weary againe of his wanton desires, returning home secretly into Denmarke: found strange alteration since his departure thence. His owne people he encouraged to stand fast with him, called the Sweatians also to his succour, and dispatching letters into Norway: requested assistance of her, from whom hee might more iustly expect warre then defence, and feruency of reuenge for his vile dealing.

What would an angry heart haue done in this case? A minde neuer satisfied but in doing ill; what an opportunity had it here to worke vpon? How would a man haue carried himselfe, hauing beene notoriously injured, and so faire a wayfarer wide open for him, as neuer was the like to bee expected againe: what haste would he make now to be fully reuenged? Without all contradiction, the breach of faith is very abominable, and wrongs receiued by Noble natures, are not easily qualified, when times and seasons shape out reuengesfull meanes, such as was this wanton upon the faithlesse Dane. Neuertheless Landgartha, hearing in what anguish her vnkind husband was, and considering with herselfe, that his ruine could not returne her any benefit, seeing also, that shee had two louely Daughters by him, and a Princely sonne, named Fridellaus (who afterward was King of Norway) motives sufficient for his longer abiding with her: shee leuiued an Army of fixe score Ships, euery one being worthily furnished, wherewith she intended to succour her distressed Husband, to whom shee sent tydings of her preparation and coming, in these few Lines.

The Letter sent by Landgartha, to her Husband, King Reyners.

If this my second duty may proue as happy, in the recovery of thy Lands & Kingdoms, as my first was against a Tyrant, and yet honouring thee with the victory: I shall account my paines well employed, and neuer expect any other recompence. Make head brachely against the Enemy, for I am coming with all speede, to let him know, that Land-

Landgartha.

The Rebels afraid of Landgarthas coming with her forces.

The Rebels, being aduertized of this supply from Norway, labored by all means possible to prouoke King Reyner to the fight, before the coming of Landgartha, whom they knew to be wife, and very skillfull in the Art Militarie. And the king knowing their intention, delayed the day of battell, by marching further off from them, towards the place where he expected Landgarthas landing, that their two forces might the sooner ioyne together, & then to give the enemy battell. Which Harolde well perceiving, and knowing, that such delay would redound to his disadvantage; he pursued after Reyner with such expedition, laying such traines and ambuscadoes for him, that he compelled him to handy blowes, euen at the verie same instant as Landgartha landed.

The fight fell out to bee very furious and bloody, and great numbers of men fell as well on the one side, as on the other, the chiefe Commanders being fiercely animated, the one to defend his Crowne, and the other to vnrise an estate, whereto he pretended a iust title, by reason of the quarrell betweene the King and his Subjects. And both of them standing on the aduantage of life, as well vnderstanding, that no fauour was to be expected, which side sooner proued to bee Conquerour.

The Danes put to the worst by Harolde, & Landgarthas worthy assistance in very great extremitie.

Now, though the Danes that followed Reyner, performed so much duty as warriours could do, sustaining many impetuous efforts of the assailants; yet were they constrained to turne their backs, beginning to fall into rout and disorder. By this time was Landgartha come neare to the Campe, where she made a pause a while, to see which side behaued it selfe brauest; and perceiving Reyners men in no meane extremitie, valiantly she entred amongst the thickest of them, incouraging her husbands soldiers on thus: On them braue spirits set on them manfully, they are our spoile, as villaines not deserving to lue, seeing traitterously they lift up their weapons against their king. On then (I say) vndaunted spirits, heere is Landgartha, who hath brought you victorie, as well against Harolde, as sometime she did against Frolo in Norway.

In deliuering these wordes, she dealt such bold blows among the Rebels, as they hardly knew which way to bestir themselves. Now the battell grew to be more fierce on either side the before: the Danes, to repaire their disorderd flight, th' other, to maintain their hope of victory, wherof they doubted not, but disdained a woman should deprime them of the occasion, of wholly ruinating Reyner and his Army. Neuertheless, whatsoeuer manhood Harolde and his men declared in the fight, yet they were oppressed by multitudes, being wearie, spent, & closely followed by the Norwegians, who were fresh, cheerefull and active, conducted by a woman of very high resolute, and as furious in warre, as modest and gracious in her Pallace. Thus were they enforced to fight, not without great losse of the very worthiest men in the Army, and the vanquished deliuered to the Conquerours mercie. But, though Reyner triumphed of the victory, yet hee enjoyed it by the fortune of her, who, albeit the might boast of her happinesse in war; and thereby attained to a great marriage; yet her other infelicity was a great correy to her heart, to be disdained where she ought to be most beloued & esteemed.

Reyner now was growne sensible of the shamefull wrong he had offered to his first wife, accusing himselfe of disloyaltie, and detesting his former leuitie, entreated her to take such reserue on him, as she thought fittest in her own iudgement. But she, being a Lady of vnmarchable mind, fearing lest the king (conquered by this obligation of duty to her) should commit an other fault, by leauing the K. daughter of Sweitia, who had brought him diuers children also: pardon all his passed iniquities to him, & vowing her selfe to a widowed estate of life, neuer more to conuersue with him or any man liuing after a solemne parting betweene them, she returned home into Norway, to gouerne the Countrey by her discrete care, till her son Fredisslaw should attaine to yeres of rule, and whom the K. there had constituted as his lawfull heire.

The remainder of this discourse, being more at large pursued by the Annallists of Denmarke, Sweitia and Norway; I purpose here to conclude the Historie, which I haue in this place set downe, more to relate the valour, counsell, aduice, good conduct and wisdom, seldom wanting in Ladies deriued from good birth; then I care for the idle loues of Reyner, or any of his Conquests. To the end, that such Ladies, as excell in the like vertues in these our times, may hold on in the pursuit of their perfections, by the honorable examples of them, that (in those precedent daies) declared themselves admirable in their actions, & imitable for their vertues and commendable carriage.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Bezaars Stone, which is reputed to be very vertuous and souveraigne, against all venomes and poysons.

The Bezaars Stone good against all venomes and contagions.

The Stone of the Bezaar or Pazer, is a true and assured Antidote against all poysons, venomes, bytings of venomous Beasts, infections of the Ayre; As pestilence, carbuncles or plague-sores, Purples, the small Pox, the Meazels, and in briefe, against all diseases popular and contagious. And because experience hath made this stone to be in daily request, and causeth it to be sought for by people of good meanes; therefore sale hath bene made thereof at extraordinary rates, and avarice being so great among men, hath therefore practised and compassed the meanes whereby to adulterate it, as heretofore they did the like by Baulme or Balsamum. But before I write any further thereof, I will tell you from whence they bring it, and how it is engendred in the bodies of certain creatures, which are like vnto Goats heere among vs; but they haue no horns, being of a reddish colour, and feed not but on good and wholesome Hearbes, wherof are plenty on the Mountaines, and where they startle at the least noise of a Piece. But for our better vnderstanding this History, I will insert a small parcell of a Letter, written from Peru by a Spanish Gentleman, to Monardus a Physician of Hispania, dwelling then in Senil, whereby we shall perceiue how they are found.

Whence the stone is brought and how it is engendred.

The Letter of a Gentleman residing in Peru.

The fifteenth of June, 1568, being at the exercise of hunting, with diuers of my friends, among the Mountaines in this Countrey of Peru, continuing at the sport for the space of five dayes, and hauing slain some of the Beasts called Bezaars; we dissected their bodies, to finde the stones. But it being a matter impossible for vs to do, because we were not used thereto: we demanded of the Indians, which we had brought with vs thither to attend upon vs; in what part of the body we might soonest finde them; whereto they made vs answer, that they knew it not. But a young Indian Lad, aged about tenne yeares, and being then in our company shewed vs where it was, and we found it in the first stomacke, where the food of the Beast falleth downe, to be ruminated or chewed afterward. Which when the Indians saw, they would haue killed the Boy, as being offended at his enstruction given vs: but we would not suffer them to doe him such violence, and although they are subiect to vs Spaniards, yet they are our deadly enemies. Notwithstanding, while we followed our pastime of hunting, they got the Boy aside and slew him, and afterward sacrificed him, as we were giuen to vnderstand.

Hunting of the Bezaar in Peru.

In what part of the Beast the stone is found.

He that feareth, betheth.

The Indians hold those stones in great esteeme, placing them for Ornaments in their Temples, which they call Guacas, adorning also their images with them, and many other things beside, as Gold, Silver, precious stones, and rich Jewels. And I repte it a matter of some admiration, that this Beast is not found in any of the hither Indias, but in the Mountaines of Peru, neyther could I see them any where else: albeit I haue trauielled through all the Kingdomes of Mexico and Peru. In the Prouinces and Isles of Maranion, Florida, and the Westerne Islands, I haue bene diligently informed, and by the Indians heere among vs, vpon vrging them to what use these stones are proper: And they haue assured mee, that they are singular against all venomes, eyther applied outwardly, or receiued inwardly; but especially against all harmes of the heart, and it expelleth wormes out of the body. Being put into wounds, made by imposedd Arrowes (as heere it is too much in use) it is an assured healing, and no other remedy could be found for it but that onely.

Stones are in some Beasts
more, and in other lesse,
according to their yeares.

In the first Beast that we dissected, wee found in a Bagge like a little wrie of stones, which Nature had there engendered, onely by the benefit of feeding on good and wholesome hearbs: and in all those which we dissected afterward, we found in some more, in others lesse, according as they were aged in yeares. It is to be noted, that although they are found also in Beasts of the same kinde, which broue and feede on the Plaines: yet they are not so vertuous, as in those bred vpon the Mountaines.

Thus you see in briefe, what was written by this Captaine (and indeed a very worthy Gentleman, living then in the Indias) to Nicholas Monardus, a learned Physitian, and dwelling in Seuill; whereby may be vnderstood, how and from whence these stones proceede. Now wee will heare what the Portugals say, who haue made their conquests farre off from thence, to know, whether they agree with the Spaniards in this report, or no.

Garcias d'Orta a Portuguese Physitian to the Viceroy in the Indies discovered by the Portugals, saith, that in Corazine, and in the Countries of Perfia, there is another kinde of Goates, of meaner greatness, which they call Pazans, in whose stomach or bulke are found stones of the Bezaars, the beginning of them being a small little straw, growing on to a certain greatness, by recouering many coates or tunicles: whereof some are found to bee as big as our common Beanes, others as Acornes, and other of more or lesse quantity, smooth for the most part, and in colour resembling a darke greene. The greatest, because the rarest, are more sought for then the lesser sort, by them of the Country where they are found, as reporting them to haue the most vertue. He reporteth, that he saw one which weighed five Ducates, and which was brought into Portugall, that would not be bought for threecore Ducats, albeit it was more worth whence it came: and in all those stones which are brought out of the Perfian Countries, a little straw or stalke is found in the very midst of them, as hath bene often approved.

This Stone (saith he) is not found in Perfia onely, but also in Malaca, and in the Ile which is named Pucati, nor farre off from the Promontory of Comorina. For, as they can betray those Beasts, so they kill them, and being well salted or powdered, they serue as good prouision for their Armies. In many of them are found very great bones, vnknewen to the people there inhabiting, or why the Portugals labour so much in search of them: which (indeed) is more for the said stones, then any loue they haue to the flesh, although it is very fauoury.

The Bezaars stones which come from Pera, haue no straws or stalkes in the midst of them; but onely a little cavity or hollownesse, wherein may be found some thicke dust or sand, which is of far greater efficacy then the stone it selfe. I haue scene five graines of this stone (in a little water of Mugwort) given to a Gentlewoman, who had bene seuen dayes in child-birth trauaile: and she was instantly deliuered of a childe dead and putrified. At the Castle of Lake, in the lower Lymosine, there was a great pestilence, whereof (in lesse space then foure & twenty houres) dyed three persons: afterward it tooke hold on the rest of the household, which were eightene in number. Each one receiued two graines of this stone e- uery morning, with a little water of Aemula Campana, continuing so for seuen daies space together, and not any one dyed afterward, or became further touched with the pestilence. Duers beside, that had carbuncles and sores, by vsing this stone, preferred their liues: It is very good also in application, to botches, byles, and all irkelome paines or swellings.

A young Gentleman, with whom it was my chance to be bathing in a River, was bitten in the leg by a Serpent, so that his leg was become very black, and greatly swollen: hee was aduised, to take foure graines of Bezaars Stone, with a small quantity of Rose-water, and a graine also was put into the wound; which caused the rancelling and paine to cease, and he was fully cured within twelue dayes space.

Monsieur le Vicomte de Conborn, and Lord of Chailcauueuf, Lieutenant for the King in Lymosine, reported to me, that he was touched with a pestilential Feauer at Paris, and whereof many dyed, of euery quality, age and sexe, and abandoned of all Physitions. By the aduice of his Father in law, the Marshall de Biron, he took Bezaars Stone for some few dayes, & with in a little while after, he recouered, grew to indifferent strength, and was much more healthily disposed, then any of them that had bene offended by the same disease, to the no little admiration of all them, that had knowledge of him and his sickness.

The Inhabitants of Ormuz (an Island that is most rich, situate vpon the red sea, and subiect to the Perfian) after they haue purged themselves in the Spring & Autumne: vse to take ten graines of this stone, in as many spoonfull of Rose-water, for five mornings following each other, by which meanes (they say) their health is soundly preferred, and youthfull disposition maintained. Against an inueterated scurfe on the head, or body, a loathsome itch, the wilde scab, called S. Martins mange, and (about all) against a confirmed ladv or leprosie; there is not any remedy like to this. As can well be witnessed by a Prelate of Langnedoc, liuing at this day, who would haue laige himselfe an hundred times, and throwne himselfe out of windows (if hee had not bene carefully respected) onely being tormented with that disease of S. Martins. But by vsing this stone, which hee tooke three Months together euery morning, and good government otherwise directed to him; hee is perfectly recouered. Now let vs see how true and natural stones are to bee discerned, from such as are counterfeit, and meerey adulterated.

The Moors are exceeding skilfull in knowing them, and especially, from what parts they are brought, in the doing whereof, the Moore will lay one in the palme of his hand, and closing it then fast together, he will breathe or blow strongly into his hand: if hee feeles his breathing to passe through his hand, he is assured then, that the stone is falsified. A great number of them are oftentimes to be solde at Lif-bonne, the cheefest Metropolitan City of Portugall, where is one of the most frequented Portes in al Christendome. And such as there buy them, content not themselves, with this order of trial made by the Moors; but dip a twined thred in the iuyce of a very venomous hearbe, which there they call Balisiera. Then passing it thwart the soote, or other part of any Beast (as of a Dog) for some few dayes, hee fo leaueth it in the wound, vntill such time as hee feeleth those accidents, which commonly seize on them: that are poysoned. And when he is perceived to draw neere death; then to make him swallow three or foure graines of Bezaars stone, mingled with water: if it preferue his life; it is an apparant signe of the stones goodnes and perfection; but if not, it is adulterated.

The Beast in whose body these stones are found, in Perfia and other parts of that Climate, as in Comorina (according to the writing of Garcias d'Orta, who had scene of them in diuers places) hath horns bending backward, but those in Pera haue none at all. Thence saith, that they haue but one, and that the skinn of the saide Beast is kept, to be laid to the stomack of man or woman, possessed with any paine or anguish there, and to procure digestion; and that (without all question to the contrary) this skinn healeth all such diseases; although the persons be aged and decrepit. Moreover, that he saw a stone of the Bezaars, or Bezaars, in the custody of the Greekes Patriarch of Cypr, which was as big as a good great Nut: if it were so, that stone was worth no meane summe of money. It were a thing miraculous, to finde a stone of such greatness; & yet he further saith, that an Arabian Captain had it giuen him, because hee was secretly conuerted, and became a Christian.

It is not to be thought, that this stone hath bene knowne but within some smal compasse of time; because antiquity speakeeth of it more then five hundred yeares since. For proofe whereof, Rafis, an Arabian Physitian maketh mention thereof, though not relating from whence it was brought, or where it is to bee found: yet he affirmeth, that it resisteth all kindes of poyson, and that hee made experiment thereof vpon a childe, that innocently had eaten a venomous plant, called Napellus, which causeth death immediately; and yet by giuing him a small quantity of this stone, his life was preferred. This stone hath bene so highly esteemed, and especially in those preecedent times; that, as it is reported by Abdara Narach, an Arabian Doctour, in physicke, who was then at Corduba, about those later yeares, when the Sarrasens about their vlturpation in Spain: he saw a Bezaars stone, in the hand of one of the children of Amirama (a great and diligent obseruer of Religion) for which he gaue in exchange, a very goodly house which he had in Corduba, equall (well neere) to a Princes Pallace. And the said Abdara further saith (alleading the forenamed Rafis) that this stone being worne about a mans necke, and kept so neere to the heart as may be; defendeth it and the party from all infection, & no poyson can offend the body of him, that hath it thus about him.

Seeing then, that this Stone hath so many good and singular vertues in it, methinks, men (of meanes and worth) should sildome or neuer be without it, for a present succour in such weighty infirmities. Beside, Apothecaries of skill and iudgement, should euermore be well provided of them, because Physicians continually prescribe it in their directions, which they would not do, if they knew men to be vnfurnished of it. For more assurance is to be reposed in it (next to the assisting power of Heauen) then in Treacle or Mithridatum, the consecration of Alkermes, &c. of Zacinth. As is too well knowne by many barbarous Kings; gouerning in those Regions, where the Beasts are bred that engender these stones, reposing such confidence in them, and making so precious estimation of them; as they cause the expressly to bee brought from all parts. And when they are possessed of them, it is a difficult case to get any one from the: which partly is the reason, why they are so deare and rare to be had.

Heere the Reader likewise is to bee aduertised, that some of these stones are not pointed, or sharply cornered; but blunt, edgelesse and rounded, like to the little fingers ende, or as an Acorne. And although some are found to be great, yet commonly they are but as our ordinary Almonds, and not pointed. They haue also diuers foldes or lappings, one wrapping ouer another, like vnto Onions, all sleecke and smooth: for if you finde the otherwise compacted, they are to bee rejected as false and counterfeit.

One of these stones was presented to Charles the ninth, King of France, hee being then at Molins, which he caused to be essayed vpon two persons, that had deferved ignominious death, & both of them hauing poyson giuen them to drinke.

One of them was holpen by the stone, who neuertheless dyed; and the other that tooke it not, dyed also. The stone being broken, was found thicke and massiue, not diuided by Spherickall robes or foldings, and was throwne into the fire: And the giuer, who expected to deriue some great recompence from his Maiesty, had nothing at all, but frowning looks of the King, and the Queene his Mother, for his reward.

Concerning the generation of Pearles; where, and how they are found, from whence they are brought; and of their value and estimation.

I Haue read many Authors, to be resolu'd assuredly, concerning the generation of Pearles: but I could finde none of one consent, or agreeing together, and namely, such as frequent the Indies in these dayes, are diuers and doubtfull also in their answers. For some say, that they are engendered in Fish-shells, like to those of our Oysters heere among vs, but much greater, and somewhat longer. And when they are desirous to conceiue (vrge'd thereto by nature, and at a certaine time) they open of themselves, to sucke in and draw the dew of heauen: when, if the Ayre bee cloudy or lowring, then they engender troubled Pearles; and if it be windy, they cannot conceiue, so long as the wind continueth. But how fabulous this is, I refer to others iudgement: because in one and the same shell, are found Pearles troubled, cleare, & of diuers colours and formes.

Others say, that the proper birth and production of the Oyster, is by eggs, whereof they are produced, and that the Pearls come forth of the sand and grauelly dust, whereby they are nourished, & wherein they hide themselves: which grauell refretheth it selfe, & encreaseth in them, as the graines of the Raisin in the Grape. And this sandy seed sofneth it selfe, the Oyster being in the water: but so soone as it is out of the water, it hardneth of it selfe, as we may see daily: and this is another opinion of our Pearles production.

Of Pearles
found among rockes,

The Merchants of Egypt, that at this day Traffique with them, and bring them from the Persian Sea, make men here believe that negotiate with them: that pearls are engendered in the stomacke of a flatte Fish, round like to a Trencher-plate, and as big as a common plate, which is found on the shores of Nilus; and that it drinketh the dew of heauen, as wee formerly sayd of the Oyster, all which is a meere fable. And although the Egyptians of these dayes know the matter truly, yet notwithstanding, meaning to mocke such as are ignorant in these things, they publish lies for apparant truths. Alrothones sayth, Pearles are engendered in Oysters, as certaine white and solide graines are in the Flesh of Swine, which we vse to tearme Meazels, & is made of a clammy slime, congealing and hardning of it selfe. Which I thinke to be very likely: For, being at Paris in the year 1566, and (in assistance with others) at the dissecting of a womans body, long troubled with a disease in the reines, in each of the reines was found a solide substance or body, as big as a common Pearle, glistering, cleare and round; like vnto Pearles.

Charles the Mitlenian saith, Pearles are made of the bones of the Oyster; but then he is much deceyued, because the bones are alwayes in seruice to strengthen the body; but Oysters haue no need of bones: and likewise Pearles are not found in all of them; and if they had bones, then they would be found in all Oysters.

Americus Vesputius, in his booke of Indian Navigations writeth, that he obserued the opening of many, & out of some certaine Pearles, which had not attained (as yet) to their maturity and perfection; being in some pretty store or number; but yet those Pearles perished of themselves, and came to nothing. But in them that were more aged, Pearles were founde in the flesh of the Oyster, easily parting from it, and those were the best. And they that are found in them so aged and ancient, were wrinkled and very darke; which is likely to be true, if we do well consider thereon.

It is a meere Fable, which some haue divulged, that Pearles are found among the Rockes, by reason of many fishes laying their Egges, and because they cleaue to the flesh, or to the shell; but this happeneth very rarely. For, all Oysters are not apt to procreate Pearles, but onely such as are rude, white, and pointing, like to the teeth of a Combe; which the Persians call Cherripo, cleere and verie smooth within: of which shelles are made Cups, Boxes, Spoons, and other very costly things. Some are found in other kinds of Oysters; but they are neither so great, nor so good, as these that the Cherripo produceth, which some haue termed mother of Pearles.

Heere we may note the variety of opinions, concerning the production of Pearles, the knowledge whereof is much concealed: for Oysters keepe alwayes at the depths of the sea, because their shelles are great, and therefore they are so deepe in the sea. If sometimes they are founde neerer to the shores, it happeneth by tempests of the sea; also they swim heere and there, to seek their best nourishments; which when they haue found, there they stay, vntill they haue eaten all they can find. Then if they sene, or perceiue such as seek for them, they will fasten themselves so strongly to the rockes & stones, ouer-couering one another: as very hardly can they be forced thence, but oftentimes labour is bestowed in vaine; and they lye there, as being imagined to be stones.

They are fished for in store of sundrie Countreys and Regions; but the goodliest and those most common, are fished for in the Isle of Baharem, an Island bigge enough, and well peopled; being subiect to the Viceroy of Ormuze, and is neere to the Cape of Masina, in Arabia Felix; & there is no meane fishing for them. In the Isles of Mantula also, is continual fishing for them (they being as good there, as those of Baharem) and the Isle seated on the Persian Gulfe, an hundred Leagues by thereabout, from Calicut, and almost throughout the inner India. In the Isle of Zellin, in the Isles called Viquez, and to thorowe the great Empire of Mexico At Tarat, more then in any of the forenamed Islands, and in the Isles of the New World, they haue bene fished for in such plentie: that the Casies or Prince of the said Isle, made a present of a Casket full of Pearls, to Gaspard de Morales (a Spanish Commander) which weighed an hundred and ten pounds. A Merchant, being named Peter du Port, bought the said Pearle of Gasper de Morales, for eightene hundred Ducates of gold, and after he had bought it, hee could not sleepe for melancholy, and inward griefe he conceived, because he had giuen so much money for a stone: yet hee sold it againe on the next morrow (& for the same price) to Pedrarus d'Avila, for his Wife, the Lady Isabella Bonadilla, who also sold it to the Empreffe, Madame Isabella. A few named Daniell, bought of a country peazant of Baharem (no long time since) a Pearle, of the greatnesse of a Musket Bulle, for no more then the summe of eight shillings; and afterward sold it to a Lord in Sclauonia, for three thousand Crownes. There was a present made to Fernando Magellano, in one of the Isles of the Molucces, of foure Pearles, each one of them being as big as a Pigeons Egge; and they were esteemed worth an hundred thousand Crownes. at the least.

In our neerer
Seas they fish
for Pearles, & finde some stone.

Returning now to our former purpose, which was to describe where Pearles are found, I say, that not onely they fish for them in the fore-named places: but likewise in all other Seas, bee it eyther of the South or Oceans of Peru, the Antarctike, Florida, Canada, Guinea, yea, euen here in our neerer Seas, of England, Scotland, and Denmarke; but in some place they are better, fairer, greater and rounder then in other. And namely in some parts of France, as at Rouen, Dieppe and Rochelle, where some are found very rare and passable. Now let vs observe, how, and in what manner their fishing is for them.

How and in what manner
they fish for such Oysters
as haue pearls
in them.

Such as are appointed for this manner of fishing, entring into their Barques, and (leaving some to tend and haue care of them, and to keepe the Oysters after they are brought to them) leape by great numbers into the Sea, remaining sometimes vnder water halfe an houres space, before they be seene againe, and so continue at the bottome: hauing strong pockets, or small twisted nettings hanging about them, wherein they put their Oysters. Which being thus taken, they ascende aboue water againe, and are receiued into their Ships: where hauing a while taken their ayre, and strengthened their bodies with some sustenance; they put on their wrappers againe before their faces, which commonly are thin waxed toylets, as fine as the bladders of Swine, that they may the clearer see in the water. Five or sixe times in a day, thus they throw themselves into the water, and towards night returne home with their takings, I meane such Oysters as they hope to finde Pearles in.

Vpon the Sea-shore there are a great number of slaues, as well women as men, who as often as the Oysters are brought on land; fill their Scuttles and Baskets, made of Sea Rushes, carrying them to Vessels full of fresh water; wherein when the Oysters haue continued foure and twenty houres space, and feeling a contrary saour to the Sea-water; they open of themselves, and so soone as they are open, the Pearles funder themselves from the flesh of the Oysters. Afterward, the Merchants emptying the shells out of the vessels, finde all the Pearles in the bottome of the fresh water, and thus they gather the Pearles of Peru, and likewise in other places. Nevertheless, they are not the hundred part so good, nor so fair, as those of Baharem and Manila: And observe withall, that Pearles are not found in euery Oyster, but in some few, in other more, some breeding the greater, other smaller.

The Pearles being thus taken, sometimes they cate the Oysters, and otherwhiles they throw the away, as being wearie and ouer-glutted with them by too frequent vse. These Fishers are slaues, seruing (for this purpose) the Christian Merchants, Maronites, Iewes or Indians, which traffick in Baharem: and according to their taking pearled Oysters, so are they cherished and respected by their Masters euery night; which maketh euery one strue to be most beneficiall by his paines. Some times the Seas are swolme more high & boisterous, then the Fishers would haue them to be, because then it is an hinderance to their tarrying long vnder water; and then they make prouision for them-themselves in this manner. They haue a corde, at each end whereof they fasten a stone, which corde they binde about their Backes, and so sincking downe into the Sea, by the weight of those stones, they continue firmly vnder water, and gather the Oysters at their ease: and when they would mount vp to the Shippe, lightly they cast off the stones, and swimme nimbly in their rising. Such as would meddle in fishing for these Oysters, it behooueth them to be very expert in swimming and diuing; because many drown themselves, through want of taking winde, or else are drawne into the depth of the sea, by huge and mighty Fishes, which there they met withall, and then by no means can escape drowning.

Marcus Paulus
was an eie wit-nesse of this manner of fishing for pearls.

Marcus Paulus saw this kind of fishing in the kingdom of Para, which is in India, where it was performed in the same manner, and he sayth, that they fish not but in the moneth of Maie, and then the Peasants or Boores are set on worke by the Merchants. The King hath his Tenths or Tithes, and certain Sorcerers or Enchanters, there called by them Abraimmins, haue the twentieth part, and the Peazants haue their payment in money. Here you must know, that without these Enchanters, they that fish in this manner for Oysters, should bee deuoured by certaine greedie and venomous fishes, as Crocodiles, Whales, and other such like deuourers: but they coniure them in such sort, that they escaped from them without any danger. But when night commeth, and the fishing must be forborne till the morrow; the Enchanters release and make their coniurations to cease: onely to prevent theues, who else (in the night time) would plunge and diue into the water, knowing they may doe it safely without perill, and so carry away the pearly Oysters, and frustrate the Merchants of their expectation.

rations doe

Moreover, there is no people in all the Countrey, that can enchant those terrible fishes, or doe know the words belonging to this coniuration, but onely these Abraimmins. And it is to be noted, that all such as traffick in this fishing; doe not cause the Oysters to open themselves in fresh water; but in some Countries, they open them with little knives, or sharpe pointed bodkins. And in many other places, as in the Indies lately discouered, they set their Oysters ouer a fire, and so by heat procure them to open, by which means they finde the Pearles: but then those pearles appeare of a reddish colour, and carry no chearefull water.

Also it is to be obserued, that all pearls are not write of themselves naturally, but in some places they are found to bee red; as in the Island of Zipangrie, situate in the East Indies, according as the said Venetian Paulus reporteth. And yet there they haue great plenty of them, very singularly excellent, both for greatnes and roundnesse: and in those Countries, they are of deare value, price and estimation, that those white doe carry no comparison with them. Somewhat I can say of my selfe, that I haue seene seauen redde pearles, and no more, belonging vnto the late deceased Dutchesse of Valentinois; which had a most goodly lustre, and I was (for a while) perswaded, that they wonne that colour by some artificiall meanes: but after I had read the Discourse of Marcus Paulus, then I became to be of another opinion. &c.

Heere likewise will I insert a great secret in nature, and (in my minde) very meruailous, reported to mee by men of good credite, that haue seene the fishing for those Oysters, and found it true by their owne experience. In a certaine season of the year, these Oysters of pearles, doe belch and cast forth a red and blood-like moisture, in great abundance: so that many (of the best in iudgement) among those barbarous people, imagined them to suffer a fluxe of menstruositie, as other fishes in the flume Ocean doe. These Oysters haue their passages, like to all other fishes in Seas or Rivers, so that in some places great store of them is to be found, and within a while after, a rare matter if tenne remayne there to be had, but all are fallen downe aboue tenne miles further off. Sometimes, they which fish in an other Countrey, where scarcely one is left on the morrow or next day, shall light on more then euer was there before.

The Persians haue moreover inuented an other manner of fishing, more commodious, and of lesse charge and perill. By making of hurdles of Osters or Palms, well knit together with strong bindings, in such manner as the fishing obserued in our Xantoge Seas for Caslerons, vsing certaine Rakes, which rash into the Sea sands, and when they find the beds of Oysters, so force the enter into those hurds. Others walke along amongst the Rocks and Stones, which appeare aboue the water, where oftentimes, they finde some of those Oysters, so fast knit to the Rocks or Stones, as very much labour can scarcely get them off, without breaking the rocke or shell of the Oysters, and then taking from thence the Pearle, so soone as the shell is broken; for otherwise it diminisheth, and doth loose the true and naturall colour.

The Indians, Arabians, Persians and others, in ancient times, made no more account of Pearles, then of ordures and corruptions which the Seas cleered them selues of, during the seasons of their turbulence and boyling. But now wee haue so well enstructed them, in knowledge both of the worth and profic, that they can skill of the goodnesse, and value of things in such sort, as they will sell those commodities at rates deare enough. The Egyptian hath bene quicke witted alwayes, as hauing knowledge in good letters of longest continuance, adding his studious contemplations, to vnderstand the secrets of Nature: so that Pearles and precious Stones, at all times hath tasted of his approbation and esteeme. The slaues and basest peazzants in the Isle of Babareu, and other adiacent partes of firme Land, neighbouring vpon the Sea; haue oftentimes found Nacres and Oysters on the shoares, beeing dead, and yet they made search into them, and often they found very fayre and also rich Pearles.

Pliny saith, that Oysters haue a King amongst them, according as the like is affirmed of the Bees, Antes, and a guide allotted to the Cranes, and that this king is elected and chosen (by being the very fayrest and greatest) to take a carefull charge of all the rest: And that is the Oyster, which the fishers or diuers couer most to finde, being then assured, that the rest will not feare to followe. Athenens alleadgeth another Fable, as thus: That they doe strue to reuenge themselves on the fishers, by opening their shells, so to catch holde of their fingers. But such opinions are merely frivulous, and they which ordinarily fish in the Oyster-Seas, make a mockerie of such reports. Beside, our Naturalists stand in doubt, whether Cockles, Scallops, Mufcles, Oysters, and such like shell-fish (living in the water) haue any part of vnderstanding. And, by the same reason, if they haue the meanes of withdrawing themselves, vpon sight of the fishers comming, or from any other fish (opposite or contrary to them) endeavouring to eate and deuoure them.

There is a fish, which is very opposite to the Oyster, being termed by the Persians, Taruphall, or Taball, and is of the bignesse of a midling Salmon, hauing a hard skinnie, yet without scales, and his finnes of an azure colour. This fish hath a little head, a sharpe nose or snout, seruing for his mouth, which is full of sharpe teeth: and these pearly Oysters are his delicious diet, luing (almost) by no other kind of foode. When he is desirous of feeding, he watcheth till such time as the Oysters beginne to open, as oftentimes they doe, beeing in the Sea: whereof making his advantage, and thrusting in his nose, hee deuoureth the fish quickly, leaving the shell quite emptie. The fishermen of the Islands, labour diligently to catch this fish, and first of all they open her bowells, wherein they finde store of very goodlie Pearles: then feede they on the fish, because it is dainty and delicate meate. The fewer number of Pearles they finde in an Oyster, so much the greater and fayrer they are, and where they chauce on anie store, they are the clowdier and small. Some are found to be so little, that they can not bee drilled by any meanes; and therefore they call them Seede-pearles, which are purposely kept for Apothecaries, who employ them according to their owne knowledge and experience, or as they are aduised by the Physitian.

The most commendable forme and shape of the pearle, is said to be that which is roundest; yet that in fashion of a Pearle or Akorne, is not much worse; and next to these is that like to a little Nutte: nor doe they reiect such as are writhed and wrinkled, nor the very smallest; but all are employed and made vse of: the best for the richest people, and the other for them of lower qualitie, because they are worn by all degrees of persons, as well men as women, in regarde they are growne to be so common. No Prouince doe I know, whereunto more Pearles are brought, then into Spain, and next into France, within some small compasse of time, which makes mee so much to maruell at them the more.

In brieft, Pearles haue surpassed the riches of gold and siluer, and of Emeralds brought from forth the Indies. And yet I would gladly know the reason, wherefore our graue Auncients made such estimation of Pearles; considering they knew them not to haue any medicinable vertue, and in regard also, they grew quickly olde, as we plainly perceiue, when they haue lost their lustre, clearnesse and whitenesse. For my selfe, I cannot imagine what should be the reason, except it be in regarde of their whitenesse, which is not common to other precious stones: and I perceiue, that no account is made of them, which are of another colour, although they be of the self-same substance. Some haue enstructed mee in an other reason, to wit, because they haue bene brought from the new-found world, and likewise, that in times past, they fetch them from very farre remote Countries, which needs must vrge the more affection to them, because they come from farre hence: Or else wee make such deare estimation of them, in regarde that (many times) they cost the liues of men in fishing for them, as partly we haue before reported. The greatest Pearles are called in Latine Vniões, because sildome or neuer we shall light on two, that are alike eyther in greatnesse, roundnesse, or splendour, or answerable in weight: for wee finde them alwayes separated one from another, and not ioyned together; And the lesser sort they vse to call Marguerites.

After that the Merchants haue them in their power, they permit them to be persued by diuers people, wherein the Indians and Persians are the best exercised, as beeing naturally enclined thereto by frequent practise. Nor do Pearles continue still in one and the same condition, for the truth is, they will fade, wither and waxe light by course of times: especially such as are caught after the full Moone. But being kept in the floure of Rice, mingled with Bay-Salt, they will recouer their former beauty and weight. But they which are caught deepeft, and in the new Moone, are neuer subiect to any such inconueniences.

The flesh (as they vse to call it) or body of the Pearly Oyster, is most wholsom, and of great nourishment; excellent good against melancholy, and for such as languish, or are in a consumption, and also for Hectiques and Tificks. But the Indians make no vse of Pearles in their medicines, although the moderne Physitians of the Arabes and Moors doe, which hath bene learned of them by some of ours, and vsed in all cordiall medicines, being good also for the eyes, finely beaten into powder, and held as an especiall preseruatiue for the sight. To the Reader.

Know (Gentle Reader) that Custome commands an Epistle to thee, for Favourable Acceptance, and honest Entertainment of such a great Labour. But I am (at this time) forced to Write unto thee, both on the behalfe of my selfe and the Printer: in regard of many Escapes, which usually chanceth in Printing, by reason, that immediately after the Bookes beginning, sicknesse & other infirmities, did bereave him of his sight. If therefore any thing do or may appeare offensiv, either in Method or Matter, I would not have thee displeased in any thing whatsoever, or that any Argument thorough the whole Booke, should be (in the least degree) preiudiciall to thee. Therefore, accept it with like Love and Kindnesse, as it is sent unto thee, in Honest Affection and Friendlinesse.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Vertue and excellency of Hony, and how it ought to be vsed and applied.

Adam, the Florentine Phisition, a Man most-cou-tous, for he would not go forth of the City, to vi-person; except hee might haue fittie Crownes allowed him for his paines; and to visite Pope Honorius, he had each day allowed him an hundred Crownes.

This Man persuing the workes of Car-danus (who left a small Treatise, which was (as yet) neuer imprinted to our knowledge, for hee liued in the yeare one thousand two hundred and fourescore) found certaine places, where hee discourfed of Milke, Wine, Beere, and many other things; but he observed one especiall Chapter, concerning Ho-ny and Manna, & that hee alleged Galen therefore, but declareth not out of which Booke he deriued his Authority.
I enquired of many learned Phisitions, whether it were true or no, that Galen had written on any such matter? Some told me, that they had neuer reade any such thing in his Workes: yet others affirmed, that hee had made some report thereof, in his Booke of the Preseruation of Health. But whether it be so or no, seeing the discourse is commendable, and full of learning: this Chapter shall containe some portion of his relation, to the end, that the Reader (not as yet there-with acquainted) may vnderstand the Vertue of Hony.

He deliuereth it for certaine, that Galen had seene two men, very different in yeares, for the one was old, and well necre; decrepitate; and the other, in the best time of his age. These men were most contrary in opinion, concerning Hony yet brought to agreement, by store of good reasons, as you shall per-ceiue. The Auncient and decrepitate Man saide; that Hony made him verie healthfull, because it gaue warmth to his Body; stayed the fluxe in his belly, when it greatly pained him; cleansed his Lights and Lungs, when they were

ouer-charged with raw and indigested Phlegme, onely by spitting; made his Vrine come orderly, and (consequentie) discharged the Reines. Hee had also seene some, who were impositions with Opium, and had daungerously fed on venomous Mushromes or Toad-stooles; that recovered found health by the vse of Hony. He said moreover, that he had had an inneterate & fordid Vicer in one of his Legs, for which he could compasse no remedy, by application of manifold very likely helpes; and yet he was thorowly cured, and the Vi-cer consolidated by Hony onely. He said also, that he heard of many, who were cured of Tetters, Itch, and Ring-wormes; by application of Hony: beside, giuers others, that had loud ticklings, noyses, and winds in their eares;
yea, & were almost stark deafe; yet hol-pen by Hony. It caused quick motion in the Pulses, and (vsed as a Gargarisme) it is a singuler remedy against the squinzy, Kernels in the Necke, & swolne Ald-monds in the Mouth, and forseene in the Throat. Applied to the eyes, it took away thicke mistes and vapours, which oftentimes obscureth sight.

In breefe, the old man was assuredlie perswaded, that there was not a better Aliment or Medicament in all the World, then Hony; according to the experience he had made thereof, vpon his owne person. Having spoken these things with good iudgment and discretion, he held his peace, and Galen commanded the other party, to speak what he could concerning Hony, so highlie commended by the olde Man; admonishing him withall, to deliuer his minde without passion or choller, and likewise to set aside all partiall affection: For Galen found (accidentally) these two Men thus disputing. The young Man being Chollerique, prompt; ambitious, and impatient; perswaded himselfe of victory before hand; and to preuayle against the graue man. But Galen, who had great credite in many partes of the world (in regarde of his singuler knowledge, and renoune of his learned labors, being also Phisition to the Emperors *M.
Antoninus Aurelius Verus*, and to his successor Commodus) requiured silence; and having heard the aged mans report, was as desirous also to heare the young man, mended the young man to speak.

tion against

and giuing him a signall when to begin,
he arose vp (as in anger) and proceeded
in this manner:

I protest to speake nothing at this instant, concerning Hony, which I haue not experienced in mine owne person;
and it may be, more truly and certainly,
then he hath any way made prooue of the like. I protest withall, that it is the most pernitious aliment or medicament, that can be vnder heauen. For, I haue diuers times made vse thereof (vpon vrgent necessity) hauing bene surprized on the Sea by Pyrats, who kept mee captiue for diuers moneths; when I was constrained to feed thereon, enforced thereunto by meere hunger; but hauing eaten it, I found my stomack wholly vndigestible, with much procuring to casting, which brought me (at length) to such gripes in the belly, that by the meanes of Windinesse, which it extremely caused, I looked for no escape with life. Beside these things, it brought mee to a dry Cough, and engendred such a number of worans in a friend of mine: that notwithstanding hee dranke Vineger, for want of better Wine, he must needs haue dyed, if hee had not voided them.

The vsing of Hony, after my deliue-rance, made me fall into a Feauer Terrian; during which time, by aduise of som, I dranke nothing but Hydromell, or Me-steglin, which is a Breuage made of Ho-ny, and foddren Water, boiled till the third part thereof bee consumed, and it prolonged my diseafe; but so soone as I made pure Water my drinke, I mended presently.

Moreover, the skinn being (by a mis-chance) a little flayed off my foot; by the aduise of some Women, I vsed an oyment of Honic, which neuer brought any skin againe; but when I applied a litle burnt Paper thereto, it dried and healed it verie speedily. Briefly, I conclude, that Honic is neither Aliment, nor wholsom Medicament, either for the inward or outward affections; but contrariwise, it is verie dangerous and hurtfull to Nature.
He pronounced these wordes with such vehementie and affection, according to his vse and behauiour; as if he wold haue tome the aduersarie partie in pieces with his teeth and nailes.

Galen then spake with great Modestie, (albeit he was by nature, as Chollerick as the other) that both of them had deliue-red the truth, & no man needed to make anie doubt, because hee wold make it presently apparant. It is most certaine (quoth hee) that this aged man speaketh nothing but truth, declaring what goodnesse he findeth in Honic; because H-nic is hotte, and all Aliments or Nutriments of hot Nature, doe agree with all persons, ages, and sexes, temperately, or of cold complexion. But this man is of a Flegmaticke complexion, old, subiect to many cold distillations, Flegmatick and Quotidian Feaures; and therefore it is no maruell, though he giue such assurance, and finds the vse of Hony wholesome for him. But yet it is verie likely, that he doth not vse it indifferently, as it is brought from the Bee-hiue, but rather prepareth it: for he causeth it to be boyled, foddren, and taketh off the scum, in which manner it nourisheth and conuerteth into good blood. If it much help him in restraining the Flux of his Belly, it was in this regard, that being in that manner prepared, it had no mordication in it, neither excited any gripings, as it doth when it is crude and raw, as my Great Schoole-maister Hippecrates hath litle written. And whereas hee saith, that it made speedy discharge of his Vrine and Reines, from Sand and Gra-uell, whereto in age he became much subiect: surely, being boiled with Water, (which the Physitians call Mulla) it hath out of question, such Vertue. By coughing and spitting, it cleanseth the Lightes and the Liuer; and the Pipes being charged with colde Flegmes (diseases vvhich depend vpon age) when it is thus reduced into a Syrtrope, and taken in Mornings long before feeding, it is verie soueraign, and excellent also, to make olde people liue merrily.

It cannot bee good for such as haue drunke Opium, or cold poison, by misadventure, follie, or pride of mind (as now adaies the Turkes, and a great part of the Grecians vse to do) but it is necessary that the Honic should be verie aged, as often or twelue yeares at the least, boyled and clarified in Wine often or twelue yeares old; and being so prepared, it correcteth the great coldnesse of the faide Opium or poison: Against Mushromes or Toad-stooles (which are commonly venomous) vndoubtedly, it is a most certain remedy, as he hath formerly said: but it must then be ordered into a Syrpe, as in that nature it is viced, to displace phlegme, and an old dry cough. Hydromell or Methegin gargarized, doth very well cleanse all hinderances, which proceede from any thicke phlegme, either in the throat, Puula or the Almondess. Concerning the fardide and inueterate Vicer, which he seemeth to haue had in his leg, and cured it by the helpe of Hony: the case is very euident, for Hony cleanseth, cleareth, and is vter enemy to all foridity or filthinesse, and hauing thus neared the Vicer; it easily heals & closeth it vp. Touching that which he alleadged, of some, who haue distilled & put Hony into their eares, being deaffe- ned, full of the braine: this must be vnderstood of very old Hony, foddren with foure times as much old Wine, for all hot medicaments (as very olde wine and Hony are) they doe disperse windes very easily, and other cold causes, which procure deaffe- nesse, and other accidents in those parts.

That it causeth the drying vp of Itches, Tettters, Ring-wormes, and other such like defoedations in the skinn; proceede from hence, that it is absterfiue of his owne nature, and a great enemy to all corruption, for whatsoeuer things are confectioned in Hony, will neuer corrupt. By the same reason, it worketh the death of Itches and Tettters, which are nothing else, but meere vncleannesse and filthinesse of the body. In regard of fight, questionlesse, being mingled with a little Fennell water, and so distilled into the eyes; it quitteth them from blearings and watery humors, which congealing in the, doth greatly trouble the sight, especially in such as vie ouermuch weeping. To conclude, Ladies and Gentlewomen doe wash their faces and hands therewith, to keepe them smooth, faire and white. And Cato was wont to say; That to liue long, we must vse Hony within the body, and oyle without.

Galen thus finishing his prooffe (by very good reasons) that the olde man had spoken truly; would not so giue it ouer, but though the young man (who was oppositively contrary to the other) had declared so much against Hony; yet would he maintaine the truth of his speeches likewise. And directing his eye to him, began in this manner, discourring with plenty of words, after the Astetic course, and not Laconically, as his good and ancient M. Hypocrates was wont to do in his time. Let no man count it strange (quoth he) if thou doe mislike the vse of Hony, and lay so much blame vpon it: for it is very contrary to thy nature, being of an angry and cholericke temper, hot in action, and easily displeased. And though I had not heard thee speak, nor beheld any action of thine; yet very light had beene sufficient to me; thy haire being red, thy skin yellowish, thy body leane and meagery, these are enow whereby to direct iudgement. First, let me tell thee, that diseases are neuer cured, but by their contraries, for whereas thou saidst, that thou hadst a Feauer tertian, and supposed it to come by the vse of Hony, a food enforced in the time of thy captiuitie: I make no doubt at all thereof, for Hony conuerteth it selfe quickly into red chollier, in any body naturally hot, as thine is, and I wonder it did not more hurt vnto thee, because it was in no manner prepared. For albeit that many viands are good, yet there be some that (before they are eaten) doe require preparation, to correct a certaine malignity, which they haue naturally in them. As Coriander, which is venomous of it selfe; Neuerthelessse, corrected with Vineger, it is an excellent medicine for the stomack, trauided with indigestions, and filled with windes. In like manner, crude and raw Hony, not repurged from his excrement, offendeth the stomack, engendering a desire of casting, and descending into the intestines, begetteth there such windinesse, and so painefull gripings, as are not possible to be declared, and therefore thou hast affirmed nothing but truth. As for the drie cough which is raised in thee, there is no doubt thereof, for but by eating it raw; some part thereof must needs fall into the conuoye of the lights and liuer, as it doth in all liquid things (that are thick and impure) receiued into the body. And his tartnesse or saltnesse (not being summed away before) prouoketh a dry cough; yet auoyding nothing in spitting, because no matter at all was defected to the lights & liuer. Which hapned not in like sort to this old man, for he had phlegm enough in him, to let fall downe ordinarily vpon those parts. But for that report, that Hony should engender wormes; it is quite contrary to all reason; because all things steeped in Hony, are exempt from mine mine or corruption. But if it fall out, that a man vsing Hony, had wormes before, or is inclined naturally to them: then it doth maintaine and nourish them, euen as Sugar doth; but it can bee no cause of their generation.

Concerning Hydromell or Methegin, drunke in the continuance of thy Feauer Tertian, and presumed to prolong the same: there is nothing more certaine, then that this drinke (composed of Hony and Water) did it. But it was not caused by any defect in the liquor, which of it selfe is most wholesome, for Men of melancholly habitude, and for diseases of black Chollier and Phlegmaticke: but for any cholericke person, such as thy selfe is, most certaine is it, that it is a true foment, and a maintainer of fiery Agues, euen such as thine then was, and he was greatly to be blamed, that thereto did aduise or counsel thee. And whereas thou saidst, that it is an enemy to such places, as the skin is flaid or gne off: it is to be considered, that it was no Vicer, like vnto the other; for it detergeth, cleareth, and dryeth not. To regenerate new skinn, we must not apply deterfiue Medicines, but such as are desiccative, without any mortification. And I credit well, that burnt Paper was much more conuenient for it: but yet we must not say, that if Medicines be badly vsed, they are not therefore good, being fitly applied.

I conclude then (by these reasons) that you both haue spoken very well of Hony, albeit ye are so different in opinion: but all your contrariety hath no other ground, but that the younger man of ye both, did not vse Hony duly, and with consideration and good iudgement, according as the circumstances required. Thus Galen gaue ending to this Controuersie, and it was to be feared, that if Galen had not thus moderated the matter, the difference had caused blowes between them. Such debates and contentions, are daily seen in Country Townes and Villages; when a man will rashly commend his Scithe, Hatchet, Sickle, Dogge, Bull, or Cow, beyond his Neighbours, and thereupon are ready to goe to Law. But breaking off this discourse, because I would not be offensive to the reader: I will adde another Chapter, to declare whence the matter of Hony is taken, and how it is made.

CHAP. XVI.

How Hony is made; Whence Adama proceedeth; Of the fiery Hony, and of Sugar.

Ony commeth from the Dew of Heauen, which falleth vpon the Herbes and Flowers, and is sucked vp by the Bees, and enclosed in their stomackes: afterward, it is vomited or cast vp at their mouthes, and they preferre much part thereof in the hollow of their lawes, to liue thereon during winter, and other hard times. Prudent Nature hath so well ordered all things, for the benefit and cominodity of Man; that shee hath bestowed many vertues and vigours on those pretty Flies, in gathering sufficient for themselves, and liberall extender for Man also. For it is a great merchandise, helpful for diuers Maladies, and a singular nourishment for some bodies, as may bee gathered by our former discourse.

Nature hath beene so bountifull to Man, and still continueth the same affection; that she causeth great quantitie of this Hony dew to fall, euen like raine vpon the earth in some Countries, vpon the Mountaines, and places where Frankinsence groweth. To gather it, the Inhabitants lay fleeces of Wool vnder the Trees, and beat the Trees, to cause the Dew to fall vpon the fleeces, which drinke it in: afterward, they presse the fleeces, and receiuing this hony-dew into conuenient Vessels; they boyle and purifie it, making vse thereof in their foodes, as also in their Medicines, as they thinke best; and it is much better then that which is wrought by the Bees.

Galen faith, that there fell such great quantitie of this Dew (in his time) in his Country of Pergamus; that the Country people (greatly delighted therein) gaue thanks therefore to Asiuter. Ælianus writeth also, that there fell such plenty thereof in India, in a Region which is called Pragla, and so moistened the Grassie, that the Sheepe, Kine, and Goates feeding thereon, yielded Milke sweete like Hony, which was very pleasing to drinke. And when they used that Milke in any discafe, they needed not to put any Hony therein, to the end it should not corrupt in the stomacke: as it is appointed in Heckericks Feauers, Consumptions, Tifickes, and for others that are vicerred in the intestines, as is confirmed by the Histories of Portugal.

Euripides saith, that meere Hony fell vpon the Trees in Meditia; and Aelianus saith, that in Trapezonde, the people gathered Hony on the Boxe-tree leaues; and albeit it was bitter, and of strong saour, yet it cured such as were mad, and them that were tormented with the falling sicknesse. Doubtlesse, it is very likeli, that Hony should relish of the Plant or Hearbes quality, from whence it is gathered: for if the Tree be venomous, such will the Hony bee, and if the Hearb or Grassie be healthful, so is it likewise. Which was very well obserued by Diocorides, who saith; in Hogalea of Pentus, there was some Hony so venomous, that it would reduce all the body into a sweat, and take away their senses, that did eate thereof: but the Hearbe Rhus being presently taken, was an immediate remedie. In Sardignia it is gathered of very bitter taste, because it may bee, that much Worme-wood or Sothern-wood groweth in that Countrey: and yet notwithstanding, it is not venomous, but irksome to taste.

And to the end, that nothing may be omitted, of what may be said concerning Hony; I finde, that there is another kinde of Dew, beside the former, which congealeth of it selfe, & is found and taken vpon the leaues and branches of Trees, vpon Hearbs and Stones, and sometimes on the very ground, forming it self into little Grains, like Gum, which fallth from heaven before break of day; being very sweete in taste. And this dew or moisture, is called grained Manna, the best wherof cometh from Calabria, where they take it on their common Ash-trees, vpon the wide commons, and (many times) vpon some other Trees, by some secret of Nature. It maketh the belly loose, without any violence, as by daily experience it is to be seene, for if a man take the waight of two ounces and an halfe thereof, it releaseth the belly gently, and purgeth choller particularly: nor is there any feare, in giuing it to Women great with childe, and young sucking Children, if they neede any purging. Now aduies, because in stead of Hony, most part of men doe make vse of Sugar, as being more amiable vnto Nature; it shall not vary much from our purpose, if wee enter into some breefe discourse thereof.

Sugar is but the Pith or Marrow of certaine cultiued Reedes or Canes, naturally produced, and boiled in Water, vnill it grow to some hardnesse. The Sugar, wherof our ancients (as Pliny, Galen, Diocorides, Paulus Aeginetus, and others) make mention, was none other, but that which came forth of the Cane, by a rife made thereinto, as being ouer full of sugred pith, which congealed to the Cane like a Gumme; and long time (both before and after) no other kinde of Sugar was knowne, but onely that, which quenched thirst in the hottest fiery Agues. Quite contrary to the Sugar of these daies, which prouoketh thirst, and turneth it selfe into bitter choller, euen as Hony doth. This Hony was then rare, and all Sauces, Conserues, Confections, Opiates, Electuaries, and other medicinable compositions, were made with Hony; only through defect of knowing Sugar in those times.

But since Madame Auarice discovered the Art, of pressing and boyling those Sugar Canes, detruing thence great abundance of Sugar: it hath happened; that the Indians haue (and yet yearly do) cut the Sugar Canes, making also a yearely planting of the. And therefore there needeth no maruaile, if those great Sugar Canes be not to be found, wherein nature shewed her effects, and so (by consequent) the natural Sugar, vied by our forefathers, is vnterly lost. In stead wherof, our moderne times haue vied Sugar-candy, which is arteficiall and cleare, drawne forth of mincral Salt; being sucked vp on the tongue, whereby it wholly resembles the Sugar of our Ancients.

* Mainque and Mingoue.

The comparison which our Physitions make between Hony and Sugar, is, that they are both Absterfiue, Deficcative, and Resolueable; but yet Sugar much lesse then Honic. Sugar is not so contrarie to the stomacke, as Honic, neither so hot, that it may be numbered amongst those Medicines, which may be administered in Feauers: and this is the opinion both of Galen and Auicenn.

The inuention of boyling, and making it into a Licquid kinde of Loaves, for common Traffique and distribution (in such great quantity) through all parts of the world, began within these last 800. yeares. In which time (yet farre off from the Original) the Africans, and people of Asia, being Neighbors to the Indians, got the sight of making Sugar in India, & preparing their grounds aptly for Sugar Canes; by transporting some of those sugar Canes into their Countries, and husbanding their tillage for them. Afterward, they communicated the manner thereof to other people, as (at this instant) there is verie good Sugar made in Egipt, Madera, the Canarie Islands, throughout all Barbary, Sticily, the Isles * Baleares, in some partes of Spain, and other places. The Reader may perceiue by this Discourse, in what case Honic is good, and in what euil: how it ought to be applied, and in what things it is best vied; What difference there is between Honic and Sugar, and the generation both of the one and other. By obseruing also the disputation, which hapned between those men of different yeares, some profit may be gathered; in what kinde it is wholesome, Nutritiue, and Physicall; and in what Nature also, dangerous and hurtfull.

CHAP. XVII.

How the Gothes used to elect their Kings, Great, Fat, and Corpulent of Bodie. Contrariwise, how the Sarrazins would haue their Kings to be Meagre, Leane, and of small stature.

I were needlesse to declare, what manner of people the Sarrazins were, hauing formerly spoken sufficient thereof, in a Chapter onely thereto appertaining. And for the Goths likewise, somewhat hath already bin said, and the rest remaineth to more conuenient place. My instant purpose is, to relate of what stature and habitude of bodie, both those Nations used to create their Kings, thereby to appeare more apt and proper for command ouer them. The Goths would not elect anie man to be their King, except he were tall, great, grosse, and verie corpulent. On the contrary, the Sarrazins would haue no King to command ouer them, except he were little, lean, and low of stature. Whosoener considereth well on these matters, will finde neither side to be voide of reason, albeit their opinions were so opposite; and therefore wee will begin with them of great, grosse, and corpulent condition.

Hippocrates, the Prince of Physitions, saith; Great stature is verie seemly & commendable in a young man, and it begetteth him much grace; but it is an vnprofitable charge to age, and much worse then smallness. Doubtlesse, a Prince of high great appaunce, and goodly shape, is much more respected by the greater part of his people, then one that is lowe, leane, and little. To approue this, certain Normans, hauing made a Voyage into the Countreies of Brasile (where the people were termed Saluages, and went wholly Naked, feeding on humane flesh) brought backe in their Ships diuers Captaines of the Caribes, and made a present of them to King Charles the ninth, who was then young in yeares, onely about the age of fiftene. The Saluages perceiving his great attendance, and that euery one was verie respectiue of him, demaunded what he was? One told them, that he was the King, who absolutely commaunded all France, a Countreie of large extenture, and well peopled. The Caribes answered, saying; Surely there was but ill proceeding in the election of so young a King, rather this man, or that man had bin much better, pointing their fingers to two Switzers of great corpulence, and were of the Guard belonging to the said King.

It is contemptible and vnseemlie, to behold a chiefe person, as the king, Captaine, or other men of command, to be of small stature, and their seruants great. The first King of Israel, which GOD chose of gaue to his people, was Saul;

Kinges fat, great, and cal, and others leane, lowe, & little.

Apoor, 54. li. 2.

The Normans voyage to Bra file.

The iudgement of Saluages in choice of a King.

Men of small stature, much despised.

a man of high and great stature. After such slightly personage, commended by Hippocrates in a young man; he addeth, a great difcommoditie, saying; Great Corpulence is inſupportable and hurtful to Age, because a great man being old, becommeth bending or bowing, and hath labor enough to beare the bigneſſe of his bodie, by the puffing up or ſwelling in his legges. Moreover, for the moſt part they are Cowardes, without magnanimitie or bodily ſtrength: For neither their ſpirits, natural heat, or animal forces, are ſo well aſſembled and united, as in them of leſſer corpulence.

If occaſion ſo required, that ſuch men ſhould be expoſed to danger, either by Sea or Land, or ſome miſfortune or aduerſity ſhould befall them, they will quickly ſhake and tremble with feare: which hapneth thus to them, becauſe their Natural heat languiſheth, their ſpirites are thin and little, and their blood leſſe boiling. Beſides, Natural Verue ſpends it ſelfe, when it ſpreads into a long & large exteſſure; which vniting and enclosing it ſelfe in a little bodie, is much more vigorous and powerfull, then that which is heere and there diſperſed. And that which yet is worke, what grace could the Gether finde, in a bodie ſo great and groſſer: For ouer and beſide, that they muſt needs be vnable for all royal actions, either in bodie or vnderſtanding: ſo likewise, life could not prolong it ſelfe ſo well in them, as it commonlie dooth in leaner bodies. The reaſon is, becauſe groſſe corpulency hath not ſo manie vitall ſpirites, neither ſuch plentie of bloode in the Veines and Arteries, as Leanneſſe generally hath. For, Fatneſſe doth cauſe great oppreſſion, whereby (ſuch men) doe verie ſoone ſuffocate vnder anie laborious trauell, or ſharpe diſeaſe. It procureth alſo, that in the leaſt ſickneſſe or indiſpoſition happening to them, they thereby become daily tired, panting, fighting, grieving, hartleſſe, deſtored, and in ſuch fort emptied of all courage, that life it ſelfe (thogh tenderly affected) is tedious and irkeſome to them.

Men of leſſer ſtature, haue (naturally) a meniall vigor, and the faculties of Nature ſtrongly combined. We may diſcerne in them verie excellent graces, both Corporall and Spirituall, with ſingular promptitude and ſubtiltie of mind, and that in ſuch fort, as not only they ex-cell, or equal (at leaſt) the others in any diſpoſition: but likewise, in ſtrength and ſwiftneſſe, as alſo in goodnes of ſtomack for eating or drinking. I haue oftentimes noted in our Armies, ſome French men of ſlender ſtature, who haue bin drinking a Vie (as we terme it) with Switzers and Germaines, great of bodie, and verie fat: but the Switzers and Germaines were ſooner drunke, became ſleepey, reeling, and fell to the ground, vnable to vie any function of ſoule or bodie; then the other light timberd men, that went away clemly. The cauſe of all theſe things remaineth, not only in great capacitie & largeneſſe of the Veines and other Veſſels: but likewise in heate both Natural and vehement, which boileth, concocteth, and conſumeth all. Likewise, in a ſtrong and firme braine, which doth not eaſilie apprehend or receiue fumes: but, in ſuch manner, as a Tile made red hot with fire, or a ſhot Iron, that ſlips water off, being caſt vpon them; alſo, like to a verie drie ground, which ſuddenly diſpatcheth and conſumeth Water caſt on it, for there it looſeth it ſelfe, and paſſeth away, as in a ſubtle vapour.

Moreover, that commonly there is more magnanimitie and valour in a little bodie, then in the corpulent, may be approved by the Annals and Hiſtories of France, in the life of King Pepin, called the Lowe or Little man, Maior of the Pallace, who liued about the yeare, 750. He was of no corpulence, yet contained in him a great ſpirit, generous and robuſt of his members: which was the cauſe, that all the people of France, reioiced Childerick (who was their legitimate and Natural King, a man of great ſtature) and hauing ſeene him as a Monk, did locke him vp in a Monaftery, there to end his daies, becauſe he was tearmed Do Nothing, a Coward, dull, and ordinarily addicted to drunkenneſſe.

We read in the Romain Hiſtories, that a man of Gaulle, of immeſurable greatneſſe, and higher (by the head) then anie in the Army, called or Challenged anie Romaine to fight with him in ſingle combat. Among all the reſt, Marcus Corninus (being a man of lowe ſtature) could not endure this inſolence and arrogancy in the Gaulle, but vndertook the fight with him, and ſlew him, in faire warre, as we vie to teame it.

Small ſtature preferred before the Corpulente.

Pepin the little man preſided before Childerick the great.

The Corrhegenians were of ſo high honour as the Gothes, and ſo great, that their eyes were not fixed on Earth, as the Leanneſſe great of ſmall ſtature; but ſtared at what was dignitie and honour, and any thing reſpectful either of diſtinction or ſtature. In theſe ſort of ſtation of their Kinges, ſtands Sarracins. In ſome manner, they were ſo proud of their ſtature or Learning, and ſo full of ſelfe, which they wore, conſidering more in the diſtinction of men, than any ſubtilty of magnanimity, that they had a ſort of Canes, and Ambrans, had amongſt them many men of great Learning, and they all read in all the Sciences. And ſo on all other excellent qualities, they were very ſkillfull in the choiſe of their Kinges, as being able (by ſtature and ſtature) to gather mature iudgement of their Magnanimitie, Verue, and Vices: well knowing, that in great and groſſe Bodies, neither Science, Good ſpirit, or Generoſitie, had (commonly) any abiding. And to this Day, they are knowne to be good Phyſionomiſtes, and, beſides that, all the Learning which the Graecians left vs, had verie bene loſt, thorough thoſe bloody warres of the Gothes, Ambrans, Offrogother, Amigothos, and other barbarous people.

The Sarracins were great lovers of learning.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the abuſe committed, in carrying Sweet Drugges, Powders, and Perfumes, by both Men or Women: What harmes thereby enſuege, and at what time they came to be firſt uſed, and of their properties.

It thinketh, that the Romans dealt both wiſely and worthily in ordaining (at the requeſt of their Centors, P. Licinius Craſſus, & C. Iulius Ceſar) that no man ſhould ſell any ſweet Odours, or Aromaticall Vnguents, which commonly were brought forth of ſtrange Countries. For this law, they had (vndooubtedly) very great reaſon, becauſe ſuch ſweet perfumes and fauours, do make men effeminate, weak in the brain, and all the other animal parts: engendering nothing elſe, but vertiginous and diſtreſſe, and great toments in the head, with trembling of the Nerves, proceeding by theſe means, a pale and bloodleſſe colour in the Face, and the verie leſſe ſence, which Quick-ſilver cauſeth amongſt Vipers, in Goſts, and ſuch other creatures.

Moreover, ſuch ſweet ſauours, which are much, laying beſide, they doe great harme in the head, and all ſuch make uſe of them in wearing them, about their bodies: it is only but to attract voluptuous Luſt, whether it be in Men or Women. It was neuer ſeen, that any braue Priests, Captaines, or men of great crueltie, and that made account of vertue, did vie any of theſe Perfumes, or Muſicke ſauours. Not any (as I haue already ſaid) but the voluptuous, or ſuch as haue found defect in their bodie, do carry ſuch ſmells about them, as ſtrange vnauquity breath, which cometh from the brain, or ſome Vicer in the Lights and Linges, being commonly called, a corrupt & ſinking breath. Or for rotten teeth, full of putrid food ſticking in them. Or for ſuch, as haue a Goat-like ſauour, by reaſon of an ill-ſcenting ſweat vnder their armpits, or other parts of the bodie. For ſuch people, I ſay, it is permitted (as a ſhadow to their defects) to carrie Perfumes, or ſweete Powders about them, or elſe to haue their Garments perfumed. Martiall ſpeaketh the verie ſame in his Epigrams to Politianus. The Eaſterne people did much more vie theſe ſweete Vnguents, then they of the VVeſts, and were extraordinarily addicted to Luxuries and Voluptuouſneſſe, beyond all other parts of the world.

The verie greateſt antiquitie that I can finde, for the vie of theſe ſweete Vnguents, is in Geniſis, where it is ſaid, that Jacob ſent ſuch gifts into Egipt, becauſe there was a great dearth of Corne, and to be fauoured of Joſeph, who diſtributed the Kings corn out of his Graners, which he had referred to preferre his people, or to make profit thereof, or rather, by diuine inſpiration. Salomon in his Canticles, ſpeaketh of moſt ſweete Cynimones, eſpecially in the firſt Chapter. The like doth his Father David, and that hee did Anoint his owne Face.

Bb After

What in wit,
Alas.

How in En-
terp.

After that Alexander had conquered Darius, there was found (amongst the other spoiles) a little Coffet full of most sweet and shi gular Vnguent. We read in Herodotus, that Cambyses King of Persia, and Sonne to Cyrus, sent his Ambassadors with very rich presents, and vessels full of precious Oynments; to Maorgibus, King of the *Ethiopi*ans. But the King having vnderstood by the ETHIOPIANS, (who brought him this Present) in what manner those compositions were made, would by no means accept them; because, they were too effeminate for him.

In troth, this barbarous Moore gaue a good Lesson to vs that are Christians, and thinke our selues to excell all other in the worlde for Vertue: that wee are much more barbarous then hee, and all his Countrey of Ethiopia. For, in these our dayes, wee cannot bee content with perfuming our Garments, and the haire on our heads; but many are growne to such horrid immodesty, as to anoint those secretes both in men and VVomen (only to prouoke Lust, and for the more lasciuiousnesse) which were not ordained for any such brutish wickednesse. Many also, haue their Beades made of sweet Perfumes, not to vse in their priuie Orisons, but only for Vaine-glorie, and where any interchange of affection is, to procure the better meanes for voluptuous pleasures, and seeme more acceptable to his wanton Mistis, or free to her as idle seruant. Incense bestowed in churches, or on hallowed Altars, are matters of no great value or moment. And yet the Altar of God in Ierusalem, was not perfumed but with Sittim woode, according to his owne appointment.

Let me not herein be mistaken; as if I would inferre, that Beniamine, Storax, Amber, Muske, Ciuette, and such like, which are the principall foundation of Vnguent, Pouders and sweets are wholly to be reiected; for they are of great Vertues, and haue peculiar properties against diuers diseases, and then they may lawfully be vied, but not abused. Not as did Muleasses King of Thunis, who in the year, 1554. hauing left his Kingdome, to require aid of Charles the first Emperour, fearing the Turkish forces, which the Admiral to Barbarossa prepared against him, wherefoeuer he went, hee abused these blessings very highly. For he had ordinarily (well-neere) serued in to his Table, a Peacocke, and two Phesants, fained full of most precious and odoriferous Vnguent, amounting to aboute 200. Crownes; besides his other delicious Sawces, Potages, & meats dressed in like manner; and this was plainly seene at Naples. He was so extremely beloued in his kinde fauours, and yet without cause or neede, that when he was cast out of his kingdome for his cruelties, wherein he was re-seated by the said Emperour, and at the sacke of Thunis by the Spaniards, when he returned to his Castle, and found his Cabinet emptied of those precious perfumes, which the insolent Soldiours (not knowing their value) carelesly drew away; he said, That hee grieved more for his Delicate Drugges, then if he had lost his whole Kingdome, which he had but newly reconquered, by the helpe of the Emperour.

Going afterward againe, to entreate fresh succour (being still feareful of Barbarossa) while hee went about this business, he placed his Sonne (as his Lieutenant) in his Kingdome; who seized it only to himselfe. VVhich when Muleasses heard of, he returned (with a few people) backe to Thunis, thinking they would open the Gates vnto him; but hee found the contrary; for his Son hauing slaine about fiftene hundred of his Followers, and finding the King to be none in number amongst them: at length his Father was knowne; only by the sweete smell of his Odours and Vnguent; and his Son Amades being possessed of him, caused his eyes to be pulled out. Beholde, what benefite this wretched King gotte by his sweete fauours and perfumes, being vied vpon no cause or necessity. I haue known too many, that beari'g o'ter-much affection to this vanitie, and enriched with more wealth then wisdom, haue vtterly lost their health, and fallne into exceeding poverty.

Thus yee see, what I haue collected for yee, out of many good and ancient Authors, concerning the vse of drugs or sweet Perfumes; what euil vse is made of them, and how being vnwisly applied, they are the chiefe causes of manie maladies, and seruing (for the most part) for nothing but voluptuousnesse. I hold Opinion, that no man dooth more abuse them, then a man that shoulde most respect spec his honor, and hold it in highest commendation; to be so much forgetful of himselfe, as to feed his effeminate and voluptuous appetites, with these vnfitting & wanton procurements. Now, because there are great controuersies, and manie are ignorant, from whence wee haue our Amber-Greece, Muske, Ciuitt, Beniamine, and Storax, wherewith are composed the said Vnguent, Powders, Sweete Pomanders, and Perfumes, it shall not alter our determination, in our next succeeding Chapter (to recreate the Readers spirits) to speake something more of them, and of their faculties.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Amber-Greece; From whence it is brought: The worth and properties thereof. And certaine Fables (concerning the same) refused.

My purpose is not, to speake of that Amber, which is bred among Rockes of coloured stone, and (by his Native Vertue) attracteth Straw thereto, as the Adament doth Iron: But of that sweet Aromaticall iuice of Amber-Greece; wherof, because many men haue diuers opinions, concerning the production of a thing so rare & precious, I thought good to make some briefe discourse. I would gladly also refute diuers Fables, delinered in publicke conference thereof, without alledging any Authours in my conclusions, that write or speake by heare-say; but only such persons as haue seen the places from whence it is had.

Concerning the name of Ambar or Amber, it is so called in all Countreies of the name. Our ancients haue supposed, that it is the feede of the Whale, which is left by her vpon the Waters, and so is gathered, because in the Bellies of some Whales, there hath bene found thereof; Nicholas Menardus, a Spanis Physitian, saith; That in the year, 1590. (himselfe being present) a Whale was taken nere to the Canarie Islands, which are termed the fortunate, and in the Belly thereof, was found about foure pounds waight of Amber. Afterward, he was allowed to be present at the taking of manie other, with their young Ones, but not a iotte was to be found in any one of them. Others are of the minde, that amber is nothing else but the excrement of the Whale, which he auoydeth by his egections in April and May: because hee then feedeth on certaine fruits growing on the Sea-bankes, which are verie odoriferous. Some do affirme, that it is not any excrement of the Whale, but of another huge Fish, as great or much more in greatnesse exceeding the Whale; and it hath a head more hard then Marble; neuer swimmeth but in the Northern Seas. But all these coniectures come very thing nere to trvth, because all things of good and great fauour, do com from Countreies and Regions which are hot; as experience deliuereth by our Spices, of which, no one kinde was euer knowne to be produced, from Northernly or cold Countreies.

I finde some other Authors, who say, that Amber is sought for and found, being deuoured by a Great Fish, named the Asell, which dying, and floating vpon the Waues, hee is quickly knowne by Mariners, that seize on him with their Hookes, and so dragge him on the shore. There opening his Bellie, they finde store of Amber; but that is onlie good and pure, which they finde against his chine-bone. But there is no aparance of truth here; for Amber is not anie kinde of poison, but a dear Friend to the heart and life. On the other side, Fishes doe neuer seeke anie thing to hurt them, except by Trecherie vied to them; and that men do mingle Venom among other fooode, which is apte and proper for them, as they do to Lyons, Wolves, Foxes, Leopards, Rattes, and diuers other harmefull Beastes, that liue on the land. Many also haue bin perswaded, that Amber is a kind of froth or scum of the Sea; but this Coniecture, is euen as fabulous as the other. For, Amber is not found in those Seas, where Whales doo frequent, and much lesse in any place, where the Sea is continuallie full of Pillowes, or store of froth appeareth. Thence saith, that hee Learned of diuers Arabes, Iewes, and Easterne Grekes, dispersed heere and there thorough the Turks iurisdiction; that there are certain

Of the name
Ambar as stater.

There are two kinds of Amber.

A verie erroneous opinion of Andrew Thevet, concerning Amber.

Birds in the Isles of the Veiques (which are situated in the way leading to Mozambique, towards the North) as great as our Geese, and called by them Ashibobus. These Birds, do ordinarily withdraw themselves, farre off from any Inhabitations of men, and search in the Night time, either in these uninhabited Islands, or on the toppes and pointes of Rockes and Cliffs, for auoyding disturbance in their rest: and there they mune in great abundance, because they company in huge flihtes together, euen as our Cranes or other Wilde Fowles do with vs. It is faide, that this Dung or muting of these Birds, is true Amber, which being concocted in the heate of the Sunne, purified by the Moones power in the Night, and refined by theayres subtilty, which keepeth continually vpon those promontories: it fo remaineth, till the Sea doth swell and rise (either by those violent Windes, or some other-ragious Tempest) and carrie it thence away. Floating thus, by Morrells or Fraggementes vpon the Waues, it is one while cast into Creekes, Hauens, or Neighbouring Strands: and another while, deuoured or swallowed vp by Fishes. But, it beeing a matter vndigestiue, they are enforced to cast it vpe againe. And the other, that continueth still swimming hither and thither, yeeldeth a reason (by these severall meanes) of three kinds of Amber. The one, is of a Whitish Colour, which is the true Naturall qualitie of fine Amber-Greece. The second, is more Clowdie and obscure, and yet good account is likewise made thereof. But, as for the third sort, which hath beene swallowed by Fishes, and sent vp againe, thorough the lacke of Digestion, being Blacke, waighie, and of much lesse saueur, they reckon it to be of slender perfection, and therefore, make no esteeme at all thereof. But all these things, come nothing neere vnto the truth, and I am verie forrie, that Theuet (hauing traualled so much) should set downe this in Writing, euen in the verie same manner, as I haue deliuered it, beeing a matter no way likely or probable.

Ælius, and Simeon Sethius, Greeke Authors, who onely and chiefele hate spoken of this Amber, do say; That it is a kinde of Bitumen, comming forth of the Pointains or Springs in the bottom of the Sea, and that by floating vpon the water: it becommeth hardened, as mantle things else doe, which hoier vpon the Seas, being first bred in them; all which while, they are soft and tendes but comming forth, they wax presently hardened, as Corall doth. This Amber thus floating, when the Seas are angry and tempestuous, as many times they bee: there is store thereof found among the Rocks and stones, as also about the trees growing on the Sea-shores, when the East wind, or else the North-east (but more enclining to the East) bloweth.

A great quantitie thereof is found in Sofala, and in the Isles of Comaro, Demogra, Mozambique, and along this Tract, euen to the Isles of Maldina, or Naledina, which looke into the East. But when Zephirus, or the Westerne Windes do moue the Seas to choller, then is a great quantitie found in the later named Islands. There haue beene some fragments found floating on the Sea, as great and tall as any man; and others of the breadth of foure spannes, and twentie in length. Some do affirme, that they haue a whole Isle (as it were) all built of pure Amber; and within some fewe daies after, when search was made for it, it was disperfed, and could not be found.

Garcias d'Orta, a Portugall Physitian, from whom I tooke this latter opinion: and with whom, the best iudgements of these times doe giue consent, for, being alwaies found veritable, and hauing been present in the Countries where this drug is had, where he kept possession of an Island belonging vnto the King of Portugal, wherein great quantity of Amber was daily founde: hee was of the same minde with Ælius and Sethius, & heard them when they deliuered their Iudgement therein. Hee saith also, that in the yeare, one thousand five hundred fiftie five, neere to the Promontory of Comaro, a great lump or proportion thereof was founde, which waighed more then three thousand pounds waight, and hee that found it (supposing it to be a kind of Pitch or Bitumen) sold it almost for nothing. For himselfe, hee sayeth, the verie greatest lump that euer hee saw, did not exceed about the waight of fiftene pounds. But the Merchants which traualle into Ethiopia, giue good assurance, that that they do ordinarily behold pieces of much greater scantling: for all the passage from Sophala, euen to Brana, aboundeth plentifully in Amber. In the country of Brasile, there hath bin some found, and yet is, but very rarely. In the year, one thousand five hundred thirtie, a fragment was there found, containing the waight of foure poundes, in sayling vnto a Porte of Portugal, called Sethu-ball.

Some say, that Amber hath bin found in the Beakes or Billes of certaine Birds, which may be so: and cleauing to some Cockles and Scallops of the Sea, which I imagine happened, by being sifted thereto. But, Maister Nicholas B. Senne, a verie Learned Man (my intimate Friende, liuing yet in Paris) and curious in search of the rarest things, shewed mee what manner of Beakes those were, and we plainly perceived, that they were the beakes of Sounds or Cuttle-Fishes, and not of Birds.

Amber, is of great estimation among the Wealthie Indians, for they cate it in their Meates, and looke how much the price appeareth in bignesse, so much the greater is his price in Value, euen as of precious Stones. There is no Countrey or Region, where more sale is made thereof, then in China: for, as the Portugals obtained fauour of the China Kinges, to Traffike with that kingdom, and bringing thence some small quantitie of Amber, they sold the Waight of twentie Ounces, for fiftie hundred Crownes: Which beeing vnderstoode by other Merchants, they brought thence more store afterward, because (thenceforward) they would not pay such a hie price in that Countrey.

In France, it is commonly sold (at this day) for eight or nine Crownes the Ounce, at the least: Neuerthelesse, it is sometimes more, and sometimes lesse.

Let no man count it strange, that it is so curiously courted by Rich and Noble persons; for it hath manie especiall properties, wherby to preserve soundness of Health; and to maintaine long life, as I will briefly declare: First of all, it strengtheneth the Brain, appealing all paines therein: either of the Nerves or Heade, comming of Colde causes: by chafing the fore-head therewith, and all the Head ouer, or making a good bigge Emplaister, and mingling a little Oynment of Muske with it; lay it so to the Head. If a good lump be therof, be hanged about the Necke of Man or Woman, tempered with a little Lignum Aloe, and a small quantity of Muske; the very smell thereof cheareth vp a dull braine; augments memory, and recureth both the spirits and heart extraordinarily. Besides, it is a singular remedie, against the plague, and all colde distempers, onely by perfumeing a Night-Cappe therewith. There is nothing more beneficiall for auncient people, and to lengthen life in them; if they moderately vse it in smelling either in perfumeing their Garments, anointing their faces, or mingling it amongst their Meates. A little ponder of the Load-stone compounded with it, and applied Emplaister-wise to the Nauell, it holdeth and restraineth the Fruit, that it fall not before due and convenient time. It is a singular Remedie, not onely against the procidence of the Matrice, but likewise to prevent the fistulacion; being applied with a lide. Copying it both outwardly & inwardly, it maketh Women fruitfull, whose barrennes is caused by coldnesse. It profiteth greatly for paines in the heart, and stomacke, occasioned by windinesse. Such as are afflicted with the Epilepsie, that is to say, the falling sicknesse, or discale of St. Iohn, if they vse it as an ordinary smell, or receiue it as a perfume, it quite appeaseth it, or causeth a mightie asswaging thereof, as hath beene many times credibly experimented. In like manner, it is verie singular good against the Palsie, if besides taking it inwardly, yee vse it as an Oynment to the necke and Chini-bone of the backe, mingled with some Nuttall Oyle.

If it be taken in Wine, as some Physicians (not well informed in the Nature thereof) haue appointed; it presently causeth drunckennesse, and brings a man (at length) to a trembling in all his ioints. But if any necessity doe require vs to vse it, it must be mingled with the yolke of a new-laid Egge, and the Dose or quantity to be taken, is commonly fixe Graines each day, & to drink no wine in the space of two houres after. If a man that hath a hott Chafing Brain, is procured by Nature, do either vse it as a fauour, or receiue it inwardly: questionlesse, it will proue verie troublesome to his memorie and vnderstanding, and cause diuers diseases in his head, endangering his fall into frenzie or madnesse. And therefore, it is most auailable for olde decrepit people, and such as haue a cold braine; and for such Diseases, whose Causes or Originall do proceed of frigiditie.

Amber of 4. seuerall Colours, and to know the best sort.

There is Amber of foure seuerall colours: White, Gray, Red, and Blacke; which commeth according to the variety of places or Regions, where it is found out. The Gray, is preferred before all the other, and is knowne to be good, if when pricking it with pin, it deliuereth forth a moisture like Oyle. It hath bin tempered in Torchis, Tapers, and Candles, for Emperors, Kinges, and Great Princes: as in the Court of Campsen, the last Soldane of Egypt, Mulesse King of Thunis, and diuers others. It is mingled also amongst other Drugges, for making of Chaines and Braceletes, worne vually by Ladies, and Great Courtiers, without anie great offence or discommendation, the causes in our precedent Chapter alwaies remembred.

CHAP. XX.

Of Muske, and of Ciuit, howe they are engendered, From whence they are brought, and how they are any way good.

Ext vnto Amber, methinks that Musk ought to haue his due ranke. The Barbarians call it Patt, and there are manie sorts or kinds thereof. The best of all, is that which commeth from a Countrey, that leaeneth very much into the Vell, as faire as the City of Choras doth, and is yellowish, or of Gold colour. The best, next to it, is that which is brought from the Indies, and appeareth blacke, whereby it is not so good as the first. The worst of all, is that which they bring from the Land of Sini. All these kinds of Musk, are engendered in the Nauell of a certaine Beast, like vnto a wilde Goat, which hath only one home, and is verie great of bodie. When this Beast is in paine, by a raging swelling in his Nauell, which filleth it selfe with a kind of grosse blood, in manner of an impostume: he afterwarde voideth this bloude, halfe corrupted, and within a certaine while after, it becometh of very sweet fauour.

Serapio (among the Araber) hath written diligently and carefully concerning Muske, speaking in this manner: The Beasts that make Muske, and are like vnto wilde Goats, are principally bred in the Countreies of Tumbuco, & of Sini, which bee neere neighbouring to each other. The Muske of Tumbuco, is better then that of Sini, because the Goates which make the Muske, do feed on nothing but Spicknard, & other odoriferous plants, whereon only they liue. VVhich hapneth not so in the land of Sini, for, albeit the Musk-Goats do there liue also on sweet hearbs and plants: yet are they not to be compared in their Muske, neither to the Spicknard, nor to the other plantes of Tumbuco.

The maner also of gathering the Musk, is some reason of the difference, for they of Tumbuco, do neuer take the Musk out of the thin skin or wrapper, to sophisticate it; neither will they gather it, but when the season is bright & clear. But the men of Sini, they vse to squeeze the skin of the swoln impostume, and mingle and sophisticate it, even in the issuing forth, not caring whether the time be foul or faire, and so they shut it vp in purposed boxes. That is the best Muske, which is the most odorant, and is very ripe when it cometh forth of the swoln bag. These goats which carry the Musk, are no way different, but only in their teeth, for they haue teeth (there commonly cald Dogs teeth) very long, stading out of their mouths, about a span-long, like to the wild Boare.

Musk that is not mature & ripe, hath a most offensive smell: but they which seek for the Musk, do flake the thin skins wherein it is not ripe; and hanging them in the open aire, there leaue them so, yntill they be ripe, and the foule fauour be utterly gone. It becometh very odorant of it self, when it is perfectly baked in the aire: neuerthelessse, the best Muske is that, which naturally receiueth his maturity, euen in the thinne wrappers of the Musk-Goat. doe gather it among Stones & Trunkes of Trees; for the Beast, when he feels his impostumation ready to ripen: hee taketh great delight, in rubbing his body against the Rockes and Trunkes of Trees, yntill the Bag be broken, and all the congealed matter bee voyded out. This Muske is better then all the other, as being that which is plainly ripened; both by the good temperature of Heauen, and perfect concoction of the sun. They then that seeke after it, so soone as they haue found and gathered it, they close it vp in the thin skines and Bladders, of such Beasts as haue bred Musk, and haue (formerly) bin slaine by them in hunting.

Of this Muske is it, that presents is made to Kinges and Princes, & whereof they make vse. It hath (almost) the equal properties to Amber, but herein it is much worse; for if a Man beare too great quantitie about him, or if he receiue ouer much inwardlie: it brings him to a palse trembling, and raiseeth great torments in the head, enforcing too vehement an attraction of blood to the Nose; as many haue suddenly dyed by bleeding. But in a small and moderate quantity, it is good against all paines in the head, coming of colde causes.

I haue not found any Author, either Greeke, Arabe, or Moderne, but iurepeth with this Man in opinion, and in the gathering of Muske: except one Amatus, a Portugall Philition, a Man of very great inconstancy, as diuers haue declared to mee, that had knowledge of him in Turkey. Hee makes a mockerie, of that which hath bene deliuered by diuers good Authours, concerning Musk, and labourereth to assure vs, that in a certaine Countrey of India, there is a Beast as big as the Hares here among vs, which being taken, and beaten to death with rods, the bowels and inwardes is then taken forth; and the Flesh bruised, or beaten in a Morter. Afterward it passeth through a Searce, to the end that no bone may remaine vnbruised, and then the flesh is made into round Bals, and wrapped vp in pieces of the said Beasts skine, stil to preserue them in a round forme, and because the Merchantes, that buy them thus readily prepared; may make no doubt, but that the Muske is of the very same Muske-beast. But both Portugall, Araber, and Iewes, who haue traualled into those partes, and seen these matters thus gathered: are of Serapius mind, and hold the course, which I haue formerly alleadged; and that our Muske commeth from a Beast like vnto the wilde Goat.

Marcus Paulus, a Venetian, in the first Booke of his Voyages, and the first Chapter, saith; That in the Province of Singul in India, himselfe found the best Muske in all the world. For in that Countrey, they haue a Beast, of no strange kinde, but about the bignesse of a Cat, with haire like to a Hart, or red Deere, very great Claws, and foure teeth only; to wit, two aboue, and two beneath. Neere, or about the nauell of this Beast, betwene the Flesh and the skin, there is a bladder full of blood, which is true Muske, yeelding the vntuall sent and sweeter fauour. I would be loath to belye such an approued Authour: For it may very welbe, that this Beast is of the same kind, as the Musk-Goat is, notwithstanding the smallnesse in body: because (heere among vs) we see Dogges, Horles, and other Beasts, of all shapes and formes. But yet he agreeth with all the rest in this; that the Muske is found about the Nauell, as hath formerly bin said.

Muske (by length of time) looeth his good smell, or being tainted with wind, or too closely kept. Therefore, to preserue him still in his goodnesse, he must be kept in Boxes of Lead, verie well stopped.

Platerius, a learned man, is of this opinion; That if Muske haue lost his vertue and good odour; it must be hanged in a Viall of Glasse, with the mouth open, in the miditt of a Sink or house of Office, and so it will recouer his former fauour. There is some found composed of another fashion; but then it is sophisticated, and how that composition is made, Asper enspireth in his History of B.alls.

Quiet and beside Muske, we haue yet another licquid matter, which is not only odorant; but also pierceeth all the fences and spirits, at the first encounter. Perfumers make great vse thereof, in their compositions of sweete smells, which which they tearme mixtures. It is engendered in the skinn of the Testicles of a Beast, much like vnto a Feyne, some calling them Cats. To speake more properly, Ciuet is as a sweate, passing betweene the Testicles of this Beast, being of a temperature hot and moist. If it be put into the pits about the Nauele, or into the Wombe-pipe; it serueth maruailously against the suffocations of the Matrix. Many times, vpon vrgent extremity, the Husband vseth it to his owne secrets, and so conuayeth it vnto his Wife; whereby immediate remedy ensueth for the paine.

And as we haue already saide, that Muske being tainted, or ouer-aged, recouereth his strength and quicknesse by stinking ayre, as of a Sinke or Priuy, as by one contrary to correct another. Euen so, in those Countreies where these Ciuet Creatures are bred, there is another Beast, equalling the Ciuet Cat in bignesse, called Agoddilhat (which signifieth nothing else but foule sauer, and this beast is (indeede) the most stinking of all other) who continually is at Warre with the Ciuet Cat, his colour being very pleasing, & somewhat neerer to a Sky-colour.

I call to memory, that being (one day) in the House of the Countesse of Fraunce, Anne de Montmorancy, a Cat (not being discharged of her Ciuet, according as her selfe sought meanes and place) emptied her burden vpon the Gowne of a young Gentlewoman, deliuering thereon such a great quantitie of Ciuet; that all the spacious roome was filled with the ouer-piercing fauor thereof. Wherevpon, diuers were readie to fall into fownings, others felt grievous paines in their heads, and (among the rest) the young Gentlewoman fell suddenly into a suffocation of the Matrix; yea, and in such extreame manner, that she was reputed dead for the space of twelue houres, and was cured by stinking fumes and ill smells onely. The Gentlewoman gaue sufficient testimony, that she had neuer (before) bene subiect to that perplexitie: and yet notwithstanding, when Women are vexed with the anguish forenamed, if Ciuet be put into the Nauell pities, they feele presently ease. But ye must vnderstand, that it ought to be applied in a very small quantity. For this cause is it, that Muske and Amber are whole some for many cold diseases, being applied and taken in small quantitie. Here also the Reader may be advertised, that there are people of such complexion, as do affect such sauiours naturally: and others againe, who finde them very hurtfull, and therefore doe fly from them; of which sort there are many more, then of the other. Therefore, when any vs is to be made of them, let euery one well vnderstand his owne naturall inclination, or take the aduise of some skilfull Physitian: for oftentimes, by vsing them indiscreetly, they haue bene the death of diuers people.

CHAP. XXI.

Of an Edict, made by Dionysius the elder, King of Sicily, against Women, Maids, and yongest Virgines; in whereby he purchased a doublereturne of Money.

Hofocuer readeth the Grecian Histories, shall finde, that the Isle of Sicily hath anciently bene subiect, to be gouerned and commaunded by Tyrant Kings: among which Tyrants, it appeareth that Dionysius (whom they vsed to tearme the elder) surpassed all the rest in tyranny. For, after he had drawne all meanes from his people, by frequent, great and intollerable impositions: hee surcharged them againe with a new taxation, much more irksome and burdalous, then any one, or all the other gone before. Which was an expresse payment, by poules; or head (as they call it) both for Men, Women, Maidens, children, great or little, young or old. And albeit the Collictours of these imposed Monies, made great and grievous execution in the leuies, as well vpon Catell, as seizing mooueables and immoueables; yea, imprisoning the people (euen to the death of many) by cruell viages, and bad handling; yet, notwithstanding all these extremities, no Money could be had, because the Tyrant had drawn them dry, euen to the vttermost penny. All the Mony of this rich Island, hee had employed (in daily pay-ments) for ten thousand foot Souldiers, to guard his person, and ten thousand Horse-men, beside foure hundred Gal-lies, well armed and furnished. Beside this, he payed great pensions to other Common-weales, and to strange Prin-ces; to the end, hee might haue their ayde when neede required; reposing little (or no trust at all) in his own Sub-jects. In breefe, he exercised all kindes of prodigality towards Straungers, at the cost and expences of his owne people, for the more safe assurance of his Estate and dignitie.

He had aduertisement, that there was no more Money to be raised, ney-ther by Wine or Corne, or any other Commodities: for there was great dearth of Victuals two whole yeares together. He knew it euidently, because the people were growne carelesse, and did nothing but laugh at his imposi-tions; as knowing, that he could not bee paid, when they had nothing where-withall to pay, which made them then raise that memorable Prouerbe: where nothing is to bee had, the King loseth his right.

But this old Tyrant Foxe, knew wel enough the Custome of the Scitilians, which was, to be pompous, affecting brauerie in Apparell, and (aboue all) to be richly decked with Jewels of gold and Siluer, embellished with costly pre-cious stones: neuer regarding their owne condition, as Husbandes and Wiues, nor good of their Families, but suffering all their prouisions to be sold, to feede the Kings impositions, and serue other Negotiations, provided, that they might still enioy their Jewels and brauery. The Men (for Antiqui-ty of this idle Custome) did willingly tolerate it, though they were to endure all the necessities in the World; yea, death it selfe. And this was all which remained, of the mightie riches of Sci-tilie: for the Island had abounded in plenty of Corne, which was the maine hope of all the Inhabitants, and (next to Aegypt) it was one of the best Garners in the whole World.

Hereupon, he would instantly help himselfe, according as the time fitted him with occasion, which was (in regard that his tyranny, and the two pre-cedent yeares, had greatly impouerieth the Kingdome) notwithstanding al for-mer oppressions: he would now haue the Jewels of the Women and Dam-sels, then which, they had nothing else remaining to them. And for his more cleanly conuoyance hereein, he caused to be published by the Priestes and Sa-crificers (whose Ceremonies hee gaue no faith to, nor any way beleeneed) that the Goddesse Ceres was very greatly of-fended with the Islanders, because there was no worshippinge given her, but in an old Temple, ruined, daike, and vterlie vnpleasing; wherefore, she would haue a new one erected to her, built with faire shew, and sumptuous cost; else there should no more happy daies bee seene in that Island. According to these remonstrances, made by the Priestes and Sacrificers, with interposition of his owne authoritie: it was credibly gi-uen forth, that the Goddesse her selfe had appeared to him, & this the Priestes solemnely iustified, being well enstru-cted in the treacherie. Vpon this vir-gent occasion, and pretending carefull respect of the Common weale, as also to appeale the high disauour of Ceres, (he being the Goddesse of Corne and Fruits of the Earth;) he had determi-ned, to erect her a new and magnificent Temple. Now, because he had no Mo-ny, nor the people neither, who are cal-led the Kinges Purse: he willed and commanded, that all Women, Wiues, Widdowes, Maids, & Damfels, should bring forth their Jewels of Gold, Sil-uer, precious stones, and all other mat-ter else whatsoever, to a certaine place, and at a time by him appointed; impos-ing grievous paines and penalties, on any that durst vse the least contradic-tion. The female sexe were in wonderful perplexitie, and durst not hide any of their Jewels or brauery: because they had so long openly worne them, and good note was taken of them from time to time, both of the riches and value, on feastiual daies; at sollemne sacrifices, publique plaies, banquets, and marria-ges.

Now, for the better obtaining his purpose, and inducement of the people to more willing forwardnesse hereein: he caused a spacious compasse of ground to be prepared, in an eminent place of the City Syracusa, not far off from the Fountaine Arethusa, where hee made some proiect, of present building a goodly Temple, by a forme or Modell shaped thereof. Farre off was his mind from any such intent, but day by day to get possession of the Womens Jewels, and hanesteth the leuety of them with all possible speed. He gaue notice heereof also, to the round neighbouring Illes and Countries, where he had no command: from whence he got almost a Million of Gold, where-with they willingly furnished him, onely that the Goddesse would be gracious to them. And thus he held the people in suspence the space of the three whole yeares. In this time, the Land began (naturally) to waxe fruitfull againe, yielding as great plentie of Corne and all things, as formerly it had doone: by which good meanes, Corne, Wine, and Cattell, thriving still with them, the Inhabitants became rich and sufficiently stored.

When the women began to tast of this well-relishing fertility; they could not forget their former vanities, but faine would fall againe to their pride & rich brauery: Only their feare was, least the Tyrant should play the like tricke againe with them. To make an estimate, of the inestimable masse of Wealth, which they were compelled to lay down, for building this new Temple to the Goddesse Ceres; is a matter exceeding my capacity, and yet no Temple at all builded. The Tyrants ayme was only at wealth, and hauing compassed what he intended; By the aduise of some well-willers to the Women (pretending compassion on their disurnishment of Jewels) a counterfeit request was made vnto him, that he would be pleased to permit their wearing of Jewels againe. Standing (like a crafty Reinar) vpon some stranges for a while, the suit at length was granted, with this Prouiso. That euery one of the Female sexe (of what degree or age soeuer) should particularly present her offering to the Goddes Ceres, either in Gold or Silver, according to the number and value of those Jewels, which they purposed to weare: whereto they consented verie gladly, so foolishly fond were they of their curious adornments, which gaue way to the Tyrant, to make a double benefit of one and the same Edit. And to this very day, the Women of that Island do continue this proud humour, in beautifying themselves with Jewels; beyond any other Country that I haue read of. The riches that he compassed by this Edit, is not to be valued, for the Ille was (in those daies) much more peopled then now it is: And then the principall and royall City, was called Syracusa, which at this present is named Sarragossa. This Tyrant, hauing occasion then to vse men of Armes, beside such Strangers as he kept in pay, could leuie sixscore thousand foot, and twelue thousand Horlemen, beside foure hundred Ships and Gallies; whereas at this day, the Land will hardly yeeld fifteene hundred able fighting men. When it was surprized by the Romaines, for hauing taken part with the Carthaginians; there was found in one place (called the Magazine or Store-houle for war) furniture to arme seauenty thousand men, and such large booty was found therein, that Carthage (which fought for the Empire) could hardly yeeld the like.

This Dionysius was an affronter and Deceiuer, who knew better then any Man else in the World, how to finde meanes of non payment, when reason & equity did require it. Among diuers other, he had entertained a young man, who was reputed to be very skilfull in playing on muscicall Instruments, and tearmed the very best that those times afforded, to whom he promised liberrall wages. The Musitian hauing serued him a long while, requested to haue his due recompence; whereto Dionysius replied: That he ought him nothing; Because (quoth he) I haue giuen thee as much contentment, by hope and promise of great wages and enriching thee, as thou hast yielded me, for I haue taken paine enough, to heare the idle sound of thy instrument.

In breefe, he cared not how he came by any thing whatsoever, provided that it would yeild him profit, making spare, neither of Statues of the Goddes, or any other sacred thing, but made a meere mockerie of all, as I shall haue occasion to speake else-where. The Scythians haue neede of such a King in these daies, to punish that shameful murder and massacre, which they committed

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Word or Name Grammarian, and what it is truly and properly.

Those persons which the Latines properly called Grammaticos (which in all other Languages is tearmed Grammarians) were not any such men, as knew not how to speake congruately, or write Orthographically, with good obseruation of accents in their speech, as being unskilfull in the Etimology of Dictions or Vocables, according as some (to this day) haue supposed. For well I know, that it hath bene a common matter, when one would point at a man slenderly learned, or little scene in the soundnesse of learning, as vnderstanding nothing but the very principles: they would rearme him a Grammarian, or a Grammer Schoole-Boy, for his greater scorne and open disgrace.

The name of a Grammarian very badly vnderstood.

The ancient Latines in Cicerones time.

Grammarians were unskilfull in the Latine tongue, and counted the best Schollers at those times.

But contrariwise, the ancient Latines, as in the time of Cicero, had no other vnderstanding of the word Grammarian: then of a learned Man, well skill in all the Sciences, and thought fit to be the Interpreter of our grauest Authours. The Greekes called Grammarians, Critiques, of the Greeke Verbe κρίνω which signifieth to be judged. For when learned men (were they Greekes or Latines) had any doubt about the interpretation of some Text, sentence, or saying, in any Science whatsoever: it was then wholly referred to a Grammarian.

Suetonius was of the same opinion, in his Booke of famous Grammarians, who were likewise called Learned, as for example, Mesala, Corvinus, and Macrobis write, that one Didimus, sufficiently learned in the Sciences, was esteemed to be a great Grammarian. Cisero made high account of one named Emphion, whose Schoole continually he frequented, after his handling causes in the Senate. Nidigius Figulus, and the excellent Wife-man Farre, are said to be the learned Grammarians of all other: as also Marcus Valerius, Probus, and Palemon, the most audacious of the that euer professed Letters, with many more beside. And among the Greeks, who triumphed more then Aristarchus, Aristotle, Theodotus, and diuers others: all which were esteemed admired Grammarians.

CHAP. XXIII.

A Paradoxe, maintaining by witty Arguments: That speedy death is much better to be desired, then a long & tedious late of life.

O great is the disaster & miserie of worldly occasions; that long grieffe, and ouer-burdenous compassion of them (without any other hope of speedy amendment) hath made the better sort of people to asseme and maintaine: That it is more expedient for a Man (who seareth GOD) to wish for death quickly; then long to endure in these labour some trauailes. For albeit that death (the true Minister of Iustice, end of all vexations, and most assured way of our eternall health) performs no other good or fauour to Men; but takes them from the afflictions of this World, hindering them (thereby) from offending GOD most strangely, and deliueing them from ferule subiectiue, being in the hands of rauenous, cruell, and bloody Tyrants; yet for this one and onely reason, hee is most highly to be extolled and praised. For, without this happy helpe, we should be miserably condemned to vnsufferable pains, and altogether pressed downe, or smothered, by vnersistable stormes. Our hope (without this) would be quite quenched. And, without this) what is the Sinner, be he neuer so great a Prince or Lorde, not knowing, fearing, and regarding God? By

The lamentable condition of worldly affairs.

A definition of Death, and what good he performeth.

An effectfull reason to be considered.

A memorable
custome observed in Thrace.

By death we live eternally; and by death we are freed from the prison of all sorrows and mishaps.

This was the reason, why the ancient custome of Thrace was so denotie observed, that at the birth of every Infant, they used great sorrow and lamentation. Contrariwise, when any (either aged in yeares, or of what time soeuer) died: They would make much ioy, triumph, and feasting, and (according to the parties Dignity) celebrated the Funerall, with sports, plaies, and other varietie of pleasures. If such a barbarous Nation as this was (deprived of all use of Philosophy, and good Letters) could doe so great an honour to death: Is it not a shame for vs, that call our selues Christians, and know, that our very best benefite came by his death; to whom we pretend both Faith and seruice: to be so wretchedly amorous of life, which is nothing else (according to the learned Poets opinion.) But an obscure Prison, enthralling the best ennobled Spirits.

Blessed Saint Paul, The Vessel of election, did not he desire to dye, That he might line with his Lord and Maister? Yet we (onely to compasse leysure, for committing ten thousand horrible excesses) make life our great God; adding daily one paine vpon another, and augmenting the Register of our numberlesse offences. Are not we so obdinate-ly affected to this short and dangerous pleasure (if that may be called pleasure, which is the plaine high-way to euerslasting death) that for it onely: we care not to loose the life celestiall, diuine, & (then which) the like can no way be so much as dreamt on? Ezechiel wished for speedy death; That he might ioy in the beauties and excellencies of Heauen. But we count long life, the more to entangle our selues in the filthes of this World. Simeon, that good, just, and holy old man, Desired death with all his heart: But we (blinded, or deprived, ceter of naturall discourse) hate Death, and speake all the euill we can imagine against it.

Wherefore (thinke ye) was it, that death was (by our Elders) called Thanasos? But onely in this respect: That (in the end) it makes vs all ioyfull, and wel pleased with that, which we ought most of all to desire. Are we then so ignorant and fencelesse; as not to acknowledge the abundance of benefites; which we gaine by being taken out of this hateful Labyrinth? Do we not plainly perceiue, that he which escapeth longest, and tarrieth the longest while in this world, beholdeth (euery day) more troubles and discontentments, then reall ioyes, or true recreations?

If ye alleage vnto me, the noblesse of Age and length of life, for great experience in things past, as seruing to discover and approue them which follow after. Let me then aske ye, of how much happinesse may we boast, in prouing our vnhappyneesse? Considering, that (whether we be well or ill-pleased) wee must patiently endure those things, which we cannot tell how to shun: hearing that which our cares hateth, and seeing things, wherewith our eyes are most strangely offended.

But what is that which we call olde Age; if not a continuall dolour, and languishing discale? what other fir-mings can we giue, to aged men; but mouing Anatomies, or liuing Mortuaries? Filling them with so many distillations, & falling humors; as leaues them not one good houre, during the remainder of all their poore life time. If then, the verie memory of death, and hourly cogitation of our departure, makes such a certaine aduantage for vs, and assures vs infallibly, that we are (thereby) permitted immunity from sin: how much more then would deaths reall presence preuaile with vs?

Who are more fearefull of death, then such, as neither know, nor vnderstand the faire straite passages thereof? which indeede are such, as all the art in Man cannot corrupt or blemish; except (like a Monster, and no sensible Creature) he would deface all Histories both sacred and prophane. What had the famous Romaine people bin, if the valiant Horatius Coclès had feared death? If Quintus Curtius had bin fearefull and timorous, and had not preferred glorious death, before the irksome life of the world: had not (but for him) the goodly City of Rome bin subiect to the most dangerous Hell, as can be deuised to name vpon earth? them, who (for the freedom of their country) were cheerfully to death, with striking vp the drum, and the very high-est sounds of the Trumpet, (euen as if they had been bidden to some triumph) Did ye euer know a man (that feared death) worthy of so great an honour? For this cause was it, that ancient Hellens so highly praised & applauded the Custome of some barbarous Nations, who, with like promptitude and alacrity ranne to their death: as if they were to be presented in some publique triumph, or other great pleasures and Iouiall spectacles. Why are the Germanes entred into such credit with vs, if it were not onely for this; that they are knowne to be a Nation, merelie prodigall of their liues; and couetous of most precious death?

Hee that gaue the first instrudition, for intermeddling Musick with the harsh battery of warre; as Drummes, Phises, Trumpets, Clarions, and Harps (albeit they of the Harpe is now altogether left) did it for no other occasion, but for a sound assurance to Soldiers: that to dye, was as if a man were going to the Fountaine of all consolation; yea, euen to the perpetuall iouisance, of eternall and immortall Treasures with the highest. Conclude we then, that it much better aualeth to dye quickly, then long time to languish in this wretched world. Let vs also maintaine, that death is more noble and excellent, then life: Because his power extendeth ouer all, and in regard likewise, that he is the Maister Controller of this life. As, not without iust cause and good reason, a Philosopher (being demanded what Death was) readily answered: An accident and passage inuincible, from which, neither by tears, entreats, fights, or the sweetest Kisses, we can be deliuered.

CHAP. XXIII.

The saying of Plato familiarly interpreted, That Kings should be Philosophers, or Philosophers raigne.

Here are very many, who in reading good Authors, doe call things literally, without any further translation (which is a custome the more detestable, to interpret the saying of Plato, so often spoken of within these last two thousand yeares, blamably learned and excellent. Men: His words are these: Those Commonweales shall be most happy, where Kings be Philosophers, or Philosophers be Raigners. And because that diuine Men (especially such as are not contentant in State affaires, nor doe wish for a King, who might altogether bee giuen to learning; and not to the policies fitting his Kingdome) might thereby abuse their iudgement herein, for this would bee the totall ruine of his Monarchy: therefore I will set downe some oblation; what Philosophy is, and what Plato meaneth, wherein a King ought to apply his studies; and whereby, there cannot but redound an extraordinary good and profit to all his people.

This Diuine Man Plato, vnderstood not by a King Philosopher, a Prince, so addicted and bent to studie, that hee should chance to be deposed from his Dignitie; he might thereof make abstinence of liuing afterward. This humours appeared in Dionysius, the younger (King of Saragossa), and the greater part of the Isle of Sicily. Some to the affront, and imposer of Nouell subsidies; for he being offended with his Subjects, and doubting least his estate would haue no long durance: fell to learne good Letters; to the end, that if he happened to be expelled his Royalty, he might become a Schoole-Maister; for the better support of his life; as indeede (afterward) such fortune befell him. This his study of Philosophy, (which is as much to say, as the love of wisdom) while he raigned King, proceeded but from a bad intention in him: for he had done much better, in effecting some worthy policies in his Kingdome, then frequent use of vices, and exercising tyranny; thereby to haue prevented the office of a Pelant; and liuing in such an abject manner. Nero was entrusted (from his youth) in the three partes of Philosophy; and being

How a Prince ought to be a Philosopher.

Diffimulation in some Princes

The Emperor Commodus made but bad benefit of his Philosophy.

Poetry is not reckoned to be Philosophy being created Emperor, was skillfull in Poesie, much addicted to Musick, and to play on the Harpe: yet would hee say, that he could lue well, if he were depofed from the Empire. We had recorded, that many Princes were given to learning, as Tiberius and Adrian who found good companions of Quintus Ioue-Books, and Martiall his Epigrams. But this is no part of Philofophizing, neyther labour of minde, how a Prince should lue after his falling.

For a King to bee a Philosopher, it consisteth in establishing his Throne so assuredly; that he may neuer sit tottering in it, or be shaken out of it. In rendering himselfe necessary to the commonwealth, as well by his vertues, as generous disposition; he fits safe from all defection: carrying himselfe in such fort, like one that is a Tutor ouer many millions, as well in charge, as in correction, and (as he) when time respiteth his Office, then to take delight and recreation. Princes that read plenty of Books, doe it oftentimes for pleasure, rather then to deriue any obseruations thence, for profit of their people. And when they chertish learned men about them; it is onely in hypocritie, and to let their Subjects vnderstand, that they are gouerned by their aduise, and by Men of knowledge. So deale the fore-named Dymisius the elder, as himselfe would often reueale, to such as were his familiar and intimate friends.

The Emperor Commodus (Sonne to Marcus Antoninus, and Emperour likewise) fir-named the Philosopher; was learned, and read ouer diuers Books of Philosophy: And yet notwithstanding, he could not reſtraine, from being the most detestable Emperour, which had bene before, or came after him. Contrariwise, his Successour, who had imployed all his life time, in exercising Marchandize about the sale of Wood or Billets: is numbered among the most bemoaned Emperours; and Fraiane likewise (who scarcely could write his own name) was esteemed a very vertuous Prince and Emperour.

Princes are not to be repured Philofophers, if they can reade lasciuious Bookes of Loue, or compose in poetry; as Thibault, Earle of Brie & Champagne, and Raymond, Counts of Tolosa, whose Poems are yet (at this day) to be ſcene, and they accounted rather ignorant, then learned Philofophers. This is no ſuch Philoſophy: as ought to be exerciſed; but that of true and eſpeti- ciall impit. I will come now brockly to relate. It is to be vnderſtood, that Philoſophy is diuided into three diſtinct parts, to wit: into Phiſicke, Logicke, and Morall Philoſophy, according as Cicero ſaith in his Oratour. The firſt, aymeth onelic at an intire ſearch into the obſcuritie of Natures ſecrets. Logicke diueth into the ſubtilty of diſputations and diſcouſe. Morall Philoſophy, ſpeakes of Life and ciuill manners; & this is that which Kings ought to ſeek after. The beſt exerciſing whereof, is neyther read or ſtudied in the Bookes of the Romane Lawes, called Ciuill Law: For, how euer it produeth ſome honourable eſſectes, yet (queſtionleſſe) it is the onely Motiue, whereby we enter into a Labyrinth of ſuits. Becauſe, in not being built vpon one only piece, but running into diuerſity of ſcantlings, each man makes a cloack thereof after his owne faſhion. Therefore, let Princes neuer meddle with ſuch intricate matter, but reſerre the ſtudy thereof, to men deſtined for ſo troubleſome a profeſſion.

The firſt Lecture that a Prince bought to take, is out of ſacred & vnreprouable writ; becauſe (therby) he ſhall learne knowledge both of God, & of himſelfe, and that the beginning of true Philoſophy, is the fear of God. Next, he ought (about all things elſe) to bring his people in obedience to the Magiſtrate, and the Magiſtrate of the Law, without any infringing or violation. We read of the *Ethiopi*ans, that at the receipt of their Lawes, they proteſted; that they would be ſubied to thoſe Lawes, & paſſe no other letters contrary to them. The people of France, when they place their King in the ſeat of Iuſtice; they deliuer him a ſtaffe in his right hand, on the toppe whereof is the figure of a hand: Giuing therby to vnderſtand, that the King ſhould lend a ſtrong hand to Iuſtice; and then they giue him a ſcepter in the left hand.

He muſt ſtudy to quench ciuill warres in his Kingdome, if there be any, and prevent ſuch as may enſue, vpon the leaſt preſumption or apparance; euer more more keeping promiſe with his Sub- iects, for otherwiſe it may fall out, that delay and length of time, will bring his life and the State into great danger. The death of Henrie the third, King of France, happened thorow euill coun- cill giuen him, and alſo to his Predeceſ- ſors; as the Hiſtories of France and Flanders (written according to truth) doe credibly declare: withouto credi- ting, what deteſtable Macchianell hath written on that Article. By the laſt ciuill warres in Allemagne, the French brought their Frontiers into the Cities of Mentz, Toula, and Perdune, which are three goodly Imperiall Cities, and held by them to this day. They that are called the States of the Low-Coun- tries, and of Flanders, hardened by long Warres againſt their naturall Prince, vpon reſuſall of ſome ſerious requeſts: are become Cantoned; ſo that in com- mon opinion, the whole Countries haue ſuffered grieuouſly: all which had bin well eaded, if no Macchianelliſt had medled among them.

As for ſtrange warres, which a King may haue with other Princes; he muſt bee mindfull of Faith therein, for they are euer the leaſt hurtfull. Provided, that he do it in ſuch fort, that being ſor- rectified with alliance and Confederats, ſtrength, and meanes; hee may haue peace when himſelfe pleaſeth. Euer- more remembering, that he do not imitate Mithridates, King of Pontus, who coun- ſeling to make himſelfe great, loſt both his State and life together. And Frances the firſt, King of France, in ſeeking to ioine Millaine and Italy to his Crown, was fondly taken Priſoner.

He muſt not likewiſe lend eare to ſome kinde of Courtiers, who com- monly are prating, that a generous King ſhould neuer be without war: For in time of their continuance, hee may impoſe great taxes and ſubſidies on his people, which the ſaide people, taking then to be a matter extraordinary, doe ſuſide them (ſoone after) to hold on as ordinary. Theſe meanes (indeede) may encreaſe his reuenues; but ſometimes they reach to troubleſome rebellions, wherein the Prince looſeth both his land and ſubiects. The leagued Coun- tries of Germany, had neuer come vnder their Lords obedience; but for the like cauſes.

In like maner, he ought to make no Forts or Cittadels, except in caſe of ve- ry vrgent neceſſitie; for it doth but de- clare contempt and diſtruſt, conceived in the Prince againſt his people, pro- curing (oftentimes) a reuolt in the ſub- iects, with deſire to ſeek a new Mai- ſter. As the like was imagined to haue happened at the good Citie of Lyons, which hath euermore bene very obedi- ent to her kings, and lent them ſtrong aide in their neceſſities, when they haue bene thereto required. Neuertheleſſe, through ſome bad counſell, and vpon ſmall occaſion, the Kings of France did build a Cittadell there, a meere retreat for al ſcelerates: who, by the cauells of diuers looſe Capraines, too much dimi- niſhing the reuenues of the * Donaue, and the Souldiers committed many in- ſolencies in the Citie, violating diuers Virgins, & making pillage of al things. Which was the cauſe, that the men of Lyons aroſe to ruinate this Cittadell, that ſerued for nothing elſe but wicked purpoſes. And albeit they were ſollicit- ed to take a new party, yet would they not yeild thereto; but kept themſelues in obedience to their King, being con- tented with the demolition of the Cit- tadell, how euer the King otherwiſe mi- ſtruſted them. Such Cittadels ought not to be erected, but in countries new- ly conquered, and not in ancient and ob- edient Cities, whence Princes can re- ceiue nothing, but commodity & plea- ſure. Nor ought he to exerciſe prodiga- lity, or giue immenſe gifts, eſpecially to ſuch people as haue no merit: for wee know very well, that it is the blood and labour of the people, which is ſo pro- digally waſted. And for offending in ſuch manner, ſome Kings haue been de- iected from their Thrones; as hapned to Edw. King of England, ſecond of that name, in the year 1325. who affected nothing but the Family of the Spencers, giuing them all great conſignations, and the Mony of his ſubſidies. Theſe ex- tremes and vnſufferable courſes, raiſed his Queene, Sonne and people againſt him, who were puniſhed with death, & the King (at length) ſtrangled.

Add we hereto, that it is a great blemiſh and deformity in any King, not to be liberal: for a courteous Prince is con- demned of euery one, and hath few Friends.

The erection of Cittadels do but cauſe hatred in the people.

Prodigality is very odious in a Prince, when he giueth im- menſe gifts to unworthy peo- ple.

Courteouſneſſe doth commend a King.

A Prince
should inquire
what is reported of him.

Friends. He should informe himselfe, what is reported of him, to vnderstand who are malecontent, and who pleased, providing for both in good discretion. As (very wisely) did Phillip, King of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, who was informed, that an ancient Knight (following his Court) did nothing but speak badly of him, and raised disters enemies against him. The King comming covertly to know the cause of this obloquy; heard the old Knight complain, that he had imployed both his youth, age, and vttermost meanes in the Kings seruice, whereby he was not onely growne poore, but also vnregarded. The K. will noting fo soule a fault in himselfe, provided for the Knight in such gracious manner: that he had not (formerly) so greatly reprobued him, but now he did much more exalt him. VVhen the King heard thereof, he said to euery one about him; I was the sole cause of the Kings iust complaint, but hence-forward I will take order, that others shall not haue the like advantage against me.

A gracious &
worthy mind
in a King.

The bad and dangerous
counsell of Marshall.

The cause
why Richard
King of England was cr-
elly mislead.

He must be careful to constitute some bad man in great authority, and to haue rule in his Kingdom, euen as his Lieutenant: to the end, that he may bear all the blame, and if the people fall into commotion, they may rest contented with killing him, and so the K. shall remaine safe. This is the Philosophy of Maister Machiuel, a matter verie dangerous; for hereby, both the one & other may well loose their liues. As we may read in the History of England; that King Richard accusing his Earle Marshall to the people, to be the onely cause of Subsidies, and robbing them of their Monies, seeming willing to content the people; he banished him the Land. Which man, could finde no place of safety, either in France, Flanders, Allemagne, nor thorow all Europe, where to make his abiding. After this bad man, the king committed the government of his kingdom to four other Men, against whom, the people conceived as great hatred, as before they had done against the Earle Marshall. Which caused the saide Richard to be imprisoned; where those four men were behated before his prison window, and he himselfe (afterward) lost his life.

He should study, not to be ouer dreadfull to his Subiectes, nor too familiar; for the one begetteth hatred, and the other contempt. He should punish the wrongs of other men, and be sparing in his owne. As did good King Lewes of France, the 12. who in the time when he was but Duke of Orleance, hauing some enmity with King Charles the eight, and seeking to leaze the City of Orleance, for security of his own person, least the King should further labour to disquiet him: the Citizens made fast their gates against him. It happened, notwithstanding many traeries and misfortunes; this Duke came to the Crowne, after deace of the said King: And then the people of Orleance came to entreat him, not to remember precedent accidents, but graciously to grant them pardon.

The King made answer, that he had forgotten all iniuries doone him: but willed them afterward to be careful, how they offended another man. After that Hamball with-drew himselfe from Italie, the Romaines found no better means of raigoin in quiet for the time to come: then by forgetting those iniuries, which they had received by the Common-weales of Italy, that had ioyned with Hamball in making the warre.

In quarrels among great men hee ought not to entremedle, to support one side more then the other: but cause them to lay downe their Armes, by his absolute authority, and seek best means to reconcile them. For, in formalizing himselfe, more for the one then the other, it hath many times occasioned intestine war, and sometimes the losse of Royal dignity, as hath too often happened both in France and England.

He should not be addicted to wine, but shun drunkennesse as payson. For a King being drunke, is like a Lion, or any other furious beast, that bites and teares the first he meets withall. It causeth beside, that the K. (hauing his spirits fiered and troubled with wine) may kill some one man in that fury, or otherwise fo offend him: as may afterward endanger both his Royall person and the State. He must moderate choller, so much as in him possible lieth, without vsing either a Sword or Staffe. Imitating hereein the Bees, whose King hath no sting at all: For choller and fury are the chiefe hinderers, that the soule cannot forme her functions according to reason.

Incontinency, whoredome, and obscenity, should be detestible to him, and for his better support, he must frequent no luxurious company, nor haue any such person about him, whose ordinary talk is euen more thereto enclining; but such, whose speech is alwaies vertuous. Luxury makes a man dull, neglect, and effeminate, and a King (giuen to that vice) should rather carry a distaffe, then a Scepter. Sardanapalus, King of Assiria, lost his life, by being ouer-greedily giuen to this sin. So did Nero, Emperour of Rome. King Frances, first of that name, became very vnihealthfull in his aged daies, by being too much addicted to this vice; and yet otherwise, he was vertuous, and a lover of learning.

Being affected of his Subiects, for his good life, his treasury is the purse of his people, who will succour him liberally when he shall haue any needfull occasion. Which, in our memory, and not long since, Elizabeth, that famous Q. of Eng. found to be true. For in al her time, she neuer oppressed her people, but declared her selfe to be the liuely Mirrour of true Maiesty. And therefore, when there came a very potent Army (verie strongly bent against her and her Kingdome) such as (in humane iudgment) was likely to preuaile: yet her Subiects Bounty & Loue (next to heauens blessing) stood so strongly to her, that when her enemies suppoled her ruine necessarily they were shamefully foyled, and the gloriously triumphed. Cyrus and Alexander, two great Monarches, made themselves mighty, not by their Money (for they had none at all, or at least very little, at their first aduenturing) but were only assisted by friends, and the purse of their people. Whereas on the contrary, Darius and Cresus, two Kings that had abundance of treasure, and no loue of their people; were brought into most miserable condition.

Let him not be easily led, to beleue some Counsellors, men affected in the search of nouelties, vsing perswasion, to attempt Conquests and far off voyages: as crossing the Seas, either to Barbary, Asia, and the foure quarters of the world, 500. a thousand, or two thousand leagues distant from his own Kingdome; and ther to make war: such wars doe oftentimes beget the total ruine of his owne estate. As hapned to King Lewes of France, ninth of that name, who lost a goodly Army of Noble-men and braue Souldiers in Syria, himselfe also beeing there taken Prisoner, to the no little cost of his owne Kingdom. After his returne home, he would needes be gone thither againe: but he died before the City of Thunis, and lost the verie greatest part of his Army.

By perswasion of the Generall, Charles King of France, the sixt, sent an Armie into Liberty, against the chiefe Citie of Affrica: but one part of the French dyed there thorow Famine, and by inclemency of the aire, and the rest returned home, not hauing performed any one act of honour. John of Bourgonie, Counte of Neuers, was sent with a worthy French army into Epire, against Bazareth, Emperour of the Turkes, in assistance of the Hungarians: but there hee was surprized, and kept as Prisoner, with the Constable of France, and diuers others, and the whole French Armie quite defeated. Lewes of France the twelfth, sent an army against the Turks, that besieged Antioche, a Citie in the Isle of Leibes: but vterly in vaine, for he lost (well neere) all his people. Notwithstanding, if a King make a league against any Iustidell Prince, and that all Christian Princes (or the more part of them) are thereto, likewise moued and solicited, vpon good reason; the King ought to contribute both Men and Money, but not to goe in person, except hee haue an assured peace with all his Neighbour Princes. Now, albeit a King had conquered a farre-off Country, yet scarcely knowes he how to keepe it for any long time: because the manners of strangers will hardly agree with theirs of that Country, and then the building of Cittadels is to be talk on, but yet he must Philosophize how to maintain them. It much better for any King, to sustaine himselfe vpon the forces of his men of armes, and fidelity of his Subiects; then on the strongest walls he can build. Which the Laecemonians practised, by the aduise of Lycurgus. But after they had engirt the Citie of Sparta with Walles, and gaue themselves wholly to the forti-lying of places: thence forward, their Common-weale grew to bee inst nothing. The Turke practiseth the verie same yet to this day. The first Cantons of the Suiters, had neuer any wals, and were no other then great Villages; for they relied more vpon their strength, then any trust in wals.

But it may be alleaged vnto me, that it is good for a King to read, to the end, he may learne something, as other men doe, and as other Kings haue formerlie done. This I approue, and do no way mislike, at such times as he is not to bee more seriously employed: For, a King that will well discharge his duty, shall find very little time of respite or leisure. Bookes that discourse on matter of good manners, should then be most familiar with him: because, in them hee shall learne such lessons, as no man else dare be so bold as to teach him.

Concerning
tories.

As for Bookes of Histories, he must haue choise and plenty of them, because in reading such as are another mans Collections, that neuer saw, or came where they were acted: they cannot alwaies talke of truth, in regard, that hee giueth credit but to what he finds in another mans Papers, and Writers, will (visually) speak fauourably of their owne occasions. If they be Histories, concerning the time when the Authour liued: he will be sure to fauor the Prince, and the party which hee best affected, or to whom he was Pensioner. As may be noted in Paulus Iouis, the Italian, and Sleydam, the Germane Historian, who haue written well enough: except whē they fall into some particular matters, as of Religion, or such like; there they are evidently perceived to wander, in speaking partially, or out of priuate affection. Likewise, he should not iudge of good and lawfull enterprises, according to the bad successe they haue had, or so to condemne them: neither, whē affaires haue bin ill grounded, & worse managed, to repute them good, because they haue passed with fortunate euent. Therefore it behooueth any Prince, to read Histories, with good and deliberate iudgement.

Concerning
the reading of some Princes.

Alexander Seuerus (at an houre of leisure) would read Platoes Common-wealth, the Offices of Cicero, and sententious Horace. Wile Scipio, when occasione serued, would read the Institutions of Cyru, propofed by Xenophon. Charles the first, Emperour, neuer reade any Authour, but Philip de Commines, who wrote the life of King Lewes the eleauenth. I would not be mistaken herein, as (seeking by these allegations) to restraints a Prince from reading, or limit him none other, but these Bookes only. But I say, that the principall Bookes, and those which bee most necessary for him: are such, as do discourse on the affaires of State, and of matter belonging to the Common-wealth.

Many times, it falls out, to bee more expedient for a Prince, to buy a Town by intelligence, or giuing Money to the Enemy: then to take it by force of armes, though it cost him not so much; so is the Land sure to be no way ruined.

To conclude, let a King stand vpon his Guards, and haue assured and trusty people about him; euermore ready, least occasion should present it selfe, & he be suddenly surprized: such as were the Legionaries, or those trained Souldiers, instituted by King Francis, first of that name.

And for conclusion to his Philosophy, he should be little, or of least reckoning in his owne eye, how great or potent focuer hee appeareth to other. As it happened to Alexander, who had no sooner ended his Conquests in the East, but (standing vpon his own pride) he was cast downe, and paysoned by his owne Followers. Baiazeth, the verie greatest Emperour of all the Turkes that were before him: was vanquished, chained, and carried about in a Cage of Iron, by Tamberlaine, King of the Tartares, who was but a Neat-heard, by his first profession.

Behold (in summe) what Philosophy Princes ought to learne, which is not so much comprized in Bookes as it is the braine (prouided of good and solid iudgement) the feare of God being alwaies principally preferred. So shall the saying of Plato be truly found in them: That Kinges ought to be Philosophers, or philosophers raigne.

principall City thereof is called Siras, in elder times tearmed Persepolis; which is gouerned by the Sophy, Great Lord of all Persia and Azimis, called (by our Elders) Affria; and the Kingdom of Deardeth, sometime named Mesopotamia, and Seruan, that was Media, and Parthia, now called Iex; with Hi ca, now tearmed Caraxan; And Sarmatia, now Dulcendana; and Asia, at this instant called Hetti. All these Regions, with the greater Armenia (which is a part also of them) are gouerned by the Great Sophy, and the greatest or largest City vnder his command, is named Tauris, being built in the midst of the Mountaine Taurus, foure Dayes journey off from the Caspian Sea. Next vnto Tauris, there are other Cities beside; as Soltania, Concaflan, Saphan, Coraxan, Lera, Moira, Sarmachand, Gessi, Far, Siras, and Ormuz, a City in the Perseike

There are also other Citties, as Cureh, Iex, Casimine, and Coy, with infinite Castles. On the west-side of the Cittie Tauris, are the Caspian Mountaines, which bee now called the Mountaines of Ararat: And on the Bacchan Sea (aunciently named the Caspian Sea) are these Citties; Summachia, Derben, Bacchan, and Mamutaga. All these Prouinces, and their Regions, are very barren, because they haue small store of Riuer: the greatest whereof, is cald Bindarin, but (in former times) they entitiled it Brigada. The people of these Regions, are warlike, ciuill, and very valiant men: ther is not so much ciuility found in Asia, as in these people, but they are all Mahumetists.

And there they make the best Steele Armors, that is in any Lande, which are made at a place called Azimis, where there is great abundance of Silke. As concerning the Gouernment heere obserued, Xenophon (speaking of those elder dayes) saith; That they haue a certaine cheefe place, called by them, Freedom, wherein standeth the Kings Pallace, and all the houses of the cheefest men. Neere vnto this, ther is such another vnde place made fit for Merchants, and things to be sold by Mercenary Artificers, seuered farre off one from another, to the end, that such as are addicted to vntue and Liberall Arts, may not be molested with faules,

The Market-place of Freedom or Liberty, is diuided into foure parts or habitations, and are reſtrained Courts. In one, dwelleth young Children: In the ſecond, Youths without Beards: in the third, men of mature yeares: and in the fourth; ſuch as (by Age) are no more able or bound to follow the warres. Each of theſe (by Law) hath his place and exerciſe: the Children and men do aſſemble together daily, in their ſeueral quarters; but the Olde men not ſo often, but only vpon ſome appointed dayes. The young men, with ſuch Armes as they are allowed to exerciſe, doe tend about the Princes dwelling in the Night time, except they be ſuch as haue wiues, who, not being ſubiect to ſuch commaund, is fauoured for the Night ſeruiſe. But they account it not honeſt, but rather a ſhame and diſgrace, to be ouer-ſoone married. Each Court hath twelue Preſects, according to the number of the Persian tribes. To the Children, are old graue men appointed, apt for their better continuance in good manners: and ſuch men likewiſe to the youthes, as (by their Vertue), can yeild them beſt example of imitation. For, the men of riper yeares, there are Gouernors elected, that by conſormitie of their paſſed liues, and regular ſway of authority, may holde good diſpoſition with them, not anie way to ſwerve from the wil and direction of their Prince, but doe containe them in verie facile obedience.

The exerciſes of each age & degree.

The Children are enſtruched in Schooles.

The exerciſes of each age and degree (to the end that euery man may knowe, with what care and induſtry he muſt become a good Citizen) are theſe. The Children of Persia (like to ours) doe attaine to Learning in Schooles, and there they are taught to vnderſtand, what it is to liue according to Juſtice and honeſty. Such as are their Gouernors there, doe ſpend the moſt part of the day, in iudging and giuing ſentence on ſuch Delictes, as are reported one of another. Such as are accuſed of Theft, Rapine, Violence, Deceit, Diſhoneſt Language, and ſuch like offences, being found innocent in theſe Crimes, the falſe accuſers, are preſently puniſhed. About all other Vices, Ingratitude is moſt ſeuereſly chaſtiſed, as being the occaſion of infinite ſhames among men. And he that is found negligent, in returning like thankfullneſſe for a benefiſt receiued, they ſticke not publickly to maintaine, that out of this Vice, iſſueth contempt of the immortal Gods, their Countrey, Parents, and Friends: & finally, that it is the head and moſt reſtoriginall of all other euils whatſoever. Beſide this, they learne to liue temperately, and for inducement thereto, they repute example of the moſt ancient, to be beſt available, and the beholding of their temperate behaviour.

In like manner, with no great difficulty, they are incited to continencie, with ability to endure both hunger and thirſt: by ſeeing men of ſuch graue yeares, not part away thence to eating or drinking, without liſenſe obtained of the Preſects. They eate not in the Mothers company, but alwayes with their Maiſters: for their diet is brought to the School, which is Bread and Hearbes, commonlie called * Nofurtium. Little need of drink haue they, becauſe they vſe nothing but Water, vntill the age of ſixteene yeares. They haue Bowes and Arrowes, where- with they praſtiſe ſhooting, and afterward are ſent to dwell among the * Epheli, who are young youths, that likewiſe haue, and do ſtill lead the ſame kinde of life.

Their attendance and ſleepe time, is as we haue already ſaid, about the Princes Lodgings, and as well for a Watch or guard to the City, as alſo to preuent ſuch Luxuries, which commonly do ouer-abound in theſe young yeares, except they be helpen by diligent ſolicitude, & venie ſtirring exerciſes. In the day time, they waite vpon their Preſects, to the end that they may be alwayes in readineſſe. When the King rides on hunting (which happens diuers times in the month) one part of them do go along with him, carrying each man his Bow, and Quiuer of Arrowes, his Axe or Long Sworde, his Shield, and two Darts: one readie to draw, and the other to hold in his hand, as well to defend as offende with them. The King, as in a ſiſion of a King, euen ſo in Hunting, he is the Captaine, purſuing the chafe with greateſt diligence, and commanding all the reſt what is neceſſary to be done. So that this exerciſe, ap-peareth like vnto warre, by carefull foreſight, to keepe a good houre of riſing in the morning, to endure both colde and heate, to run after Wild-Beaſts; and (by the ſharpenneſſe of a ſauage Countrey) to make the body able to euery labor. They are likewiſe (manie times) enforced, to awake the wilde Beaſts comming againſt them, reſpectiue alwayes, that if hee be more powerfull then he was reputed, they may all ſurre preſently, exerciſing ſtill that ſmall reſpit of time, euen as if they were in the Campe for battaile.

Euery man carries his own food with him; and yet they eate not before the houre of ſupper time, except they haue leiſure to ſtand ſtill awhile, in expectation of ſome wilde Beaſts comming, or haue giuen better order for the Chafe. When they haue ſuſt, the next day following they purſue ſtill the Game, vntill the ſame houre of Supper againe, neuer more without feeding, making two daies together but one, in reſpect of eating: which habitude is alſo moſt profitable in Warre, reſpectiue times, which often do enforce a great ſcarſitie of Victuals. If there bee any death, then they vſe to temper their bread, with the aforeſaide Nofurtium, for no man there will eate, till vrgent hunger compell him. Farre differing from them, that care not what exceſſe they feede Gluttony withal, who can neuer iudge truly, how little would ſerue, or be really delightfull to Nature: like to him that can pleaſe appetite with ſimple Bread, or a poore ſmall Cake, & ſeckes not to ſlake thirſt with Wine, but harpeleſſe water.

They that remaine at home in their houſes, for ſafe-gard of the Cittie, haue publick places appointed, for like exerciſes in them: They haue a care of all occaſions, euen from verie Childe-hood, to ſee them vſe their Bowes, hurle their Darts, and exerciſe Armes. They that are moſt vertuous, wiſe, learned, and active of perſon, doe carry greateſt Commendation, and are honoured of the people; not only the Preſects, but euen ſuch alſo, as haue, bin any occaſion (by their diligence) of their education from Childe-hood, they carry worthie Commendation, and are contained in highſt fauour.

If any lewd Offender ſhould be fought for, any Theſe apprehended, or ſpeedy ſuccout ſent to ſome neceſſed place, in dealing with theſe occurrences, vvhich require haſt and ſtrength of body; the Gouernors make vſe of none but young, luſty men, who (hauing bin trained ten yeares in ſuch Diſciplines) are ranked among the number of men, that (to the age of ſiue and twenty), haue hadde the Gouernment of them, as the Preſects had of their Childe-hood, euer to make them ready for ſeruiſe of the Commonwealth. When they go in battell order, they vſe neither Bowes, Darts, or Weapons, to offend a farre off but ech mans breſt is armed with a Cuiraſſe, his ſhield vpon his arme, and ſo he confrontes his Enemy, either with his Axe, or with his Sword. The Heads or Commanders, are all Preſects, yet none of them abide in the City, haue care of the young Children and youth.

When they haue paſt this time, and attained to the age of ſiſtie yeares, they are placed among the old men, ſent forth no more to warre; but reſt in their Countrey, where they elect Preſects, ordaine Iudges for publicke and priuate cauſes, and likewiſe (as Iurons) do paſſe vpon the liues of men, that ſentence may be giuen vpon euery delict, according as the crime appeareth by due euidence, in which caſes, euery man offended, hath free liberty to accuſe. He that ſtands condemned in the whole courſe of his life, is reputed moſt infamous. The whole Commonwealth of the Persians, containeth in it an hundred and twentie thouſande men.

There is no prohibition, of being inſtruched in the publicke Schooles, where Juſtice is truly taught, neither is it forbidden by any Lawe, but that a man (by his Vertues) may attaine to dignitie and honor, no exception is made, but only want of Vertue. Yet let me tell ye, moſt choiſe is made of Rich mens ſonnes for the Schooles, not becauſe their Parents haue leaſt need, but that themſelues are ſooner infected with Vices. And poore mens ſonnes (for neceſſity of common maintenance) are ſent to Shoppes, to learne Mercenarie exerciſes, whereby to liue.

The Children that haue been enſtruched in the Diſciplines fore-named, may conuerſe with the Epheli, but not the others. The Epheli, that haue liued according ding to the Lawes, may likewise abide among the men, and attaine to Honours and Magistracie. And these men, after they have lived according to the Persian Discipline, may go amongst the Oldest Men, who having lived (all their time) with greatest Iustice, are most worthie and excellent Citizens in the Commonwealth.

An expresse note of abstinence in the Persians, is, that they can endure labour enough, yet live moderately. But among vs, there is little or no respect at all, albeit they hold it for the greatest infamy, to spher in company, or make clean the nose, and to void Vrine publicly, or do any such Offices in open sight. All which, we might easily shun, if we would eate but little, and the grosse naturall humors of the bodie, would consume themselves by labour and exercise of the body.

In these daies, all things in the world being altered, the Persians make their wars with most vniuersal course, and (for ought I can perceiue) bad conditions, because as they have a wonderful Cavalierie, so they have no certaine power of Infanterie or Footmen, either ordinarie or aged. By which part of strength, the Turke (euen in our times) having gotten many notable victories, and being neuer foyled in any place; hath brought verie great and important warres to end. It is a matter also verie vnbeneficiall to the Persians, that they vse no Shotte, neither abound in any Artillerie on Carriages, with which terrible helpe, every attempt is soonest concluded. As was too well exemplified, by the vnhappy prooue of Vran-Cassius, and of Ismael, whose Cavalierie were then honourably victorious. Lately also, in the Caldean Fields, and in memory of our Fathers at Harjengs and Ephrates, where they could not endure the great and vnaccustomed noise of their Horsies, in that most cruel & bloodie Tempest. Wherefore, in no place may the armed man of Persia, compare with the Turke, if he were disarmed. Because the Persian is (of all parts) covered with a scallie Cuirace; his Pancerie or Belly-peece, of Iron; his buffed Helmet strongly crested, and hung thicke with Feathers, his Shield or Target rounde, and curiously embellished with Golde. But the Turke of Europe, as vtterly naked, is scarcely halfe covered with a round bended Target, after the manner of the Asian Shildes, inter-woven with Reeds, subtilly sweetened with Cinnamon, and embroidered with Silke of sundrie Colours. The Persian likewise couereth his arme and right hand, with a false sleue and Gauntlet of Steele, galloping with a Launce of Ash, which hath two points; and being met in the midst, (after the Moores fashion) oftentimes beares off the blowe on high, for easier passage of the men and Horse disarmed. But, the Turke (according to the Grecian vse) placing his Launces butt-end in his flanke, and flogging it vnto his horsies earre (like them that are made of light and brittle Firre) runnes swiftly vpon the spurre, breaks it at the first blow, and so paising on to the enemies Armie, is constrained to lay hand to his Semitar, or to his iron Mace, as vnable to gouerne the Persians furie. For, they are mounted on great & vertie strong horsies, that haue their foreheads armed with Iron, and their bodies covered with foddren Leather hides (after the manner of the Italianes Cappanions) flatted together in narrowe foldes, and plaisted with Bumbaist or Silke, to beare off every blow falling thereon. In which regard, no one of them (except ouer-audaciously) will compare the best Persian, either with the Archer on Horsebacke, or foote-Soldier of the Turk. For he being armed with a big strong Bowe, full of manie knotted Nerues; drawes an Arrowe of good roundnesse, after the Tartars manner, and his fall is almost deadly.

All these things being equally compared together, the armie of the Sophie, euen bounde and deputed to the King, (by an opinion of a high and Diuine minde, and by a certaine Religious Sacramental reason) not being fearefull of death in any place, although it bee inferior to the Turkes in number, might seeme inuincible, if it were not oppressed by Treacherous and vnworthie men of valour, furie of Artillerie, and vnusall multitudes of men.

I finde, that the principall occasion, why Ismael brought to many Prouinces (by glorious Armes) vnder one sole Emperie, yet with lesse number of Soldiers then others would beleue (especially against Ottoman, who ouer-ran the countrey so farre as Armenia, and wasted all things)

(things) was only this: that he released all Tributes, and took away every taxation, (only to purchase fame by liberality) vnto his very vassals. And it hath imported this new King thence, to doe because (by force of Armes) he expelled the lawfull heires, from the State and Empire, after Vran-Cassius the Graund-fire, and slayd their Father. In which respect, hee was neuer needie of Money; and therefore, when any warre arose, he brought forth two Armies, combined by their strong and iust Nerues, albeit the countries of the East (abounding in manie things) be full of such diversity of rich Kingdomes; benigne and largely would haue afforded supply of pay, for all the necessities belonging to life and warfare. Quite contrary to Solyma case, who continually was serued with Infanterie and Horsemen; Masters of the Artillerie, & Captaines of the Army, and all such be-side, as were either Officers for the field, or attended in his Pallace; who were daily and monthly paid by the treasurer, that deliuered forth monies. Nor in this case is there any want of Treasuries, because that in Constantinople there are seuen Towers or Castles, which containe in them inestimable mountains of mony, both of gold and silver, with perpetual entrance yearly, of so many tributes and taxationes, as do exceed all expences whatsoever, by the fourth part.

Among the Persians there are 3. sorts of Soldiers, to wit, of the Guard; of men vnder command; and of voluntarie assistants. Those of the Guard, are at a certain pay, and are dieted at the Kings cost, and he likewise (according to an antient Custome) and at certaine times of the year, obserued in writing, as an ouerplus of bounty; giues them Armour, horsies, Garments, Pauillions or Tents for the field, and victuals. At these times, being attended with a goodly companie of Lords, as also the Soldiers at command, and brassest voluntaries; hee maintaines the reputation of a frequent Court; and Progracing vnto places of best maintenance, proceedeth on to visit the most Noble Citties of the Prouinces. When there is no wars, the Dinasti, Lord, Detarachi, and Feudatories of ancient Nobility (who enjoy the Signories of the Castles and Countries, giuen by their elders, do find all the prouision in Prograce; or if it be giuen them by the King, it is collected againe by Edict. They do also whatsoever else is commanded them, according to the same reason, or equality in condition; as (vnusually) at the Nobilitie in Spain, Prance, and Italy. We see to steele their Lord and King withall.

The number of the Soldiers is great, and when they are in Armes, they resort to their Ensignes; but if a diligent inquiry be made, they neuer amout to 20000. Horse. Nor doe the third part of them (surpased in such better manner) as yet haue before declared, resort to battell, for all the rest are contented with their Hel-mets, Mantles (of hard and thicke-woven stuffe) wrapped about them; and covered with sundry thickes; their fight is conducted with the Lance and Bow. For they haue neuer learned to helpe those former kinde of Armes, and according as place & occasion requires; do blinde the shieldmore the shoulder, to receive the Lance of a pursuing enemy, and stand vpon his defence before, with his Bow and Arrows. Those Shields which are truly made to come from Persia, and from the Royal City of Seiras (where Armour is made of most excellent temper, and verie worthy wormanship) are reputed to be the best estimation. As also, and in Persia.

Next vnto these, are the neighboring Affrins, by authority of named, therefore the Kingdome of the Molochians, do afford the verie best and vallantest Archers, beyond all other, except the Tartars. But the Armenians do euer most of all to fight on foot, & vnto them selues of the Infanterie. For they plaie (vpon the ground) along preparation of Shields; great and plaine, euen as if they had a Rampier before them, and so defend themselves against the furie of the Horsemen, fighting with Pikes, and very short Axes, as also Bowes and arrows; yea, many times they fight both neerer and far off, with Slings that haue short handles. People that come to helpe them as voluntaries, are sent out of Iberia and Albania, who are their confederate Kingdomes, and neighbor vpon Media and Armenia, being (for the most part) halfe Christians; and therefore do maintaine equal hatred against the Ottomans; and warre against them.

CHAP. III. Against Julius Cæsar, because in his Commentaries of the Wars in Gaul, he oftentimes calleth the Gauls, at this day French-men) Barbarians.

Hat which I haue purposed to handle in this Chapter, proceedeth not either from affection, or out of great animosity: but rather to defend (against the Spaniard, Italian, or Greeke) the famous Kingdome of France: For, whan they are growne discontented with the French, or be chafed, and ouercome by them in warre; they sightfully reime them Barbarians, Idoll-worshippers, and Saluages, and say, they learned it of Iulius Cesar.
Now, to discusse whether it be true, or not, that the whole Quaility of the world was amongst the Romaines, and that the Gauls hadde not as much, or more then they: is remaineth vpon sufficient prooffe and teake. Although that Iulius Cesar was a great Capitaine, hauing all these good partes in him, which are required in an Emperour: yet notwithstanding, it may plainly be noted, that being vnable to ouercome his Conquerors in Gauls, hee therefore callles it a light Nation, inconstant and barbarous.

ignat of an ancient Oracle, Servus servorum, the last Verse, whereof I saymeth thus much, Send the desperate heathens, and the filthy foolish nations, that do love sinne, that they may see the lives of men. And I will first bestow some Meditation. A Remaine shall I call you was from the times of Jehoiakim, hath left Witten, that the said Remaine had a Customs, when they behelde themselves in any great perill so voyd and promise solemnly, that they would immolate to Iupiter, all creatures that received life in the next Spring time, calling the Spring time Holy. In these vows, were comprized all the Infants liues that shold be born during this season. But at length, they converted this sacrificing of infants, by sending them into exile; which likewise seemed very cruell, to banish poore and innocent Infants.

For ought I knowe, there is not anie people or Nation, that can say of themselves, they have flood cleare from these horrible Sacrifices. For, in Athor, a Creeti- an Island, they vied the same. In Egypt, in Helipolis, where every day they slaue three men, to offer them to the Goddesse Isis, the Lacedemonians Sacrificed to God Mars, the Thebians did as much to Saturne, when they were vexed with Peſtilence, or persecuted with great warres. Hilbrow, an ancient Author, saith, that the Cretes, a people of Creete, vied to appeale Saturne, by offering young Infants in sacrifice vnto him. In Laodicea, a Citie of Caſo-ſy- ria, they did the like, to make the God-desse Fallax placable. The Trimes do fluffily denie, that they do not immolate their Infants to God Moloch. The Thracians, Carthaginians, Syrians, and (wel-neere)
all the Grecians, did exercise such detestable Sacrifices. And it was common euerie where, vntill the time of the Em-perour Cladius, who made an Edicte to the contrary. And yet at this day, tho-row all the Great Prouinces of India, otherwise called the New-world, not only do they still sacrifice men, but also feed on humane flesh.

If Julius Cæſar reputed the Gauls to be barbarous, becauſe (having promiſed & made vowes to their Gods) if they might win battailes againſt their enemies, they offered ſuch Sacrifices to them: I ſhould rather iudge it great Piety and Religion in them, towards their Gods and Country.

Chap. 2.

they, because they made no spare of them selves, but Sacrificed all (with them) all that which they had conquered in warre, of what great value and estimation soever it were. For it is especially to be remembered, that whereofsoever Religion & Justice is, there can be accounted no barbarousness. Contrariwise, after victory obtained in some battaile, the Romaines sacrificed common Creatures, and made particular profit of the very greatest Riches conquered by them: as of Captives, Gold, Silver, Horfes, and such like, offering to their God Jupiter Phae-retus, moveables of small value; as some Armour, pricelesse Rings, and Garments. Moreover, such was the vertue and magnanimity of the Gauls, as to endure so many tribulations, which time could lay vpon them while they lived. But the Romaines, to free themselves from all perils; would commonly kill themselves; if they were detained in prison, or otherwise, which is the act of men downe-falne in hart.

If he hold them for barbarous, because they haue eaten humane flesh, as it is very true; he must vnderstand, that it happened vpon an extreme necessity; when himselfe came downe vpon them, with three hundred thousand Cymbrians, Teutons, or Allemagnes into Gallia Sequana, and besieged the City of Sens. For victuals failing them, by reason that all the Countrey was spoiled about them, and the Enemy kept a long and strict sidge vpon them: this poore distressed people (vnable to defend the City otherwise) consisting of aged persons, women and children, voyaged yeare in yeares; did voluntarily exprofe their liues, to feede their bowels that defended their Countrey, and for preservation of the Gauls Commonwealth. But this was not ordinarily done, nor vpon any wanton or licentious appetite; likewise, neuer was it cuer eated to bee done; neither before that time, or after. Contrariwise, much more barbarously, and without any necessity at all; the Komaine made it a Louial vfe, to feed on mens flesh in their feasts and banquetts, as Galen assures vs, that himselfe hath scene, in the time of the Emperour Commodus. Some Spaniards (euery other times) haue done as much in the Indies, for hauing no other victuals:

they would eat their own companions, and Indians, that died on diseases, or famine.

Julius Caesar also makes a mockery, because there were certain people, trained and waged or mercenary Soldiers, among the Gauls, who made a free gift of themselves to people of wealth, to do all such services as they would imploy them in, receiving their whole nourishment and maintenance (from them) while they lived. But looke of what death fouer their Maisters dyed they would gladly and willingly follow them therein, to keepe them company, and do service to their Lords foules, in another world, because this was an Article of their Religion. But the Romans had an inuoliable law, which was, that if a Maister had few or many slaves, and he hapned to be slaine (albeit that some other had killd their Maister) yet all the Slaves must be slaine. Nay, they had worse customes, for if a Captaine were offended with his Soldiers, or some idle roye tooke him in the head: hee would haue euery tenth man in his Army cut out, and cause them to be hewen in pieces before him, by the other Soldiers of the same company. More, the great number of Gladiatores or Fencers, that they caused to kill one another (either in their open Theaters, or other publique places strewed with Sand) with very keene edged and sharpe pointed Swords, before all the people, without any pity or compassion, saying: Thus did the Romaine people, and more cruelly in war. Nor might these Fencers giue over the fight, what hurrs or wounds fouer they had receiued; except the people were so pleased. They would make their Captiues also fight with cruell Beastes; as Lyons, Beares, Tygers, and others, not in any small number; but by thousandes at a time; only for a pastime to the people, and to win themselves credit, that when they fought after any office, they might bee assured of their voyces.

Perhaps he called them barbarous; because that the Gauls (in his time) had no other food for their ordinary provision, but Swines Flesh. I answer him, that it is one of the best and wholesomest meate, which can be used for any nourishment: for it verie easily conuerteth into the substance of man, as being almost of the same temperature. The Athletes and Wrestlers of Greece, to make them selfe sturdy, strong, and of the best habitude, would feed on no other Victuals, but bread and Porke. But the Romaines of Cæsar's time, enriched and made fat with the spoils of the world; were become Gourmandes, dissolute, and prodigall, as the like could not be found in any other Nation. One may serue for an example of the rest, who termed himselfe a great friend vnto Cæsar, named Lucullus, that spent vpon one meale, twentie thousand Crownes. But by this kinde of badde life, multitude and varietie of Disshes, and extreame Gluttonie vsed amongst them: the Romaines grew to be verie vnhealthfull, according as Cornelius Celsus writeth. And no man is so ignoraunt, but knoweth verie well, that leading such a life, doth rather truly fauour of Beasts liues and barbarisme, then of the least part or iotte of Ciuilitie.

Hee should not call them barbarous, because when they were at rest in their houses, they slept not vpon soft featherbeddes, but ordinarily vpon the harde ground; which the Romaines (in those times) could not doe. Most certaine it is, that it is rather a Vertue to sleepe in such manner, then otherwise, for more easie support of such discommodities, as commonly doe attend on men of warre: who (as it should seeme) are sent of heauen, for defence of their Country, to subdue inciuill people for their sinnes. Nor, for wearing of short Garmentes, could he call them barbarous, because it is the nature of a Warlike people, rather to be clad in Garments which are short, then such as belong and trouble some.

Besides the Title of Barbarous, he accounts them to be a light-headed people, verie mutable in opinion and counsell. Hee speaketh these things, as a sworne enemy vnto them. For, when he had sowne diuisions and Quarrelles among them, hee would feigne to bee on one side, and quite against the other. But they perceiving his subtilty, disclaymed from his kindnesse, and brake the agreements which they hadde made with him.

He neither summoued or went beyond them in open and false warre, for indeed he could not: but only by trecheries, because his intent was, to possesse himselfe of Gaulle, and be King thereof, if he had vanquished Pompey. Now, because they discerned his deuises, & knew the Dominion of the Romans to be more insupportable, then that of the Allemaignes, whom the Gaules of Sequana had called to their aide, against them of Autunni, and so leagued them selves together very gladly: therefore he calls them light and inconstant. I leaue to further consideration, whether hee had sufficient subiect to hold them for such.

If he conceited them (then) not to be Lettered, hee was much deceived; for from all antiquity, the Gaules had knowledge in that part of Physolophy, which we terme Naturall, and of the Ethique or Morall too, instructing policie and good manners, which ought to support a Common-wealth. Nor went they among the Greekes to seeke instruction, as manie haue imagined. For, whereas Cæsar saith in his Commentaries, That they vsed Greek Characters in their writings; hee meaneth not, that they spake the Greek Language. But three hundred years (or thereabout) before that Rome was taken and sacked by the Gaules, it was (as their owne Historians haue recorded) both without Law and Iustice. True it is, that they were good Warriors, and that tenne men were sent from them into Greece, to seeke lawes, whereby to pollicie their Common-Wealth. The Gaules on the contrarie, would neuer vse the Lawes of any other; but contented themselves with those, which they hadde receiued from eldest antiquity; as manie people vsed by their example; yea, euen the Romaines themselves, imitated them in Articles (enow) of their Religion, hauing withdrawne some of their Physolophers and Priestes, who could not followe those other Gaules, when as they departed from Italy to goe into Greece, by reason of the Dearth of Victualles.

The Reader, by conferring both manners and fashions in behavior of the one and other; will finde as much, or rather more Barbarisme in the Romaines, then in the Gaules. And although they haue changed their Name, for that braue nation of Warriors in Franconia, who are mingled

CHAP. III.

How long time it is, since the Switzers were Cantoned: and vpon what occasion their Country was called, the Land of Leagues.

BEFORE we speake anie thing of the Switzers, I should describe the situation, Groundplot, and constitution of the country, which was giuen them; to bee Mountainous and strong (the only benefit of getting Liberty) to the end that the Reader may the better comprehend the History, purposely intended for his instruction, in knowing, why the people were Cantoned. To shew yee then, what the Country is, which is called of the Switzers, or the Lande of Cantons; or of Leagues; ye must vnderstand, it is that which was called by the Romaines, Heluetia; It beginneth in the verie highest Alpes, and endeth (on the East-side) at Rh. me, descending towards the North, so farre as Waldrut and Lausimbourg; and from thence it turneth towards the West, as in a direct trade, by the Mountaine Jura, euen to the Lake of Geneua: and afterwards, remounteth vpon the Alpes againe.

The Country seemeth to be straight and narrow; as appearing, that the verie largest place, should not extend it selfe above forty Leagues, and (in some places) much lesse: the length also to consist of about an hundred and ten Leagues. It is verie Mountainy, populous, and yet more then other Countries, cannot nourish or maintaine men. They are a warlike people, able to endure all traualles in warre. Manie of them (at this day) doe liue vpon such Wages, as they receiue of strange Princes that will employ them: not that they take part with such as will giue them most Wages (as some think) but in willingness to serue whom most they loue.

In this Country; there are manie goodly Citties and Townes, as also verie great Villages, and very well pollicied & D d 2 where.

The reason & cause of Cantoning the Country. ibid. lib. 9.

Execution by the Romans upon the Switzers.

Of the Government of three Vales, concerning three yoke of Oxen.

Cruell tyrannies and oppressions in the Gouvernors.

whereof we meane to speake hereafter.

The occasion then, wherefore this Country was and is reduced into Cantons, and to become leagued, against those that oppressed them was thus, according as Blondus maketh faithfull relation thereof. About the year 1305, the Emperours and Kings of the Romains, during the Schismes of the Empire, did place Gouvernours good store in the Switzers Countrey, as to recompence such as had taken part with them, perhauling where-withall (otherwise) to reward them. They gave them leave to do what (seuer seemed good) in their owne opinion, being as many of them there, as there were Cities, Townes, and Villages, or few wanting: who molested the people with subsidies and borrowings, extorting all things else what (seuer from them, according as it came into their fantasie. And yet notwithstanding, a great many of the Cities, Townes, and Comminalties, had long continued their immunity & franchise; yether by especiall grace of the Emperours, or by buying such priviledges for their Money, for which they had good & sufficient Patents to shew. Neuerthelss, these Harpie Gouvernours, by perswasion of some Noblemen of the Countrey, did manifold wrongs and injuries to this people.

It happened, that the Gouvernour of three Vales, wherein are three great Townes, to wit, Vri, Sauntz, and Vnderwalden (that were free of long time) sent sundry of his Catch-poles or Sergeants to demand three couple of Oxen, which belonged to a man of Vnderwalden, & to bring them away perforce: vising no other reason, but: that Country men should labour with their hands, and not with the help of stauled Oxen. The Sonne to the man, from whom the Oxen were taken, impatient at his Fathers oppression; laying hand on his Sword, chanced to cut off a Finger of one of the Sergeants. The poore youth was afterward apprehended, and the Tyrant (being extremely enraged) commaunded his eyes to bee pulled out.

Another Gouvernour of the said Vnderwalden, sent for an honest Woman, that should prepare a bath for him in his owne Houle; which she did accordingly, as not daring to disobey the Tyrant. No sooner had she made ready his Bath, and disposing of part thence againe: but the Villaine razed her, for which shee was slaine by her Husband, with the helpe of his Friends.

There was another Gouvernour of Vri, who, beside his exacting on many meanes of the people, entred into such folly and presumption, that he erected (in a faire spacious place of the saide Vri) an high perch or poule; on the top whereof was fastned a Hat or Bonnet, which he himselfe had sometime worne, commaunding the like to be done in the Villidge of Sauntz. Afterward, hee gave charge, that the Country people should performe as much reuerence to the Bonnet, as if himselfe were there in person. There was a man of very generous Spirit, and borne in that Countrey, named Guillaume Tell, who refused to doe this frivolous reuerence. Whereupon hee was apprehended, brought before this proud and insupportable Gouvernour, and sentenced with death: except hee could shew his disobedience, by taking a young Sonne of his owne (about five yeares old) and standing fifty paces off from the Childe; cleave an Apple vpon his bare head, with an Arrow delivered from a Crosse-bow, without any harme done to the Childe. The man was both famed, and knowne to bee an expert Crosse-bow-man, and being heere to thus rigorously constrained: he performed the deede, without any hurt to his Child; but it was more by the grace of God, then his owne industry.

The Gouvernour being offended that the man had sped so well, and perceiving that hee had another Arrow left vnder his Girdle; demanded, for what purpose hee had that other Arrow, when he was enioyned to shoote but one? Guillaume Tell answered. If I had slaine my Son; this other Arrow should haue had thy life. In regard of these words, he was taken, bound fast with Cords, and put into a Boate, to be conveyed to prison. Now, it befell, that they were to passe a Lake in rowing thither, vpon which Lake hee escaped very strangely from them. For, hauing (by mere strength) broken ken his bonds, he threw himselfe suddenly into the Lake, and recovering certayne Mountaines not farre off, lyned there yettely softly, and awayting for the Gouvernour (one day) in a verie narrow passage; there slew him with the fore said Arrow.

Another Gouvernour, caused the eates of foure Countrey-men of Switz to be cut off; then commaunding them to bee roasted, he compelled them to eat them. The people of the Countrey, being not a little moued with these extreame injuries, and manie other outrages in the Gouvernours: expelled them quite out of those three Vales, & from thenceforward entering into Confederacies, beganne to Cantone or quarter themselves, swearing a solemn League, with absolute promise to succor one another, if they should hereafter be molested by any who better.

Within short time after, a rich Abbot, entitled of the Hermits, saide: That hee had right and Title, to haue some Prouision of Corne, and of Moiny also, vpon the Village of Switz; and summoned them to make payment thereof. They answered, that they neuer heard before of any thing due vnto the sayde Abbot, nor did anie such right (to their knowledge) appertaine vnto him: and therefore, they would pay him nothing. Hee growing verie angrie at this answer, and being defended of a Great and Noble hoste: leauied an Armie, accompanied with Leopold, the Duke of Austriche, who had great Landes both within, and vpon the Frontiers of the Switzers. Besides manie Barons, and other Gentlemen of the Countrey, came vnto him (Voluntarily) from all partes, hauing already gone on, and used those places wher they were to passe, more then Hostily.

The Armie of the three Vales, which could not amount vnto thirteene hundred men, charged with humble heads, (yet vnto conquerable spirits and assurance) the Armie of the Duke and Abbot; and hauing put them to flight; slew verie manie of them, and a great number likewise were taken Prisoners; besides, the Dukes best fatherie of his life, was speedie flight. This Victorie of these simple, but verie Warlike people, encouraged them to attempt and put in pra life much greater matters, and to stand vpon their best defence, in all ensuing occasions.

These leagued Vales, within little while after, to wit; vpon the fiftenth day of Nouember, according as Mattier declareth, in the year one thousand three hundred and fiftene; ouercame another Army of twentie thousand men, which the Emperour Fredrick of Austriche, and Duke Leopold his Brothers had prepared, to ruiuate those three Villages; because they would not take the Oath of allegiance to the saide Emperour, at his newe creation; and yet they had formerly donee it to Leues of Bourrie, who called himselfe also Emperour, and lawfully elected.

Ouer and aboue this reason, he was urged on, and thereto vehemently perswaded, by a great number of Noblemen and potent Lordes, who had made great spoyle both of Castles & Townes, But, the Confederated Switzers, being aduertised of Fredricks intention, closely ambushed themselves (to the number of fiftene hundred men) vpon these ragged and Mountaines, and narrow passages, full of great Rockes and Quarries of stone; wherof they chose the biggest, & rowled them downe vpon the Armie, as it came vppe from the Mountaines footes, and went along the strait waies.

For, from the bottome of the Mountaine, the one side of the Rocks fell like an vpright Wall on the one sides, and on the other, were greates Lakes of Deepe Water, not easie to bee waded; and the huge stones tumbling downe so fast vpon them; drowned no meane number of them in those Lakes, or did beate out their braines, and the rest, being disfronted, Duke Leopold was glad and faine to shift for his life the second time.

Notwithstanding these two sustained spoyle and losses, Duke Leopold lost not a jotte of his Courage and Valour; but made againe, vpon them with fresh Forcers; perswading himselfe, that hee should get the Maithy of these Boores, Peazants, and Shepherds; for so hee teamed these Confederates. Calling the Men of Strasbourg vnto his ayde and assistance, with diuers other Townes, that took parte with the Duke.

The Switzers successe, upon the obtained victory.

Some Write, that the Duke himself, was not there in person; but the Count of Hapsburg, who went as his Lieutenant. From this time forwards, these three Cantons took hart and boldnesse of spirit vpon them, seizing (by waie of Warre) the Castles, Townes, Forts, and Signeuries, of such Gentlemen as had assisted the Duke, quite ruining the faide Forts and Castles, or appropriating them to their owne reuennues. For, before these fortunate successes, they had not any thing in proper, but onely their Townes and Villages: but now adayes, they have reduced those lands into Bayliwicks, whereunto they depute Gouernors, which either they change yearly, or continue to further time; according as it is aduised by the Senate, belonging to each Village of the confederates, and some others, that haue (since then) Cantoned themselves, and entered into alliance with them.

The death of the Emperour, and Duke Leopold.

Duke Leopold, and the Emperour his Brother, died within fewe yeares after these losses, without any Children, and their succeeding heires suffered these confederates to liue peaceably till the yeare, 1396. Neuerthelesse, they were molested by other great Lordes, whom still they manfully withstood, and til got the better hand of all in their attempts. At last, there came one, named Leopold also, descended of the same family of Austrie, an audacious Prince, ouerlight in beleefe, and fearfully aged xx. yeares. He was provoked by those Noble and Gentlemen, who either were expelled from their houses, or else had voluntarily forsaken them, and albeit there hadde past some transaction and truce between them yet now they would breake their faith and promise made to these Confederates. All the pretence that this young Prince had for warre, was, because Lucerna, which was a goodly Towne, had leagued and cantoned it selfe with the fore-named Villages, and many subiects of Duke Leopoldes, in regard of his often molestationes, were now (by this means) become Bourgeses, and quietly enjoyed the benefits of their Country. These matters, intermeddled with the Princes rash furie, made him so violent in spleen against them: that so manie as hee could cause to be taken of Lucerna, or those of other subiects that had the office of Bourgeses, they were forthwith hanged and strangled in the open fields.

The leagued Inhabitants, not a little displeased at these cruelties, brought their armed troups into the fields, and (by a sudden assault made vpon this young Duke Leopold) took the strong Castle of Pfeffers, and put vnto death all that were found therein. At the very same time also, they took two Townes of Duke Leopold, to wit; Delibouch and Sampach, that gladly yielded themselves into the protection of the Confederates, and Bourgeship of Lucerna. The Duke being highly heere with displeased, hauing an Arme readie of ten thousand men, entered into the Countrey of the Cantones. But notwithstanding all his heate and haist, by the aduise of some: peace was made between them, vnder certain conditions, so that no batell was fought, or Towne taken.

The young Duke being returned home to his Court, with intent to sport and recreate himselfe, was perswaded by many Noblemen, that he had greatly dishonored himselfe in making anie contract of peace with his subiects, and that all Lordes were dispensed withall, for anie oath taken in that nature. Moreouer, they objected, that this might proue a principall cause, to hinder him from succession in the Empire, whereto his predecessours had formerly attained. Being ouercome by their foolish persuasions, he employed a great part of the Empires forces; and most of the Nobilitie, being numbered twentie thousand men, both horse and foote, all verie expert and wel tried Soldiers, the greater part Noblemen, pretending interest in the cause, and accompanied with manie Princes of power.

This came they vnto the field, with all kinds of munition, to besidge Sampach: where the Arme also of the confederates met them, who were (in all) but a thousand and six hundred men. But they being possessed of the most aduantageable place in the field, and where the Horsemen men could do no good for themselves, or preiudice to the Switzers: the Noblemen were seigie so diuident, and battails being giuen, the most of the daies remained to the Cantons. It was such an extreme holiday, that the Noblemen were not able to endure any part of the paines (which the poore Rutshike were not so much vexed with, but could ably withstand farrel greater toyle) but were glad to lye. Albeit, young Leopold stood firm, and courageous, until he was slaine with manie other worthy men; as Otho, Marquess of Boh, John, Earle of Faintenberg, and diuers others: for very few escaped, but they were eyther taken Prisoners, or slaine. Twa yeares after, some of the Gentle-men, which had then escaped, returned thither againe with sixe thousand fighting men: but two hundred men of Glaronne stood against this, and slew two thousand and foure hundred of them, compelling the rest to saue their liues by flight, according as I finde it recorded in the Books of Cronicles and Manifester.

Now, these Noblemen and Gouernors, did not onely molest these three Vallies and Lucerna, but likewise all them inhabiting about Bearne, pillaging all the goods in the fields of Bearne. Yet notwithstanding, by continuall waging War with them, the Cantons defeated all their purposes, ruined their Castles, and appropriated all vnto their owne Dominions; except it were of such, as contracted amity and alliance with them. I forbear here to set downe, the pore war which they had against the Abbot of S. Gall, especially those of Appenzell, because they vrged a right vnto their come and other fruites: but they could get nothing of them but blowes, albeit, their Armies were verie great. Gla, in short while after, being troubled by the Noblemen and cruell Gouernours, which they of Austrie had set over them, entered into league with the men of Bearne, and other of the foure Cantons.

Zurich, a great and worthy City, seated vpon the Riuier of Indmat, had bene vexed about fiftie yeares by the Nobility, and a puissant Prince, who was the valiant Counte of Hapsburg, and extraxt in hatred to them, because he was taken in Zurich (being entered therein in the night time) by means of the treacherous Inhabitants, with foure hundred men, he being made Prisoner, and all his men slaine. Yet, with in some fewe yeares, he was let at liberty, at the solicitation made by his son Albert, the Emperours, and thence forward, Zurich came into the number of the league, Confederates. This City called it selfe Tigurnum, and is the most rich and powerfull Cantone, above all the rest, next vnto Bearne, and holdeth precedence beyond all the other; because all Ambassadors resort thither, and the assemblies are most of all there made. Whereby plainly appeareth, that the Cantons doe not hold place of precedence, according as they were received into the league; and I confesse mine owne ignorance, not knowing how these degrees haue passed among them.

It is presupposed, that because there was (then) no iustice for the people, but that all the Noblemen (almost) in these quarters of the Helvetians, were (as we vlt to say) cut out of one cloath, thax is to say; had (worne the rime of the third estate: Therefore, Zug, Basle, Fribourg, Soleure, and Shaffhouse, (by laps of time) confederated themselves with the leauen before named. All which together, being in number threene, had many warres against the Emperours, and other great Lordes, and were euermore Conquerours. It is therefore to be presumed, that they got not their libertie, nor the goodly lands which the more part of the do now possesse, in a day; but before they could haue peace with their Neighbors, they passed over (well nere) sixtie yeares.

This Countrey of the Leagues or Cantones, neither knew how to gaue their freedome, or conquer so many Countries as they haue done; if the Emperours had not bene busied in ciuill warres; whereof the Popes (for the most part) were the sole occasion, or Germany had bene united, as sometime it was. But the Nobilitie being become insolent by Ciuill wars, acknowledging no Superiours nor Gouernours, that knew well enough how to fish in troubled Waters, opposed (by their tyranny) the people of the Helvetians.

to shake off the yoke of their superiors also, and to expell them thence. At this present, and since the time of King Frances the first, they haue made confederation with the Crowne of France, receiuing both presents and pensions.

Myne intent was not (in this breefe discourse) to shew my selfe any Historian, neither to set downe all the gestes and warres, which this warlike Nation haue made, since they began to steeke their liberty; for, to performe that labour, it would require three or foure great volumes. Beside, I haue spoken but of three or foure, the most notable and chiefe in the Countrey, thereby to let the Reader vnderstand; wherefore the Region of the Switzers, is called the Countrey of Leagues, or of the Cantons. Wherein I haue followed the best Writers; as Blondus, Crantzius and Munster. By this discourse, I would gladly giue aduise to Princes and Noble men, to deale better with their subjects, then these Lords did in the Switzers Countrey; least (by successe of time) Heauen frowne vpon them, and they be throwne into the like disaster.

CHAP. III.

Of the excellency and deserved commendation of Trauaile; And what great dangers are begotten, and doe arise of idleness.

WE are enioied by the law and commandment of God, that wee must trauaile and labour in this world: For the very first Man that euer was, hauing broken Gods commandment, was throwne out of Terrestrial Paradise, and the Earth was giuen him to enioy; but yet with this condition, to labour therein with continuall Trauaile, without any limitation of time, but euen so long as he liued. And yet this was not imposed vpon the first man onely, but it came as an intinction also, to all his posteritie. Now, notwithstanding holy Scripture tels vs; that Trauaile was laid on Man as a matter of propenance; yet it appeareth likewise, to be a proper medicine, whereby to recouer and helpe some pasted evils. For a man arraigned by Trauaile, to regaine that which he hath by feeding. And though it came as a castigation, yet God commaundeth nothing, but what is good inat selfe; hath (in this nature) giuen man time to enioy his land by labour, according as Iob saith; Iohn is borne to trauaile. (Job. 1. 12)

Trauaile is a Phisicall medicine for pasted offences.

Job. 1. 12

The life of our blessed Saviour.

Looke vpon our Saviour and Redeemer Iesus Christ, our Soueraigne Maister, who, as an example to vs all; trauailed continually in painefull exercises, euen till his death: And beside, in his parables, he blamed and reproofed the sleepey Virgins, that were neglect and slothfull; euen more fauouring and commending such as trauailed, saying, in an especiall place of note; Come vnto me all ye that Trauaile and are heauy laden, and I will ease ye. If we would sit downe to read, we should finde, that the ancient Saints, employed all their time in continuall exercises and labours. Moreover, Trauaile is not onely healthfull for the Soule, but it is likewise as beneficiall to the body; for it causeth agility, strength, and quick disposition; it cheareth and encreaseth good Spirits, and consumeth all bad and offensive humors. And concerning the Soule, it cleanseth it from all occasions of euill doing; and conuerteth bad thoughts into better endeouours. Most certaine is it, that (without paine and trauaile) neuer did matter of any great consequence sort to good effect; but the paines seemed the sweeter, because no slothfull ease was interposed in the action. He that trauailes and takes paines, takes quiet repose and rest also, because to a weary man, all things are sauour to him, sleepe easie, and all pleasures are to him in truest contentment.

But returning to the benefits of the body, trauaile maketh a man discrete, vigilant, well aduised, wise, & all goodnesse else proceedeth thence. It is trauaile that appareth and beautifieth a Man: it maketh lodgings for him to rest in; waies to walke in; Ships to saile in; Armes to defend him; in breefe, innumerable are the blessings thereby abounding. are made fresh, teeming, and fruitful: to such as are dry, it giueth water, by opening the earths Wombe, to let forth her owne moysture. It exalteth humble Vallies, where neede requireth, and throwes downe high Mountaines, whose steepe passage offendeth: It turneth forth-right Flouds and Riueres, to take their more needfull course by dry landes, without waters, helping (thereby) to a dome and polliu Nature, compelling her sometimes, to engender such things; as in her own proper will the world nor it tameth the wildest beasts; and maketh them familiar. It maketh mens Spirits prompt and subtile, hauing the like power in all the other senses of man; and he that makes due tryall; findes the vnto valuable riches which is got by Trauaile.

God would not haue his owne choosen Vessels to come to Heauen, but by the rugged pathies of paine and trauaile. If sumptuous buildings, goodly Pallaces, and populous Cities doe seeme mightie things; then know, that all those were performed by the labour, sweate, and trauaile of thy Predecessors. If likewise, Arts and Sciences doe highly content thee: why then remember, that they were the spirituall Trauaile of learned Men in times past. If thou looke vpon faire fields, beautiful Gardens, and pleituous yeelding Vines: say to thy selfe, all these proceeded from the workes of Trauaile; because idleness dooth not any thing, but rather destroyeth whatsoever is already done: By Trauaile, men attained to very great and famous renowne.

It was that which made wise Plato, Aristotle, Pythagoras, and the rest of those learned men, neuer cease to trauaile their bodies and studious Spirits; both in writing, instructing, & disputing, without any care at all for sleepe, feeding, or cloathing their bodies: and yet, at such times as Nature compeld them to these necessities; they seemed much more sweete and pleasing to them, then they can doe to idle and slothfull Gluttons.

What was it that made Hercules so famous and faire honoured; but onelie his twelve labourous Trauailes? What was it that gaue such splendour to the Names of Alexander the Great, Iulius Cesar, with all those excellent Kings and Captaines; but painefull exercise, and industrious Trauaile? What was on the contrary, Sardanapalus, and other such like idle and lasciuious Princes, both ruined and oppressed their Countreies, and themselves dyed very shamefull deaths. Whereby may easily be gathered, that if the World were deprived of Trauaile; all would come to nothing: Offices in humanity, would fall into Decadence; Mechanicall Artes; Letters, Studies, Goods; Remembrances, Iustice, Lawes and Peace; no one of all these could continue without Trauaile. All the vertues are supported, only by the neede thereof; without it they could no way be exercised; because, he that will minister Iustice, ought to trauaile and to be paine. To conclude, no vertue can bee set on worke, without Trauaile; and therefore Hesiodus said; By sweate and paine, all Trauaile, vertue is to be giuen.

If wee would well and exactly contemplate all the things which God hath created, we shall finde, that by how much the more they are perfected in a certaine means, by so much the more may we truly say, that hee hath giuen to them great Trauaile. Let vs behold his superiour handiworkes; the Sunne in the month if selfe continually; the Moone neuer standeth still; the Heauens and the Planets haue beene, are, and shall be daily in continuall motion. The fire cannot continue it selfe, without some operation; the Ayre goes alwaies to some place or other. In the inferior bodies, the Water, fountaines and Riueres flow incessantly, and the Sea moueth without cessation. For the Earth it selfe, albeit it were immoveable (for it ought so to be, & vpon necessity, both that men may Trauaile whether they would or no, and afterward take their rest) yet notwithstanding, it neuer enioyeth any repose; but continually bringeth forth Hearbs, Trees, and Plants, euen like a diligent and painefull Mother, that counts herselfe obliged, to maintaine and nourish both men and Beasts. And therefore if we would bring all these things to due consideration, we should then finde, that Nature is intencue to no other thing; but onely to continuall labour and trauaile: in creating, forming, making, vnmaking, producing, corrupting, altering, or gazing and toiling, without the least respite of rest or repose, in any kind whatsoever.

Lyricke and Satirical Poet, faith in his works: That God gaue nothing to Man, but with paine and labour. Empyrides faith:
Trauaile is the Father of Fame: God help-eth him that trauaileth: without Trauaile, there is no true renowne, praise, nor happie aduenture. The Poet Demander wrote very wisely, a healthful man idle, is in worse condition then he that hath an ague. The saying of Democritus pleaseth me highly, where he faith: Paines taken voluntarily, are neuer distastefull when they be enforced. When Hermion was demanded, of whom he learned those deepe Sciences which he professed; he answered: Of Trauaile and Experience.
It was the saying of great Pythagoras:
That a Man ought to make choise of a good life, and to let it appeare, by paine and Trauaile, which brings it to a sweete and easie cuiusme. Salomon faith: The slothfull man should learne example of the Ant.

I should neuer end, if I were to name heere, the plenty of testimonies to bee alleged in this kinde. It shall suffice then, for me to say, that neuer was any man famous for Armes, Learning, example of good life, or any of the Arts; without great Trauaile. And, to speak truly, neuer were any idle people great, or knowne, but if it happened that a Man being borne great, liued negligently or idle: most certaine it is, that (by slothfulness) his estate was ruined, or else hee lost his renowne, quiet or life,
the losse being the true fruit of sloathes Tree, whereby all vices are multiplied, as the wife man wel witnesseth, *Lying;
Idleness enfruteth many mischiefs.* Ouid could asseme, that, Without Idleness, Cupid hath no power, and hee spake truly:
For in idleness, wickedness is dreamp-
on, treasons inuented, and foule sinnes acted. Ezechiel numbeth idleness among those sins, which were the cause that Sodom was destroyed.

To speake mine owne iudgement
in this case, I neuer knew any thing, wherein idleness got entrance, but it came to vtter ruine. We see the fire, if it be not maintained, it quickly quench-eth of it selfe. The Aire likewise, it must be continually moouing; for if it bee with-held and restrained, it will breake forth of it selfe. Water, compelled to any limited place, and where it may not haue his course and free passage, it putrifieth, corrupteth, and stincketh.

If the earth be not opened and laboured; it will produce nothing but Bram-bles, Bryers, Thistles, and other vnprofitable Herbs. It is euident to our eyes, that Gold, if it be not much laboured and purified, it will neuer appeare in his perfect beauty. Iron likewise, and other Mettals, will merely rust and canker of themselves; except they bee wrought to some kinde of seruice. Prouinces and Countreies, if they be not inhabited and laboured, they will prove barren & subiect to pestilence. Houses and dwellings, let them stand voyd and empty; they forthwith fall to ruine and decay. Common high-waies, let them not be trauailed and frequented; they will shut vp themselves into impossibility of passage, so that all knowledge of them will be vtterly lost. All things whatsoever, if they be not employed, and made vse of by labor; they perish, impair of themselves. Yea, euen the very vitall Spirits of Men or Women, if they be not quickened and viuiified daily exercises; they will become lazy and slothfull; so that the hart and soule will consume themselves, the powers of the body be so wasted and weakened, that no vse or motion can be made with them.

I haue already (in this Chapter) told ye, that trauaile makes a man agile, and chearefully disposed: and now (on the contrary) I am also to informe ye, that sloth and idleness spoyleth the complexion, corrupteth all good humours in mans body, and giues Dominion to them that are bad and naught. Galen faith: It is impossible for a man, to keepe himselfe healthfull, except he trauaile and labour. And Auicenna is of the same mind, with Cornelius Celsus, and other very excellent Physicians. Horses, and such kind of Beasts, if they be kept idle;
they become vnprofitable. Ships rot and seemely vgly, if they be kept still in Ports and Hauens: but when they saile abroad, they are both beautifull and beneficall, and keepe themselves from bale corrupting. Souldiers, and men inured to Armes; they grow out of heart, in the times of rest and peace. Beside, I finde it faithfully recorded, that Hanniball idleness at Capua, was the onely cause of the Romans victorie against him. The slothfull man hath no other Lesson; but that all employment is painefull to him. He that marcheth best in Warre, fights alwaies in greatest security: but hee that abideth still in one place, is apt to all inconue-niences, and the Sunne burnes him with the more aduantage. The Archer here-

We do ordinarily behold, and finde it true in common experience, that both voyces and instruments, not being imploied; they lose their vertue, sound hoarily and discordant: whereas on the contrary, vse refineth, concordeth, and makes them most pleasing. There are some kindes of Wines, that must bee rackt and roughly managged, to preserue them in yeilding the better relish.
Pretious stones, if they be not pollished and purely cleafed, they cannot appeare in their perfect lustre: but by painefull labour and trauaile, they are discerned in their highest excellencie.
Rude Iron it selfe, the more it is vied, the clearer it shineth. Among brute beasts, they that take the greatest pains, are most esteemed of men. To support this cause, I could alleadge so many authorities of Philosophers and Poets, al blaming and rebuking idleness: as would serue to compleat whatsoeuer is wanting, for full confirmation of this needfull discourse. Saints haue cursed it; Philosophers condemned it; Ouid, Plato, Horace, Claudian, Virgil, and all other Poets haue sung against it. All Histories are full of the euils deriued from it. Plato and Aristotle, condemning idleness, doe highly exalt the Art that was called Gymnastia, whereby, all necessary occasions and matters for war were enfructed.

The Emperor Adrian had long time educated, fauoured, and (at last) exalted a man, named Turbo, who was a most diligent and labourious follower of his affaires, and the Emperor, noting him

one day, that (in his opinion) hee was too earnest in his businesse, he said vnto him, Turbo, doe not kill thy selfe, but be more carefull of thy health: whereunto Turbo replied, My Lord, the Man that hath bene nourished, fauoured and aduanced by an Emperour, as I haue bene, ought to dye in Trauaile at his foote. Quintus Curtius declareth, that the diseases of idleness should be cured by Trauaile. The Romans had a custome, to begin the day at midnight, to the end, that at the rising and apparition of the Sunne; they might all fall to labour together: for they were perswaded, that (already) a moity of the day was past, and yet no good Act performed by them. A Roman sought to perswade the Senate, that Carthage could not be destroyed; least the Romans boasting of security, by want of employment there, should become idle. Vpon which occasion, Scipio Nasica, perceiving that some held come to be in safety, after that Carthage was made desolate, and Greece wasted; gaue them this answer. I am of a contrary opinion, and doe thinke our selues now to be in much greater perill, because we now stand in feare of nobody. Whereby this worthy man inferred, that idleness was the cause of more dreadfull danger, then either warre or neighbouring enemies;
because feare yeeldes more aduantage of safety; then when we stand free from all doubtfull consideration. And therefore the French haue a pretty Pro-uerbe: Make Holidays when the times gine leysure.

Apuleius faith, that nothing seemed more commendable to him, then Fencers, who had idleness in such abho-mination; that the Masters would neuer suffer their Schollers to eat, till they had first performed some act of vertue and man-hood. Cicero declareth (to the same effect;) *That Men were erely borne to good deedes and aduentures;
whereof our Soule is a sufficient arguement, for it is neuer idle, or at rest.* Draco, the famous Law-maker of Athen, among the most notable Lawes which hee devised, he had one concerning the chiefest praise of all; which was: That such men were sentenced with death, as should be found idle, or walking at their pleasure or pastimes, when others were seriously and honestly busied. I deter-ueth some consideration, to note in what account trauaile was among the Gentiles; in regard, that they had three Idols: the first was named Strenna, that is; dexterity, or agility: the second, Agenoria, which signified virility, or manlines: and the third, Stimula, which is as much to say, as a spur and pricke to honour and vertue; and trauaile was (with them) in such precious reckoning, that they erected these Idoles to eternitie.

But not to stay our selues (ouer long) on the Gentiles opinion, let vs come to the sacred Scriptures; where we are no lesse bound to trauaile, then restrained and prohibited from prophane things. Salomon in his Proverbs, among those other places, where he do deeply condemneth idleness, saith: That the sluggard or slouthfull person, which forbeareth to worke in Winter, shall be a Beggar. Saint Paule, the Doctor of the Gentiles, taketh glory in nothing more, then in not being idle, commending labour and trauaile above all things. And writing to the Thesalonians, hee tels them, that they knew wel enough how to imitate him, for he was neuer idle among them, but it was foode to him both night and day, in that he had gained them; not by any indirect meanes or charge to them, but in giuing them good example. Saying moreover, that hee that would not labour, ought not to eat. The like did he to the Corinthians, recounting his Trauailes taken for their example; and so in many other places beside. Let vs then (hence-forward) imploy our time in good and honest exercises, shunning sloth and idleness, that neuer can performe any act of estimation.

And yet wee are not commanded, to follow labour and trauaile, with such extremity or rigour; as to leaue our meate, drinke, sleep, or honestly taking our rest and quiet: for decent recreations, and honest repose is sometimes lawfull. In which regard, Cicero exalted and commanded Scipio, who said: I that he was neuer lesse at rest, then when he was at rest. Which Cicero maintaineth to be a notable saying: Because (quoth he) he declared thereby, that in his idleness, he thought on his businesse, and so in solitude, he could take counsell with himselfe. Moral Seneca alleaged; That idle time, without

Letters or study, is death and buriall to a Man, and onely they that are exercised in knowledge, know best what sloth and idleness is. Plutarch would haue a man to make some dispensation of his time, in exercising the difference between knowledge and experience. O that men (then) would but duely consider, how their time is to be employed; which glides away so swiftly, and remember withall, that they must render an account for euery word spoken vainly & idly. Cato, although he was a Pagan, yet he could say: That great and worthy Men did stand as much bound to yeilde an account, for their time lost or neglected; as they that could best deliuer reason for their honest employment.

To conclude, we should make such good expence of our time, in honest, lawdable, and blamelesse exercises: that the fruites thereof may be aduantageable to vs, and we esteemed as hired Seruants for heauen; which is provided for none, but such, as are called to trauaile in the Lords Vine-yard, and shall haue their Wages according to their worke. And Saint John the Diuine saith: The dead which dye in the Lord, are fully blessed, for they rest from their labours, and their workes and trauailes follow them. This authority doth well approue, that trauaile is the merchandise of this World; heere bought and sold, but rewarded in Heauen. For so Saint Paule testifieth, saying: Euery one shall receive his wages and payment, according as he hath trauailed here beneath.

CHAP. V.

The reason, why the Palme was giuen as an attribute to Conquerours; and Laurell observed as a signe of victory.

Of certaine is it, that (in elder times) the Romans gaue the Palme to Conquerours, in signe of Triumph; and it is so true, that by writing in Latine the word Palma, it is merely vnderstood for victory. Plutarch also affirmeth, that for each kind of victory, there was a severall Crowne

Of the Palme and Laurell.

Crowne designed, where-with their heads were circled, that had obtained such honor in field. One was made of Olive branches; another of Laurell; a third of Oaken Leauces; and others, of other trees: but among them all; the Palme was the general signe of victory. Those ancients do likewise say, that the cause why this signification (more then any other) was attributed to them: proceeded from an admirable propriety in the Tree it selfe, which (without any other prooffe to confirme it) is allowed to be most certaine, by authority of the that haue written thereon; as Pliny, Aristotle, Theophrastus, Anlus Gellius, and Plutarch. All which learned Writers do maintain, that the more the Palme-tree (of one of his branches) is charged with any heavy weight or burden; the more it resisteth and withstandeth the oppression. And whereas all other Trees doe yeelde vnder such lading, and are surmounted by the burden: the Palme only resisteth, and cannot be ouer-awed; because the greater the weight is, the more doth it still our stand it. In this respect, both Plutarch and Anlus Gellius say: That he which goes with an intent to Conquer another, must not suffer himselfe to be surmounted by feare of the perill, nor waxe weake in the attempt: but rather trauaile on with height of courage, and (with resolute resistance) pursue victorie, as being a man, meete to carry comparison with that Tree, which hath the same naturall quality, both in resisting and ouercomming any weighty oppression, and therefore it is giuen as a signe of victory.

Others say, that this honour was practised by the Gentiles, because the Palme was consecrated to Phœbus, long before the Laurell was, and was held to be a most ancient signe of victory. Pliny and Theophrastus, doe write of many other properties in this Tree, whereof we neede not speake, to auoide expence of time. And yet notwithstanding, I am very loath, to conceale that which is affirmed by so many; to wit, that as the Palme hath contrary effects to all other Trees: so is there of them both Male and Female, and the Females are they which bring forth dates; the Males onely flourish, and when they happen to yeelde any fruit, they are verie small, without good taist, and no profit is made of them. It is also to be obserued, that in what place flourish the Females grow, if the Males be not neere vnto them, they will not beare any fruit: but if it chance, that the Male-tree be cut or disbranched; the Female (like a Widdow) thence-forward, will neuer yeelde any more fruit.

But ceasing further speech of the Palme, we are heere to remember, that in the Triumphs at Rome, the Triumphers vied to be Crowned with Laurell, and the Captaine that triumphed, carried a branch thereof in his hand. So is the Triumpher described of Scipio Africanus, by Appianus Alexandrinus, and many others, whereof Pliny yeeldeth some reason, and saith: The Laurell was consecrated to Apollo or Phœbus, because that on the Mount of Parnassus, there grew great store of them; And hee beleueth, that for this reason, the Triumphers Crowned themselves with Laurell.

He deliuereth another reason, concerning a wonderfull propertie in the Laurell, to wit; that (naturally) it is an enemy to Fire, and Thunder; and Lightning (be it neuer so violent) hath not the power to touch it. Heereupon was it, that so often as the Emperour Tiberius heard any Thunder, and beheld the lightning flashes; hee tooke a Lease of Laurell or Bayes, and laid it on his bare head, judging himselfe (by that meanes) to be free from the Thunder and Lightnings danger. The Priestes of Diuination in Rome, vied also to Crowne themselves with Laurell, and afterward burning them; would diuine (by the noise it made) of that which was to ensue: and therefore Claudian called this Tree, The Diuiner of things to come.

Pliny and Suetonius, in the beginning of the Emperour Gelbas life, doe declare a matter very strange, saying; that Enia Drusilla (who afterward was named Augusta, because she was married to Octavianus Augustus); going from Rome, to a place out of the Citie, called Patrians; the chance to find downe vnder a Laurell Tree, and verie soone after, an Eagle flying ouer her her head in the Ayre (through the branches of the Bay-tree) did let fall into her lap, a Hen as white as Snow, that carried a branch of Greene Bayes fast in her Bill. Livia being somewhat amazed thereat, caused the Henne to bee well kept, and of it came many more besides, wherefore, the name of the Graundge where shee kept the Henne, was euer after called Gallina. She commaunded also, that the branch (found in the Hennes Bill) should be planted, which grew so faire, and prospered in such plenty; as it was wonderfull to behold, what abundance of Trees came of that one Plant. So that, from that time forward, both Octavianus and his Successours, (in a kinde of Custome, or superstitious Religion) when they triumphed: would cut branches of those Baytrees, and beare them in their handes; but when the Triumphe was ended, they would plant them againe by those Trees, from whence they had bene cut, and they prospered as well as the other did. This History is (in this manner) related by these two credible Authors. Suetonius, whose authority is of great reputation, addeth yet another matter, whereat I doe not a little maruaile. He saith, that at such times as any Emperour dyed; the Plant of Laurell likewise withered, and all the branches cut from those boughs, which had bin planted at the time of his triumph. And when Nero died, who was the last of the Cæsars Linage, all the Bay-trees dyed vp and withered, that had grown cheerefully before, and came of that one branch, which the Hen brought in her beake, and had bin planted by Livia. Beside, all the thriving store of the white Hennes brood, dyed, not one remaining, and in the Imperiall Pallace fell such Lightning and Thunder: as smote off the heads of the Emperours statues, erected there in their remembrance, and the Scepter which Augustus Cæsar helde in his hand, was also smitten downe to the ground. Continually they placed Crownes of Laurell vpon every Cornish of the Emperours houses. Ouid, among many other things in his Metamorphosis, saith; That the Romaines repured the Laurell, to bee a very sacred Tree, and would make no vse thereof, about things that were vile, vileane, or prophane: but euer accounted it as a signe of peace, and therefore retained it the Peacefull Laurell. Pliny saith, that the Laurell hath a vertuous property against the Pestilence, & against all venomous Serpents. Ouid declareth, that the faire & chaste Nymph Daphne, was conuerted into this Tree, and in regard thereof, it was consecrated to Phœbus, who (among other vanities) was adored by the ancient Romaines as a God.

CHAP. VI.

Of the abominable and most detested vice of Cruelty; How horrid it is to humane Nature: With many excellent examples depending on this Argument.

AMong all vicious pollutions, which are most repugnant, even to common humanity, and make men to become abominable; me thinks, that cruelty is the supreme and Soueraign of all other. For, man is a most Noble Creature, made in the Image and similitude of God; yea, borne to exercise nothing but mildnesse: but being feruile to cruelty; he becommeth a brute Beast, terrible, furious, wicked, and an vtter enemy to God, who is the Prince of clemency, and would not haue one man to be bitter, or tyrannous to another. Aristotle saith, that fiercenesse, cruelty, and inhumanity, belongeth only to wild and furious beasts. Seneca, in his second Book of Clemency, termeth it Fellony against the Soule, and from thence concludeth; that it is opposite and contrary to the vertue of Clemency. Cruelty is the greatest enemy to Iustice and reason, and is a more detestable sin then Pride or Anger. For it seemeth, that anger proceedeth from some conceited displeasure, to behold any euill offered to another: but in a cruell disposition, there is found far other malevolent matter, because in smiles (and without any disdain, but only in mere malice) mercilesse torments are inflicted on men; yea, euen to the deprivation of life. Therefore it is capital enemy to Iustice, which honorably defendeth, and will permit no man to receive any damage or harme; without some fault com-committed, and yet taketh order also, that offenders shal haue milde and temperate correction. Seneca, in his Booke of manners, saith; If we call them Hangmen, that vse no measure in the correction of vices: what then may wee learne of them, that cruelly oppress and murder Innocents?

Examples of cruell men are infinite, among whom was Herod, King of the Iewes, who reigned at the time, as our Lord & Sauour Iesus Christ was born. For, after the slaughter of so many Innocents (purposely performed, in hope to haue slaine him among them, that came into the world for our Redemption) he would yet make further shew of his cruelty, not only while he liued, but euen at the instant of his death. And because he well perceived his end approaching, he called all the chiefe persons of Ierusalem, who being come before him: he caused them to be seized on, and fast lockt vp in a place neere to himselfe, giuing strict charge to his Sister, that at the point of his Soules surrender, shee should see them euery one put to death; wherein she failed, in regard that God appointed the contrary. And what was his reason for his bloody intent? Only this, as himselfe confessed a little before his death. He knew very well, that all the people of Ierusalem would be very ioyfull for his departure, because other matters had happened to the people, then they expected; and therefore (moued only by cruelty) to make this the saddest day that euer they endured, he concluded this bloody slaughter and horrible murder. The cruelties of Abimelech, the Son to great Gedon, were as wonderfull, for, that himselfe might enioy the Kingdome alone, he put to death three scores of his owne Brethren: one onely escaping, named Iemathus, who fled (by the will of God) that the Traytor might liue in continuall suspicion. Now, I know not whether this cruelty, or the other following, may be counted the greater, acted by the same man, against the Sichemites, and in reuenge, because they had expelled him out of their City. But he getting entrance againe by power, and in the night time: slew all that were therein, Men, Women; Children, great and small. And because some were fled into the Temples; hee caused them to bee round engirt with wood, & putting fire thereto; the heat and smok was so great, that there they were all smothered. Then destroying the City, he caused the ground to bee ploughed, and gaug commaund, that it should be sown with Salt.

Very great also, was the cruelty of the Carthaginians, executed on Attillus Regulus, who being taken Prisoner by the, they sent him (vpon his owne word) to the Romaines, to worke the means of peace by the permutation of Prisoners and Captiues. But he, not regarding his owne life, but preferring the honour of his Country before all other respects: returned againe to Carthage, where (for conseration of his faith) he willingly yielded himselfe. They in extremity of cruelty, made him vp fast in a Tun of wood, which was stuck thick with sharp pointed Nails of Iron, nor affording the least place, where any member of him might be free from torture; and so, rowling him vp and downe their streetes, did put him to death in that miserable manner.

All Tyrants haue a custome, to be cruell by nature, but about all thereof, the execrable and bloody Tyrant Phalaris of Sicily, carrieth the chiefeest place of eminence. He slew infinite men, without any offence committed against him, and (if it were well considered) he was much more cruell in affection, then in action. For he had a Bull of Brasie, which Perillus (a cunning workman) had made for him, wherein the party was enclosed, whom he would haue to be put to death. Then kindling an hot Fire round about it, the voyce of the poore patient (suffering this torture within) seemed to the Tyrant, as if it had bin the bellowing of a true Bull. And this he did, to the end, that the cries of an humane voyce, in such extremity, might not moue him to the least iot of compassion. Yet one thing is much commended in him; that Perillus, the inventor and maker of this terrible punishment; was the first (by the Tyrants commaund) that made prooffe thereof.

Nor can I well aduise my selfe, with what kinde of cruelty, to compare that of Tullia, daughter to Tarquine, king of Rome; who caused her father to be slaine, because he might inherit the kingdome; which himselfe had willingly giuen her; of Rome to be set on fire, with expresse prohibition not to quench it, or any man to make safety of his owne goods. So the fire continued seauen daies, and seauen nights, burning the Cittie; and hee being on a high Tower some small distance off, clapped his hands, and joyed to behold this dismal spectacle, so far exceeding all humanity. He slew his owne Mother, and put to death the Husbands of Octavia and Sabina, which Ladies he married, and soone after deprived them of life also. Indeed this man attained to the verie height of all cruelty, for he was the first that persecuted the Christians; and in his time was the first & verie greatest persecution of the Church. And wel did he declare, that hee surpassed all the other in wickednesse, and was the Prince of all furious brutality: for he would often repeat a Greeke Verse, to this effect.

After my death, let heaven and earth confound themselves together. Or I could rather wish (quoth he) that such a general dissolution might happen in my daies. For I had rather deriue mine examples from barbarous people, then anie touch of our precedent Romain Emperors. But the succedours to these men, who imitated them in all vilenesse: barres my further proceeding, because they were such in tyranny, as no where else are they to be followed. And therefore I will leaue the liues of Domitian, Vitellius, Commodus, Maximus, and such others: but the cruelties of Dioclesian against the Christians, and wherof Eusebius maketh declaration in his Ecclesiastical History, I cannot well let passe, without some breefe note, to the end, that Blasphemers and bad people now liuing, may see what the Christians endured in the Primitive Church, because they would not denie the name of Christ.

This wicked Tyrant, caused men to be dragd throw the streets, at the tails of Horsses, and their bodies beeing thus fore bruised and broken, they were sent backe to prison againe, where they had no other beds to repose on, but broken Potshards, and such like vn-casie matter, whereon they were sure to tast no rest. He would also cause the lofty branches of trees, to be gently haled downe without breaking; and then binding the limbs of Christians vnto them, command their sudden exaltation, that for their bodies might be torn and rent in pieces. In the City of Sunderland, he commanded many to be tied to the walls, their eares nooses, lippes, handes, and feete one off, leaving them their eyes, that they might behold each others wofull extremities: & caused sharp splinters of wood to be made, and thrust into their naked bodies, betwene the flesh and bones, and likewise vnder the Nails of their Fingers and toes. Molten Lead and Brasse, in extremity of the greatest heat, he would haue throwne vpon their naked bodies, and vnto their Secrets: making Women also to haue burning Irons bound to their Breasts, and all violence else that could be deuised. By all which cruelties inflicted on their weak bodies, hee sent infinite constant soules to God, who made this Tyrant and his Tormenters, Instruments (thus) to aduance his glorie, and his seruants afflictions to shine more clearly. All these Cruelties are written by faithfull Authours; for, besides those recorded in Sacred Scripture, the rest are recited by Iosephus in his Antiquities of the Iewish Warres; by Suetonius Tranquillus, Plutarch, Titus Livius, Iustine, Valerius Maximus, Eusebius, Panlus Orosius, Iulius Capitolinus, &c. others of no lesse authority.

CHAP. VII.

How that oftentimes wicked Kings and Tyrants are Gods Ministers, and yet nevertheless, they haue continually bad and euill ends, in open view of the world.

Such as haue beene, & yet are subiects to wicked Tyrants, ought to consider (for their consolation) that though they are oppressed by such oppressours, they are (notwithstanding) the Ministers of God. In many places of the Holy Scriptures, they are named the seruants of God, because (by them) God punisheth the wicked, & perfecteth them that are good. The Hebrewes haue beene gouerned by Iudges and Priests, Samuel growne into old yeares, and sinne and contempt of God encreasing among the people; Kings were giuen giuen vnto them; and the people themselves required the chastisement, which they worthily deserved, attacking a King to be giuen them. This King was Saul, a good man at his beginning; but after wards a cruell Tyrant: for he spoke from them their goodes and liberties; and although he was sainted with many wicked doers, yet we cannot deny, but that hee was called the Lords anointed, by many wherof, God kept them all in safe and terror.

But let vs set aside, both him & deuers others, who liued vnder the law of God, and knewe him; and come to Idolaters, who likewise are named by the holy scriptures, Ministers of God; for so saith the Lord by the mouth of Elay, Let the Captiues enter by the Port of Babylon; I haue commanded my sanctified, and called the mightie to my wrath, to the end that they may glorifie themselves in my glory. The Prophet spake these words on the behalfe of King Cyrus, and King Darius. Behold, how hee called the Medes and Persians his sanctified, who (nevertheless) were neither holy nor iust, but only executioners of the will of God, for the punishment of Babylon. In another place, by Ezechiel he saith, I will bring my seruants Nabuchodonosor, and because he hath serued me well, I will giue him Egypt also. And yet for all this, these men were no Seruants of God, because they neither knew him, serued him, nor beleened in him: nevertheless, they were executioners of his iustice, and (in this vnderstanding) were named his seruants.

Cruell Tetyla, King of the Goths, was named the thrething Flaile of God, and iustly reputed so to be. Great Tamberlaine, who liued in the time of our Grand fathers, a most powerfull and cruel Captain, subduing and vanquishing numberles Prouinces; when he was demanded wherfore he was so cruell and inhumane to men by him vanquished, answered in great Choller, Thinke ye that I am any other then the wrath of God? Hence therefore may we well conclude, that (very often) cruell and wicked men are Instruments, whereby God punisheth the sinfull, and approueth the vertuous. And yet notwithstanding, he doth not therefore by cleare these men from being wicked: still, and worthy of greater chastisement, euen for these actions of theirs: Because (according to our Senators words) it is not necessary that should be giuen to be do therein, who so acteth therein, when God is his a good most certain that God intendeth to punish them vpon this world. Dioclesian the Tyrant of Syria, died miserably in the Britan Isle, which hadde become the death of many of his subiects, and was like Muske then to himselfe, as he had taken delight in heare. Dioclesian the Emperour declared, that Syria was miserable, euen while hee; and by no possible meanes could get any remedie. Beside, Pliny vs vs, that hee did bite & tearing his flesh with his own teeth. Marius his Capital enemy, and quier way as cruell, inhumane, and wicked as hee, was brought into such desperate condition: that trying to hide himselfe, he was glad to yeelde into the hands of Pompey the Emperour, and entreated him to cut off his head.

The Emperour Tiberius, was murdered by his owne people, being conspired to death with pillows: and yet Suetonius affirmeth, that his death was wrought by poison. Caligula hauing receiued 30 wounds by the hands of Cherulus, Corbelenus, Sabinus, and many others sworne in the same Conspiracy, there ended his daies among them.

Cruell Nero, before hee died, saw himselfe deprived of his Empire, & iudged a deadly enemy to Rome; by which means, beeing enforced to hide himselfe in holloiw Vaultes, which were wholly infected with humane excrements, hee would needs kill himselfe. But wanting power to execute his owne will, and calling others to helpe him in the action: three Villaines came and murdered him, mocking him extremely all the while, which they delayed so long as they could, for his greater torment, according as Suetonius reporteth.

Dioclesian his euile, hauing lost the empire, died by poison, which hee had secretely prepared for himselfe. Domitian also died, hauing receiued seuen wounds by Stephanus, Saturinus, Maximus, and others. Tullia, of whom we spake before, that vied her owne Father so cruellie, being

Let such then, as how do command & beare sway in the world, shun vitielties, and embrace clearencie, that they may the better beloued of their subiects. For the verie greatest and firmit safety of a King, consisteth in the amitie and affection of his people.

CHAP. VIII.

The strange fortune, which happened to the Sonne of Crasus, King of Lydia, and likewise to the Sonne of another King. In regard whereof, it is discoursed whether speech bee a thing natural to man or no; and whether man only speaketh, or no creature else.

Herodotus and Aulus Gellius.

HERODOTUS writeth, a meruelous accident, happening to the sonne of Crasus, King of Lydia; and in the same maner, it is reported by Aulus Gellius. This Crasus was a Rich King, and the same that was vanquished by Cyrus; as many good Historiographers haue declared. During the time that this King liued prosperously in his Countrey, he had by one of his Lawfull Wiues, a goodly Sonne, healthfull and compleate in all his parts and vnderstanding. The Child hauing attained conuenient yeares, to forme speech, & make vie thereof, was notwithstanding by the meanes of some vnknoone fting, or other hindrance in the tongue, debarred from speaking for long time after. Yet grew he to good stature, and aptly disposed to diuers enterprizes, which caused him to bee much pitied, & this restraint of his speech, made euerie one to repute him dumbe, albeit hee had good knowledge, and heard verie perfectly; which is against the order of Nature, for neuer was any creature borne to bee Naturallie dumbe; but he was deafe likewise. It fortuned, that Crasus was vanquished, and the City wherein hee was, taken by the enemies, so that the forwarke Soldiers pressed on to the Pallace wherein the King and his dumbe Sonne were hidden together. But being found by a Soldier, who had perfect knowledge of them both, and lifting up his sword with full intent to kill Crasus, his Son was so affrighted at the bloody proffer, and passion had such a powerful working in him, that he strooke for speech extraordinarily. And pressing the extreme Dominion, which the soule hath of the body, immediately the corporall Organes yielded to the strong determination of the will; and breaking the strings that had so long restrained his liberty of speech, he spake out aloud, saying; Oh do not kil him, consider that hee is King Crasus, and my father. When the Soldier heard these words, he with-held his stroke, and would not finite the King; so he escaped death, and from thence-forward his sonne continued in perfect speaking, euen as if hee had spoken all his life time till then. Surely, this was a matter verie manuellous, and I cannot imagine, what naturall reason may be sufficiently giuen for it.

Aristotle saith, that men are born commonly dumbe and deafe, because they are not formed with such disposition of these two apprehensions; neither in such perfection as is required. Afterwards, in further growing on, they dispose them selues, and strue first of all, to begin with hearing; and after they haue hearde (for many daies together) then they labour how to speake. Pliny saith also, hee that is borne and continueth deafe, is compell likewise to bee dumbe. For, most certaine it is, that if a deafe man hearde, he would easily learne to speake, and speech is impossible to be taught him that is entirely deafe.

Aristotle also saith: It may well happen, that a Child may pronounce some words before ordinary time, and yet notwithstanding, he will begin to lose those words againe, vntill such time as Nature allowed houre (for Infants to speake) be come; and when (by her appointment) they commonly vie to speake. To this purpose, Pliny speaketh of this sonne to King Crasus (whose History we haue in briefe briefe related) and saith; That at the age of fine moneths, hee pronounced some words, which were reputed as Prognosticators of his Fathers ruine: and so it seemed, that such effect proceeded from that fore-telling, for he neuer spake afterwards, vntill the memorable accident which we haue already declared.

I call to minde another aduenture in the like case, recited by Halibon Ragel, in his Iudicure, wher he speaketh, as an eiewitnesse; and being present in a Kinges Court, who had a Son borne, that within foure and twenty hours after his birth, began to speake perfectly, and stirred his hands, wher at all the Beholders maruelled not a little, for with a strong voice, he deliuered these words; I am borne vnbaptized, because I come to fore-tel that the King my Father shal lose his Scepter, & that his Kingdome must be destroyed. At the ending of which words, the Childes life ended also. This accident (vndoubtedly) was verie dreadfull; and yet it seemeth to mee, rather as an Aduertisement sent from God, then any wonderfull woork of Nature. Astrologers do tell vs, that the Child whose birth shal happen when Mercury is Lord of the Ascendant and Oriental; hee will speake much sooner then anie other, who speake not, but according vnto the ordinary course of Nature.

I remember likewise another matter, conformable to the case now in hand, to wit; that some haue helde opinion, That speech is not a thing naturall to man, but is learned and gotten, as other Artes and Sciences are. Others hold directly, that our speaking Naturallie, is not a matter proper and peculiar to man only. The first, who are of the minde, that speech is not a thing naturall, do labour to proue it, in saying: That that strength, which is naturallie conuenient to one kind, should be, and is as meet to all of the same kind. As we may perceiue by barking in all Dogges, by Lowing or bellowing in all Bulles, Oxen, &c. and so (in like case) to all other kinds of Beasts, And yet notwithstanding, we behold in men, that some speake in one manner, and others quite contrary, so that they do not vnderstand themselves naturallie; and therefore it seemeth, that speech proceedeth rather from Art, then Nature.

Again, according to Pliny, there are some people that speake not all, but their speaking appeareth to be rather a kinde or forme of bellowing, then anie sealed speech; which neuer could so happen, if all men did speake by the gift of nature, for, if it were so, then all men would speak in one and the same manner.

Now, as concerning the other opinion, in such as say, that speech is not pecticularly proper to man, they ground their iudgement on the words of Lactantius Firmianus, who tels vs: That wee haue some parts, which seeme to vs, proper to men onely; and yet neuertheless, the verie same are found to bee in other Creatures, as diueritie of voice in Birds, by the severall tunes wee heere discern in one another; whereby we plainly perceiue, that they do vnderstand each other, so that it can bee no otherwise, but as a meere forme of Language amongst them. Moreover, they maintaine their argument vpon this ground, in that manie Parrats, Pies, Poppingeyes, and such like Birds, are heard to speake plainly.

But the truth of this matter is (albeit their opinions haue some apparence of veritie) that speech is the gift of GOD only to man, not that he purchaseth it by Art; but is proper and peculiar to him, and not to any other creature. True it is, that other Creatures haue voice, and yet notwithstanding, they haue no Speech: and such is the opinion of Quintilian, & likewise of Aristotle.

In like manner, wee haue good answers to these contrary reasons: As, to the first Argument we may well answer, That a thing may be Natural vniuersally, but in particular, it may be exercised according to the will. It is naturallie euill done, and he deserueth punishment for it, that killeth another man, or robbeth him of any of his goodes; and yet neuertheless, to inflict one kind of correction or other (vpon him) for the offence, proceedeth from the will of the Judge. Therefore, although that men do speake diuers tongues, yet is it not to bee said, that this their speaking commeth from Nature. And so much the stronger is the Argument, that such diueritie and confusion of tongues, was for the punishment of their pride, that laboured to buld the Tower of Babel: for, as we haue already said, there was then but one language in the world, which could be said to be natural.

That speech
is not proper
to man onely.

Man onely

nefit of spee-

And as for the Troglojtes, who are
are said not to speake at all, it is reputed, that their infirmity proceedeth, by reason that their tongue is quiermuch barbarous and imperfect, and they feele nothing as it were, of humanity; and yet notwithstanding, it is a kind of Language among them, whereby they seeme to vnderstand one another. And whereas it is further said, that there be diuers Birds that speake, as the Parrat, whereof Lodowicus Calius maketh mention, that belonged to Cardinall Afcanus, which Parrat (in his pro-fence) pronounced (word by worde) all the Creed in Latine, without saying in any one fillable: We may lawfully an-swere, that this is no speaking, for they knowe not what they say; but it is a certaine custom taught them for many daies together, whereby to forme such a voyses; but a true worde is conceyued in the soule, before it is pronounced, whereof Birds haue no such Capacitie.

And to that Argument, which imply-eth, that wee knowe all creatures by the diuersitie of their Voyces, that they vnder-stand each other, and call one another amongst themselves: wee may not hereby inferre, that such a Voyce is a word formed. For, as Aristotle faith, the Voyce loofeth it selfe, and so can wee, (without any formed word) signifie and giue to be vnderstood, either ioy or discontent, and all vniuersall passions: as wee see by the Voice, when it thus ex-presseth it selfe in laughter, & with pleasure, or by sighes and lamentations, in deepe sorrow and anguish.

And for the respect of brute beastes, that haue difference either in their song or voice, and may be knowne when they are displeased or contented: and the like in Birds, either by motion of their win-ges, lofite flying, or some such other sign according to the effect: these are matters not incident to the case in question.
For to speake and vter wordes, whereby may particularly be expressed, profit, ne-cessitie, harme, Mallice, Iustice, Iniu-stice, honestie, goodnesse, and whereby also passed actions are deliuered, and for-sight of them to come, by solide reasons and words, in declaring themselves, and other things are done, answerable to the benefit ensuing by speech: this is a blef-sing bestowed onely vpon man, euen as Hereditarie to him by Nature, & whereof no other Creature whatsoever, can fite.

CHAP. IX.

Of a Woman that was married manie times,
And of a Man that had manie Wives, and hapned as length to ioyne in mariage with that woman.

Haue many times noted that the honor of Wid-
dowes, vnderwent common and publicke taxation, if they had bene
married three or foure times. Now, albeit it seemeth exteriourly, that men had good reason for this detecion; yer notwithstanding, no man ought to iudge of another bodies secret Confience.

Marriage, was first instituted in Paradise, and is allowed by the Church to be Sacred and Lawfull; in which respect no man should or ought vfe any reprehension against it. And yet wee must not denie, but that a Chast life, without subiection to marriage, is the more perfect estate, and is to bee elected as the better.
Neuerthelesse, the bounty of heaven diminiseth not ioy of eithers goodnes; but both estates are godly and commendable.
If then a Widdow do marie, she of-fendeth not God therein; and besides, as concerning the World, it may very well be answered, that it is the finallest faulte she can commit. And because I would no way be mistaken by the Reader, I will produce (vnto this purpose) what I haue read concerning a Widdow, and it is recorded by Saint Hierome: of whose Au-thoritie (I thinke) no one will make scruple, in regard of his Religion and great holinesse.

He faith, that in the time of Damasus,
he both saw and knew in Rome a woman, that had lawfully bene married to two and twenty seuerall men, and remaining a Widdow, after the decease of the two and twentieth Husbände: there was a man came thither, that likewise hadde bin married to twenty Wives; and was then a Widdow of the last, and both of them at freedome and libertie: which being vnderstood to either, no difference in their degrees, but both of equal mean condition: they contracted Marriage together, which was a thing verie notable;

and raised a generall desire in the people of Rome, to see which of this strange maried couple should first die.

It fortuned that the Woman first deceased, to whose obsequies, all the Roman people mainly flocked, to congratulate the Husbonds happinesse, as beeing victorious in no simple Conquest: setting a Crowne of Lawrell vpon his heade, and placing him first in following the bodye of his Wife, bearing a branch of Palme
in his hand, in signe of his victorie, and numberlesse people accompanying him in his triumph.

The same holy Father, recoineth another matter very notable, which he setteth downe for truth, because it was deli-uered to him by such as deferred credit.
The case concerneth a woman also, who
to shewe her selfe some-what charitable, tooke a young Boy from verie poore parents, that had no releef but fro the Hospittall, intending to nourish the childe as if it were hir owne, feeding it at hir owne
Table, and nightly lodging it in her bed.
When the childe had attained to x. yeares of age, the woman grew to be so incontinent, that she would needes haue car-full knowledge of the Ladde, and that in such manner, as at the terme of fixe mo-neths, she became quicke with Childe by him, contrary to the rule and order of nature, which neuer doth permit any such conception at ten yeares of age. But, it rather seemeth that this happened by the permission of God, to the end, that such turpitude and dishonesty in a Woman, (vailed vnder pretence of charity) should be apparently discovered to the worlde.
So that, although the other woman had married three and twenty seuerall times, yet are not we to iudge or conceite, that therein she sinned. For, I am perswa-ded, that in being so oftentimes lawfully married, in publicke confirmation of the Church, and without any iust cause of contradiction: she did much better then this other lustfull lewd Woman, in committing such a foule and inordinat sinne;
for which, no colour or excuse can anse way be made; whereas, on the other side

the saying of blessed Saint Paule standeth in force: That it is better to marrie then to burne.

CHAP. X.

The strange fortune which hapned to two Princes of Castile.

HE power of sodain con-ceite, or immediate apprehension of some inward dillike; is knowne to bee of such strong imprefic; that it is able to be the death of man or Woman, and vnto this purpose tendeth our present discourse. Don Alphonso, Cauenth of that name, who was Father to Don Peter, having finished his raigne in Castile, left his Sonne Don Peter; a verie young King: In which regard, the kingdome was gouerned by two Princes of the Countrey (who were Vnckles to the King, the one named Don Peter, and the other Don Iohn) and likewise by Queene Mary, that was his Grand-mother.

In the yeare one thousand three hundred and sixteen, these two Princes, who were Vnckle and Nephew, hauing manie times (like valiant and worthy men) made warre vpon the Moores, for exaltation of the Christian Faith, and returned with famous Victories, as well approved and vndaunted Captaines: concluded together to make Warre on the kingdom of Granado; with purposed spoyle & damages on the Countreyes belonging to the Moores; hauing ioynd with the Al-cantaro and Galarraga, Great Maisters of Saint James in Galicia, and the Arch-shop of Toledo.

The businesse being growne to full effect, and great numbers both of horfie and foot assembled, they began to invade the Countrey, and sped so well in the aduenture: that (with very successfull fortune) they came before Granado, where they fought valiantly, and surprized di-uers Castles, among which, was that named Ahora.

When fitting time for retirement cam,
they returned backe againe by the Christians Countrey, and marching in good order, Don Peter was in the Vant-garde, and the Lord Don John in the Rereward, where he was suddenly charged by a huge multitude of Moores, that had assailed themselves from all parts, and their assault was so furious, as he was constrained to send to Don Peter, to leaue his leading, & to come to his assistance in the Arriere. Don Peter verie gladly yielded thereto, and marching back with admirable courage: founde his men to bee so daunted and weakened with dismay, as by no meanes possible, could he cause them to returne with him. By meanes whereof, he entered into such a sudden alteration and conceited displeasure, that albeit he contended worthily to essay a fresh march vpon the enemy, inciting both his horse and foot thereto, and by no reason could preuaile; hee drew forth his sword, and smote some, thereby to terrifie the rest, and that terror might make them become obedient. But all prouing in vaine, his trouble in minde was so excessive, that perceiving he could no way helpe his Vnkle, he was no longer able to manage his sword, but speech presently forsooke him, & vnderstanding likewise, so that he fell downe from his horse dead to the ground, without either sitting or speaking one word.

This wofull accident, was (by some) too speedily reported vnto Prince John, who fought manfully against the Moores, and had (in a manner) quite vanquished them. When he vnderstood the occasion of his Nephews sudden death, as suddenly likewise entred he into an extreame passion, and gaue outward testimony of such a violent inward alteration, that he fell also from his horse, losing the strength and vigor of all his members, and neuer after could vter one word, so that he was raken vp by his people, and kept (in that strange manner) from midday to the Evening. In which time, the Moores being ignorant of these feruall mishaps, were put to flight by the Christians: who marching onward in forme of battaile, at the instant, as the body of Don Peter was laid vpon an horse, Prince John gaue vp his last gaspe. These accidents were verie remarkable, and the like very feldome heard of: whereby plainly appeareth, that sudden conceit may cause the death of a man.

CHAP. XI.

The strange and variable complexions of two Phylosophers: the one of them weeping, and the other laughing, at the government & condition of the world.

IN the recital made by Diogenes Laertius, concerning the liues & diuersity of Philosphers: he speaketh particularly of two; the one being named Heraclitus, and the other Democritus, because each of them was in Nature and Complexion verie strange.

Heraclitus obserued (as a common Custome) that alwayes as hee walked along the streetes and publicke passages, hee would weepe and shedde abundance of teares, in regard of the compassion hee had on humane Nature. For, hee was absolutely perswaded, that all our life time, consisted in nothing but miserie, & that all the traualles, labours, and endeauiuers of men; seemed worthy both of pittie and compassion, both in their paines and afflictions, as also for the sins by the daily committed. This is much better, and more amply described, in a letter sent by this Phylosopher to King Darius, according as our fore-named Diogenes Laertius reporteth, and in these very words.

All men that walke vpon the earth, are vnder a farre off from iustice: for they serue Auarice and Vaine-glory, with too much affliction and losse of time. As for my selfe, I neuer thought any euill thing; and to the end that I might knowe the paine, which I feele by beholding and knowing these skingges: I haue euermore bene desirous, that I might containe my selfe in some such place, where I might neuer looke on men, because I can sufficiently content my selfe with that which is enely necessary for me. We read of this Philosopher, that (in all things) he was conformable to this persification. For he liued the very greatest part of his time in solitude, and in the fields, contenting himselfe with hearbs and food of slender substance: All the while he was yong, he said he knew nothing; and when hee attained to greater growth, he saide, hee knew all things, and that nothing els had bin

The Complexion of Democritus was no lesse strange then this mans. For, although he would leaue his lodging, and frequent mens companies, yet would he laugh immeasurably at all the actions and behaviours of men, teaming the life of man to bee vanity and folly, and that all appetites and desires, were foolish, true subiects to such Masters, and meere matter of laughter. And such was the imagination of this Phylosopher, that it was only enough for him, to go laughing along the streets, as the other went weeping: and considering the paines and traualles of men, it seemeth that each of them had reason sufficient to do as they did.

Seneca in his Booke of the Tranquillity of life, speaketh of these two Philosphers, approuing rather the Opinion of laughing Democritus, and aduising to imitate his merrie humour, rather then that of weeping Heraclitus. And it appeareth, that Iuvenal was of the same mind, when speaking of them both, hee sayeth, That he was amazed, whence and how Heraclitus could receiue so great quantitie of moisture, as satisfied his liberal expence of teares. And to speake truly of both these follies (for I hold these two complexions to be no otherwise) that of Democritus is allowed for the better, because wee read that he was a man taking no dislike at any thing whatsoever, and liued an 100. yeares. I find of him, that he vsed verie often to feed on Honey, and beeing on a time, demanded whither it were good to preserve the health of man, or no, he answered; These are only fittes for mans Health, Honey taken inwardly, and Oyle outwardly, giuing thereby to vnderstand, that Honey was good for feeding, and Oyle for anointing.

Laertius reporteth many thinges of him, whereby is evidently discerned, how great his knowledge was in naturall thinges. He saith, that one day among others, a messe of milke was brought him, & after he had looked on the Milke, he saide; This Milke is of a Goat that hath had young ones; & this is the first time of her Kidning; and indeed it was so. Another time, hee met a yong maid vpon the way, and with doing reuerence to hir, he saide, God blesse ye Maid. Meeting her againe on the next day following, he made no reuerence to hir, but said; Farewell Woman. Such as had heard these feuerall salutations, greatly meruailed thereat, and gathered there by, that hee had companied that Night with a man, which Democritus knewe to be true, onely by the Womens countenance. Tertullian likewise telleth vs, that this Democritus did put out both his eyes, because he would not bee tempted with carnall concupiscences, which ordinarily are occasioned by the sight of women. But Anus Gellius saith, that he did it only the better to addit himselfe to the contemplation of naturall thinges, for which, this Phylosopher was very highly commended by the learned.

Cicero writeth the like of him, so doth Pliny, and many others. Pliny reporteth in diuers places, that hee was a great Astrologer, and a Magician, and that to learne al the Arts, and practise them among the skillfull; he traualled through all Asia, Arabia, Egypt, and many other Prouinces. And Solinus maketh mention of his Disputations against Magicians. Concerning mine owne opinion of this man; I will conclude further speech of him, with a matter meruaillous, and not to be omitted, to wit; that by the means of naturall light only, he fought for and beleued the immortality of the soule, and the resurrection of all the dead, in which contemplation, and many other of like quality, he spent the length of life before remembredd.

But as for Heraclitus, by his wretched Complexion, and feeding on nothing but hearbs, and such like Viands, which continually kept him hungrie: Hee dyed continuingly, and full of Gowtinesse, being wrapt in an Oxe-hide; wherein hee had put himselfe, in hope to bee cured. And some do say, that being thus hidden in an Oxe-hide, hee was deuoured by Dogges, that knew him not to be a man. Neuerthelesse, he wrote Books of great Learning, but so difficult and obscure, as few attained truly to vnderstande them: which is a fault wherein many great persons haue inned, only thorow presumption and arrogancy.

Of some perticular notable occasions; which haue happened in one and the same manner, and rather in one place more then in another.

Extremitie in both kinds.

Hofe things whereof wee haue spoken in our precedent Chapter, may well caufe great meruaile in the consideration of men, whose Conditions and Opinions haue beene so extremely estraunged from one another; that the verie fame thing, which hath made one man to weepe incessantly, hath caused another to Laugh without any intermission. It is likewise a matter well worthy of Contemplation, to obserue, that in such rarities of humane occasions: and amongst so many of diuers difference, som are found that do seeme as if they were meely constrained, and that it ought vpon necessity, that (in some places) aduentures should perticularly happen, as we shall discerne by our ensuing discourse.

Concerning the City of Constantinople.

First of all, it was a matter very admirable (as we haue already saide) concerning the Citie of Constantinople, to witte; That the first Emperour which builded it, and made his abiding there, should bee named Constantine, and his Mother Helena. In like manner afterwards, that the last Emperour there reigning, and during whose time the Citie was lost, should bee called Constantine, and his Mother also named Helena.

Of Sampson and Hercules.

It deserueth likewise due consideration, that there should be two such most Valiant men, as were Hercules & Sampson, and that both of them began their great deedes of Armes, with each mans encountering of a Lyon, and both of them decayed and vndoone by Woe-men, euen as if the one were obliged to the others Fortune. It is yet a matter more notable, that in Arabia, fur-named Happie, Cham the Sonne of Noah, and his Successours, should forsake the A-doration of the true GOD, to vndergo the Idolatrie of Men. And that in the same Prouince also, after so great and long reuolutions of yeares, should bee bred and borne Mahomet, the persecuter of the true Faith and Doctrine giuen by our Sauour Iesus Christ, God and Man.

Of Cham and Mahomet.

The Citie of Carthage, a most powerfull Common-Wealth, had so many seuerall forces in Armes, that no King or Captaine could resist against it. And yet notwithstanding, it was two seuerall times vanquished by two Romaine Capitaines, both bearing one name, and called Scipios; so that it seemed, in that verie name consisted the power of Conquest.

Of the Citie of Carthage.

It is likewise verie remarkable, in the Historie of the Bythops of Rome, that all the Popes which bare the name of Alexander, were all Anti-popes, and that (in their times) grew the Scismes in the Church, as in the time of Alexander the second, third, fift, sixt, &c. Another meruitous matter was noted in Spain, that commonly all the Kings which were named Ferdinands or Alphonssus, were very good and excellent Kings. Cesar and Pompey were two Captains of Rome, very famous and most puissant, great enemies and competitors one against another; yet it happened, that they both died on their very Birth-dayes, yea violent kindes of death, and by weapons. As worthy warriors likewise were Hannibal of Carthage, King Phillip, Father to Alexander, King Antigonus, Father to Demetrius, Sertorius the Romaine, Viriatus the Spaniard, and in our time, Fredericke Duke of Vrbine, and diuers others beside, resembling one another in behaviour and Regiment of Warre; but in one thing, they were all truly equal, to wit, they halted euerie one vpon one and the same leg, and each man lost his left eye by misfortune. The Emperour Charles the fift, was borne on the day of S. Mathias the Apostle, on which day also (in course of his life) was King Frances taken by him in battaile, and the victory likewise woonne at Bicoque: Hee was also elected and Crowned Emperour on the same day, and many other great Fortunes befell him still vpon that day.

actions, do obserue perticular dayes and names, wherein to beginne or vndertake their purposed businesse: neugherlesse, seeing that such things haue formerly bin considered and read of, I make the lesse account of their humour. It hath beene noted, that not onely the French, but from others Nations beside, do holde diuerse dayes to be vnforsunate, and that no respect in the world whatsoever, can cause them then to vndertake any fight or combat, because vpon those daies commonly some great mis-fortunes haue befallen them. And yet they esteeme some other dayes, to haue a kinde of happinesse attending on them, because that on them no losse or euill mischaunce hath happened to them. All these things, may venge amazeament, in regard that the causes are vnknowne to vs, albeit neuer so good a rule or reason may therto induce vs: such secretts are only knowne to God, and such hath bene, and is his appointment. Of Accidents that haue hapned, and actions of notable successe (ensuing by one and the same meanes) both vnto the Romaines and Gracians, Plutarch hath written a Treatise, called his Parallele, wherein hee alledgeth manie excellent examples, which the curious Searchers of Nouelities, may there reade more at large.

Secrett causes are only knowne to God.

CHAP. XIII.

That diuers men haue bene so really alike, both in shape and countenance, that they haue many times taken one for another.

A wonderfull secret in Nature.

Ceasur doth heere freely offer it selfe, to make mention of some perticular persons, that haue (in figure & gesture) bene alike and sembable each to other. And indeed, it is one of the greatest secrets and wonders in Nature, to behold such an infinit number of men, the varietie of their gestures, and all hauing one kind of forme: yet notwithstanding, it seemeth a matter of much more meruaile, when (in such a variable multitude) scarcely but two men can be culd out that do really resemble in all parts each other. Of which two seuerall matters, wee will relate the causes natural, after we haue first produced example of some, that haue held true and perfect resemblance, vnto apparent judgement.

First of all then, we will speake of one named Arthemius, who liued in the court of Antiochus King of Syria, being according to Pliny and Solinus, but of strange conditions, albeit Valerius Maximus affirmeth, that hee was kinde man vnto the King, and resembled him so truely, that the Queen (having murdered Antiochus) concealed her wicked Act by the appearance of this Arthemius, whom shee had acquainted with his purpose, diuerse dayes before: Arthemius was laid in the Kings bed, as if he had bene the Queens sickly Husband, for so they then called him, and so he was he reputed to bee, being visited by all the Princes of the kingdom, euen as if it had bene the King himselfe. Thus vnder shew and supposition of the King, hee made a Murther, and came as heire to the Kingdom, which in one as the Queen had determined: wherein hee was obeyed, for euerie one tooke him to be the true King, indeed, which was a verie strange and admirable deceit, but (to this purpose) the aduenture of Queen Semiramis is much more notorious, of whom so many commendable Authors haue written memorable actions. Justin, Justinus, and diuers others say, that his sonne Ninus resembled her so perfectly, both in speech, gesture, and disposition of body, that after the death of the King her husband, she clothed her selfe in the habite of a man, and representing the person of her Sonne, held and gouerned the kingdom for the space of forty yeares, with absolute beleefe generally, that shee was her sonne Ninus, whom shee so neere resembled, that in this manner was the State abused. In the time of Pompey, there were two men in Rome, the one named Bibulus, and the other Publius, who were both so like to Pompey, as if there had bin no other difference, then in the plain figure, it was very difficult (as Pliny reporteth) to know which of them was Pompey or no, and euerie man supposed, that this resemblance came from the father to the son by succession. In the time of Pompeys father, there Childe, and forming it answerable to the imagined subject. And because it many times hapneth, that Fathers haue diuers imaginations; they do likewise engender diuersitie and difference of gestures, so that the Infant will resemble diuers persons. And this matter is reputed of such importance, that Empedocles saith, Some Women haue bene noted, that they haue conceived, and bene deliuered of Children, that haue resembled Statues, Figures, and Pictures, that hung in the chambers, at the time of their conception. That this hath hapned in Beastes, is sufficiently probable in the History of Iacob, who layed the pilled rods (being White and Blacke) in those places where the flockes conceyued, by meanes whereof, partie coloured Lambes were also engendered. And it is further to bee obserued, that not only this imagination hath power on the Corporall Members; but likewise on the Soules of Children. In regarde whereof, Naturall Philosophers haue aduised, that when a man is angry, or Melancholy, or Drunke, he shoulde not companie with his Wife: Because (commonly) Children are of the same Complexion, wherein the Father was, at the generative action. And yet, it hath oftentimes come to passe, that a merrie-hearted Father, and deliberate of Nature, hath gotten a Melancholly Childe.

To this purpose, Alexander Aphrodisius declareth a verie notable thing; that (manie times) Bastard Children, begotten in Adulterie, are wicked and vicious, in regard of the bad imagination, and fearefull terror, wherein their Fathers were at the time of their begetting. From the verie same reason, may an answer be framed to the case following. For, if it bee demanded, whence cometh it, that among men only, there is so great diuersitie in figure? Aristotle replyeth, it is, because that Beastes haue no Cares, Thoughtes, or Imaginations, but onely in their present Action: whereas (on the contrarie) men haue their thoughts in many places, and on diuersitie of things; whereby enueth, that manie children are borne, which neither resemble the father or mother.

ten by Wife Fathers? Hee saith, That men which know little (as wee haue formerly spoken of Beastes) are very intente in the generative acte: by meanes whereof, the matter being disposed, and without any alteration, children are then borne perfect, because nature (in the verie same instant) was busied about no other occasions. But in wife and learned men, it doth not alwayes so fall out: because they (commonly) haue their spirits more subtile and penetratiue, haue also their thoughts otherwise busied most part of the time, which is a great hinderance, when the power is not wholly employed in the action: From whence it proceedeth, that the matter being not perfectly disposed, Nature could not perfectly performe her Workmanship.

The third reason, rendered for answer to this doubt, is from Astrologie, caused by influence of the Stars, according vnto the opinion deliuered by Ptolemy. For, by the disposition of heauen, and the signe or Image ascendant, & the Aspects which the Planets haue, both in the Conception and Birth of man: the manners and Naturall disposition are infused, rendering themselves semblable or different to the Father, according to the proportion and conformitie of the Father, or of the Childe, at the time of Generation. Wee might heere rehearse the Influences of these Planets, by their severall proprieties, but it would require too long a time: Besides, Ptolemy hath spoken thereof sufficiently; so hath Iulius Firmicus, Haly ben Rasel, Guy, Bonatus, and others: And the reason is so strong, as it cannot bee denied: Considering and perceyuing the Infuxion and power, which the Superiour Bodies haue ouer the Inferiour, with their Effects.

Now, in regard that this enueth by motion or agitation, which is the cause of generation and corruption, and is that which first disposeth the matter, and afterwards formeth it: it followeth, that as the motion of time dooth neuer cease, and that there are diuers times, and diuers Motions. And besides (as wee haue already sayde, that they haue diuers Natures; euen so, the matter disposeth it selfe diuersly: and causeth variable actions and dispositions in the creatures, some-

Sometimes, one, or two: And (very often) the one proueth contrary to the other; from whence enueth such diuers effects, which daily offer themselves to our view: By the verie same occasions, wee may easily discern, whence it cometh, that goodly Children are begotten by deformed and vgly Fathers, and likewise the contrary: wherein there can nothing else bee alledged, but the good or bad disposition of the matter, and the imagination of the parties agent and sufrage, with the Celestiall influence at the instant, all which we haue deliuered to be doubtfull, according as other things are of the like nature.

CHAP. XIII.

Of a very strange and memorable fortune, which happened in one kinde, though at sundry times; to two Knights of Rome.

The chief conspirators of the death

He chief men in the conspiracy for the death of Julius Caesar (according as Plutarch and others haue declared) were Brutus and Cassius, who afterward (with their Adherents) were persecuted, and proclaimed open Enemies to the people of Rome, by Octavius, Lepidus, and Marke Anthony, that had gotten possession of the City. Among the complices of Brutus and Cassius, Marcus Varro was a principall man, who (being present in the battaile, which Octavius and Marke Anthony had against the conspirators, and when Octavius was the Conquerour) for safeguard of his life, and escape of apprehension, changed his habite with a poore Souldier, and appearing as one of the common Prisoners, was ranked among them, and sold (in confused manner) as the rest were. It was his happe to be bought by a Romaine Knight, named Barbula, who (within some while after) seeing his faire demeanor, and honest carriage of life, began to suspect, that he was a Romaine borne; albeit, he coniectured the same by no other relation. To be resolu'd in this doubt, heooke him (one daie) aside, and instantly entreated him, to tell him of whence, and what he was, promising him wealth, to pursue his pardon to Octavius and Marke Anthony. But Marcus Varro, dissembling still his aduerse fortune, by no meanes would disclose himselfe: so that Barbula altered his former opinion, and perswaded himselfe, that he was no Romaine, according as his iudgement had before imagined. Soone after, Octavius and Marke Anthony returned to Rome, and Barbula also with his Slave, who (perhaps) was a better man then himselfe.

It fortun'd afterward, that Marke Varro being at the Senate-doores, attending for his Maister, that stayed within vpon some vrgent busines: was known by a Romaine, that presently aduertised Barbula thereof. Barbula, not seeming to know any such matter, and vying no further speech thereof, so labored with Octavius (who gouerned then in Rome) that he obtained his pardon; by means whereof, Varro enioyed his liberty, and being brought to Octavius, hee was honourable entertained, and thenceforward respected in the number of his friends.

Within a while after, Octavius and Marke Anthony fell at discord and variance, & Barbula taking part with Marke Anthony (who was vanquished in the trial of fight) grew to bee doubtful of Octavius, and made his recourse to the same remedy, as formerly Marcus Varro was forced to vndergoe, by changing his habite, and feigning himselfe to bee another. Marcus Varro not knowing him; by some length of time since last he saw him, but especially by the poverty of his habite; bought him in like manner as himselfe had been. But coming afterward to knowledge of him, he wrought to with Octavius, that his offence was pardoned, and hee set at liberty. So that, in satisfying what he stood bound to doe, and repaying the kindness which he had formerly received: hee left a liuely example to vs, of the inconstancy of our liues best condition, with a rule and instruction to all men,

CHAP. XV.

The Ages of Man generally distinguished, according the instructions of Astrologers.

Y common deuision of Astrologers, Arabians, Chaldeans, Greeks, and Latines, and particularly by Proclus, a Greek Authour, Ptoleme and Hayben Razell; the life time of man is diuided into seauen Ages, ouer each one of which Ages, one of the seauen Planets is said to rule and gouerne. The first Age is called Infancy, containing the space of foure yeares, during which time, the nearest Planet to the Earth hath Dominion, that is the Moone, because the qualities of Infancy hath vrged men to say; that the influence of this Planet is wholelie conformable to this Age, wherein the body is humide, tender, weak, mouable, and altogether like vnto the Moone. For the very least matter causeth alteration, his members (by the smallest Trauaille) is weakened, and the body (in little time) encrease, euen plainly to be discerned by the eye. These things doe happen generally in all persons, by reason of the Moones government, neuertheless, more in some then in others, that other particular qualities, which hold no subsistence of the Moone, doe receive their originall, in manner as the Childe cometh into the World, according to the estate and disposition of other Planets.

The second Age continueth tenne yeares, vntill hee attaine to the yeares of fouretteene: this Age is called by the Latines Pueritia, or Child-hood, which giueth a cessation to Infancy, and proceedeth on toward adoloscencie. In this Age reigneth another Planet, named Mercury, seated in the second Heauen. This is a Celestiall body, apt and easie to change, being good with the good, and bad by the aspect of euill. During this time, nature composeth it selfe, according to the quality of this Planet. For then doe young Children declare some principles, whereby to make relation of their Spirits: bee it in reading, writing, or singing, then are they docible and tractable, and yet notwithstanding, light in their speeches, inconstant and mutable.

The third Age, consisteth of eyght yeares, being named by our Auncients Adoloscencie, or Youth-hood, and it lasteth from fouretteene, till two and twenty yeares be fully compleate: during which time, the third Planet, called Venus ruleth. For a man then beginneth to be prompt by Nature, powerfull, and able for procreation: as enclining to loue, to Women, and addicted to Musicke, sports, pleasures, bankets, and other worldly delights. This is to be vnderstood, of natural prouocations in Man to any of these; for, hauing lost the benefit of his own free will and election, hee leaneeth or taketh such inclinations by influences. And yet wee are to know, that neither the force of the Planets, nor power of the Starres, hath priuilege on the liberty of the Soule; although they incline the sensitiue appetite, the members and Organs in the body of man.

The fourth Age paceth on; vntill a Man haue accomplished two and fortie yeares, & is tearmed young man-hood, the course whereof continueth nineteene yeares; and hath Jupiter the Sunne for Gouernour and Commandeur, which is in the fourth Heauen, called by most ancient Astrologians, the fountain of light, the principall eye of the whole World, King of the Planets, and hart of the wide vniuers. In like manner, this Age is Prince of all other, and the floure of life, during which time, the faculties and powers of the body & of the Spirit, doe acquire and attaine to their strength, and man beeing then apprehensiue, bold, and hardy, knoweth how to order and dispose of his owne affaires. He then desireth and purchaseth Treasures, he coueteth to be excellent, and well famed, and is thus enclined enclined to well doing. Briefely, in all things generally, he delareth apparently, that the Sunne reigneth ouer him.

The fifth Age, named Mature Manhood, hath (according to the said Authours) fifteene yeares of continuance, and therefore makes his Progreasse so farre as six and fifty yeares, being subiect to the Planet Mars, which (of it selfe) is euill, dangerous, and hot, enclining men to Auarice, and making them chollickie, sickly; yet temperate in eating and drinking, and constant in their actions.

Afterward, in adding twelue to fiftie sixe, you shall make vp sixty eight yeares, which reach to the end of the sixt Age, and is called Old Age, whereof Jupiter is the great Gouernour: This is a Noble Planet, the signifier of Equity, Religion, Pietie, Temperance, and Chastitie; prouoking men to finish al pains and hazzards, and seek quiet repose. In this time, men additt themselves to holy works, affecting Temperance and Charitie, desiring honour, accompanied with due praise; they are honest, fearefull of shame, disgrace, and reproach.

The seauenth and last of these seuen Ages, is limited from sixty eight yeares, so farre as fourescore and eight, and few there are that attaine thereto. It giueth a time and apt name to it selfe, being called, weak, declining, and decrepitate Age, in regard whereof, Saturn commaundeth ouer it, as the most tardy, and yet the very highest Planet, and which enuironeth all the other before named. His Complexion is cold, dry, and melancholly, wearisome, and troublesome. By this meanes, he cloatheth aged men with follitude, chollier, meagrenesse, disdain, and anger. He enfeebeth their memory and their strength, then doth he ouercharge their bodies with griefes, long tedious, languishing diseases, euell thoughtes, and with an earnest desire to encrease secret & concealed matters; and which is more, they will be alwaies Maisters, Superiours, and wholly obeyed. If any man chance to goe beyond this Age, which is more admired, then noted in many: you shall evidently perceiue, that hee will returne to his first condition of infancy againe, and haue a part of the Moone to bee his Gouernour, which was his first Planet (as I haue already declared) in his first Age of all. In regard whereof, they are then vsually dealt withall, euen as we doe to young Infants, according to their conditions and daily inclinations.

The deuision of these seuerall Ages, in manner as formerly hath beene discoursed, was the inuention of Astrologers, whereto euery man may giue credit, as himselfe best pleaseth. Let vs now come to the deuision made by Philosophers, Physicians, and Poets, who were of diuers opinions; yet because in this Argument there are some notable things, we will enter into some part of their report, that young Spirits may exercise themselves a little. The great Philosopher Pythagoras, how long heeuer the life of man was; made but foure partes thereof, comparing it to the foure seasons or quarters of the yeare. He said, Infancy is the Spring-time, when al things are in their floure, beginning to encrease and augment themselves. Youth-hood, he compared to Summer, by the Ardour and strength that men haue in that Age. Manly Age is Autumne; because in this time, a man hath experience, is ripe and apt for good counsell, with certaine knowledge of all things. Old Age he figured in winter, being a fruitlesse time, dimberstonie, and hauing no benefit of any blessings, but what haue proceeded from the former seasons.

Marcus Varro, a learned man among the Romaines, diuided the life of man into fise partes, attributing the space of fifteene yeares to each one of them. The first fifteene he named Pueritia, Child-hood, as being but an entrance into further growing. The second was Adoloscencia, the springall or stripling estate of a youth, which hee tearmed the encreasing time, for then the body goeth on by encreasing. The third fifteene yeares, mounting vp to forty five yeares, hee called Iuuentus, as coming of the Latine word Iuare, to signifie the time of helping; because men doe then scue as helpers to their Countrey, eyther in warlike occasions, or other affaires fit for the Common-wealth, and this Age is held for the stability or firmnesse of life.

life. After forty five, even to threecore, the Age of man is called Matutinis, maturity, full of ripeness, because (in Latine) such men are named Seniores, that is to say; Ancient men, or graue aged men, in respect of the precedent conditions. Also, in these times men doe begin to decline, and walke on toward Old Age, which accompanieth the last fifteene yeares, after threecore, and containeth the rest of mans life time. Behold how Varro deuided the life of man, according as Censorinus hath declared.

Hippocrates the Philosopher, he deuided it also into seauen Ages, the two first (seuens, rising to foureteene; The third, ascending from foureteene, to eight and twenty. The seauen that make up the fourth and fift, doe rise to forty two: The sixth, from forty two, to fifty six; And the rest of mans life, he attributeth to the seauenth Age. Selen the Philosopher, as the same Censorinus relateth, brought the seauen parts into fixe, deuiding the third, the sixth and the seauenth in the midst, so that each of the fixe parts should last seuen yeares; And the like description is made by the other Philosophers. But Isidore hath distinguished it into fixe Ages, agreeing in the two first with Hippocrates, making every one seauen; naming the first Infancy; the second childhood. Afterward, from foureteene to eight and twenty, he termeth Adolescentie, or the encreasing age. From twenty eight, to forty, he nameth it Iuuentus, or the helping time, which is the 4. in order. The fift, which he calleth declination, or the beginning of Old-age he maketh to consist of 20. yeares, and amount (in all) to sixty. The remainder of life, he attributeth to Old Age, and nameth it the sixt Age.

Horace, the excellent Poet, hath likewise made deuision of mans Ages; but it is into foure partes onely, according as Pythagoras did, to wit; Childhood, Youth-hood, Man-hood, and Old age; all which he hath elegantly described in his Art of Poesie, with those conditions belonging to men, in all those feuerall times. Neuertheless, according to the rule of naturall Philosophy, the life time of man should not be deuided, but into three Ages: The first, the encreasing Age; The second, the continuing Age, or, while a man remaineth in one estate; And the third, the Age of Diminution: For, according to Aristotle; All things that doe procreate or engender, haue augmentation, retention, of Essence, and diminution; so, in like manner, three Ages ought to be assigned to Man. The Philitions of Arasie haue beene of the same opinion, and yet notwithstanding, Auicenne, a very learned man, distinguisheth our life into foure Ages, or principall partes. The first, which lasteth thirty yeares, hee calleth Adolescentie, because, during this time, all things go on by encreasing. The second, from thirty, so farre as forty five, hee calleth the stayed and settled Age, or of beauty and comeliness; for at this time, a man is in his best perfection. From thence onward, and so farre as to threecore yeares; he termeth, secret diminution, and the way to Old Age. The rest that a man liueth afterward, as being his fourth and last estate, he nameth it, clearly discouered Old Age, or falling, and downe-drooping Age. Now, notwithstanding this opinion of his, it is to be noted, that albeit he haue made this principall deuision; yet hee forgetteth not, to deuide the first of these foure (which containeth thirte yeares) and maketh three parts thereof. Whereby wee may well say, that hee consenteth with such, as deuided it into fixe.

Now, after wee haue considered all these variable opinions, I cannot tell to which I should betake my selfe, as becoming the truest; and to speake vprightly, no man knoweth how to giue an assured rule, or any certaine ayme; as well in regard of the diuers complexions & dispositions of men, as also their dwelling in sundry Landes and Prouinces, and their nourishing by good or bad foods, by means whereof, men arrive sooner or later at the state of Old Age. For which cause, Galen would haue no man to giue any limited times to our ages; which being well considered, it maketh all these discordances of so many Authoers, need no matter of strange mutuaile, considering that each man had a feuerall consideration. According as Seruius Tullius, King of Rome had, who (according to Aulus Gellius) had had no respect but to common benefit, when he deuided the people of Rome into fixe estates. And yet he distinguished the life of men, but into three parts, calling the first age (which he assigned to be seauenteen yeares) Childhood. From that estate to forty five, he declared them to be men, able for the Warres, and so caused them to be set downe in writing. Lastly, from forty five onward, he called them, ripe and mellow men, fit for graue employment and counsell.

This deuision doth not contrary any of the other, because it is vniuersall, and includeth the meane particulars in it, and it seemeth, that he grew conformable to the common deuisions, when it was usually obserued, to separate (in diuers kinds) the Greene Age, Ripe-age, and Old-age. The Greene-age, from the time of our birth, euen to the ending of our youth, which goeth so farre as forty five yeares, little more, or little lesse; according as Virgil saith, Viridisque iuuentus, that is to say, Green-youth. The Ripe and Mellow Age, proceedeth on to threecore yeares, which time was attributed by Seruius Tullius, to men of Wisedome, meete for graue counsels and consultations. The rest is teamed to be decrepitate Old-age. These three parts, may likewise be deuided into other proportions; and (by that meanes) be answerable to the varietie, which appeareth to haue beene (by diuersitie of coniecture) among so many good Writers.

CHAP. XVI.

That there be certaine yeares in the life of Man, which our Ancients haue iudged to be more dangerous, then any other; And for what cause.

Yeares called climactericall, dangerous to mans life.

Ancient Philosophers & Aströlogers haue obserued, that there are certaine yeares in our course of life, of much more perill and danger, then others be; which they named Climactericall, by reason of the Greeke word Clima, that is to say, Ladder or forme of degrees, signifying thereby, that such yeares are limited, in the fashion of degrees and steps, but hard to passe, during the rest of this mortall life. For, like as they maptaine in daies, that the seauenth, ninth, and fourteenth, are dangerous during mens sicknesses and infirmities; In like case, they haue especial respect, that such a number limitation, take place also in the course and yeares of our fraile life; in regard of the members strength; whereof, great account hath beene made by Pythagoras, Themistocles, Narcissus, Auerroes, and many others. Also, in regard of the influences and domination of euill Planets; as Imajaleage of Saturne, who reigneth indifferently of seasons; and sundry Ages. Whereby they gather iudicially (according as Marshall Ficinus, Censorinus, & Aulus Gellius doe testifie) that all the Septenary yeares, or those comprised of seauens; doe portend great alterations, changes; & impossible (as it were) that such tearmes can be passed; without mighty hazzard, alteration of life, estate, health, or complexion. Upon this occasion, the yeare seauenth, fourteenth, twenty one, twenty eight, thirty five, forty two, forty nine, and so for every seauenth yeare, is to be feared.

And because they defend the number Tenarie, or of three, to be likewise of great efficacy; they say, that three times seauen (which maketh one and twenty) is of maine importance. The like speech doe they make of the yeare forty nine, because it is composed of seauen times seuen. But the yeare (most of all other) to be feared, is that of sixty three. For, like as the number of one and twenty, ariseth out of three times seauen; so, likewise the number of sixty three, begetteth it selfe of three times one and twenty; or of nine times seauen, or of seauen times nine; which compleateth the number celebrat & recommended by the very wisest. When a man therefore cometh to the age, of entering into the year threescore and three; he ought to be careful of his health and life, waiting (daie by day) for some change therein; or what sooner else may happen vnto him; according cording as Julius Firmicus affirmeth in his Bookes of Astrology.

To this purpose, Aulus Gellius maketh mention of the Emperor Oſianus his Letter, whereby he signified to his Nephew Caſius (having escaped this year of so much danger) how carefull he ought to be of the year sixty foure, because he had prevented the year sixty three; so that he declared a good intention, to celebrate his second Nativity. For these reasons, our Elders made doubt of this year three score and three, perceiving many worthy men to die, even at the arrival thereof in the same year dyed Aristotele, and divers other notable personages. And, as I have formerly said, the number of nine was also feared, because they said, that he which escaped the year sixtie three, could not passe the boundes of foure score and one; in regard that this age was composed of nine times nine: at which aged dyed Plato, the great Geographer Eratosthenes, Zenocrates, the Platonicall Prince of the ancient Academie, Diogenes the Cynick, and other famous persons.

Gentlemen, I was willing to make some observation of these matters, more for curiositie and exercise, then for any credence given to them: albeit they are not vterly impertinent, nor void of naturall reason. For, as we may behold, that some sicknesses and humours doe end in a man, and, that in other Creatures, the change of teeth, encrease of Beard, the voyce augmenting, and nature worketh other effects and notable changings, on such complexions as are knowne by the tearmes of years: wherefore should not wee credite, that (by the same meanes) limited times doe make other alterations and impressions? Why should we not beleue, that our humane body hath communication with the Celestiall influences, as with humours; by some especiall meanes; which is hidden from vs? Because, man is subiect to the will and government of God. And God, although he hath formed all things miraculously; and super-naturally: yet notwithstanding, he will have his works to be naturall; onely such excepted, as were created by him against the Lawes of Nature, and according to his owne secret and inscrutable iudgement.

CHAP. XVII.

That Orpheus, Homer, Pythagoras, Plato, and other of the ancient Philosophers and Poets, did read the Books of Moyſes, and haue taken many particular points out of them.

It is not to bee found, that any man (before Moyſes) hath left any thing written; except it were Abraham and Enoch, whose learning, Moyſes (as their lawfull Inheritor) hath comprehended in his Bookes, adding thereunto, those things which he heard from the mouth of the living God, by Oracles daily received from him. At such time as Pythagoras and Plato learned the Sciences in Egypt; they would (first of all) study the Doctrine of Moyſes, whose name (in those times) was in great admiration through all Egypt, & out of his Bookes they conceived the reason of God; to wit, of the first cause. After whom, Numenius the Pythagorian, wrote down in his Bookes, many things concerning Moysaicall Doctrine, as Basilie the great witnesseth; and the same Numenius saith, that Plato was no other then Moyſes, speaking in the Greeke Language. Clement Alexandrianus, and Enschius, doe both say, that the Gentiles received their very greatest Mysteries from the Jewes, wrapping & enfoldng them in their Fables. That of Denealion, was taken from the Historie of the Deluge: The fixation of Phaeton, from the retrogradation and going back of the Sunne, which was in the time of Ezechias.

They that would behold the building of the Tower of Babel, which Nimrod and his perakers undertooke, meaning (by Ladders) to climb vp into Heaven, and see what was done there: shall find it under certain Allegories, amply described in Homer, under the Fable of the Gyants Oetus and Ephialtes, Sonnes to Iphimedia, where hee describeth their height

The Poet Ouid, borne in Salmo, tooke that which hee singeth, of the beginning and Creation of the World (like as Homer, Hesiodus, and Linus, borrowed their Songs, of sanctifying the seauenth day) from none else but Moyſes. Many haue sung the golden Age and raigne of Saturne, having gathered it from the most happy estate, wherein Adam was before hee sinned. Many more before them; as Orpheus, who learned diuers things from the doctrine of Moyſes, especially in the Book which he made of the sacred word; he confesseth, that he took out of the Moysaicall Tables, that which hee singeth concerning God, knowne to the onely Chaldean Moyſes, by these Verses, which Frances George, in his Hermony of the world, hath reduced into Latine.

Primus perfectus Deus est, qui caecula creatit

Some haue been of opinion, that Orpheus meant by this Chaldean, Noah, others, Enoch, and the Platonists tooke him for Zoroastres, who was the Sonne of Cham: but to none of them were the Tables of the Commandements giuen, but to Moyſes onely.

CHAP. XVIII.

A Mysticall signification, concerning the body of Elifeus, and of the dead man raised to life in the Prophets Graue.

It is written in the second Booke of the Kinges, and the thirteenth Chapter, that as they were burying a Man, they espied the Souldiours of the Moabites: wherefore, they threw the dead man into the Graue of Elifeus, and the man being downe, and hauing touched the bones of Elifeus, hee reuiued, and stood vpon on his feete. This History containeth in it, the figure of our Lord Iesus Christ, and vnder the superficies thereof, is hidden a very great Myserie. Dead Elifeus, is mysticallie vnderstood to be Iesus Christ, who died for vs, and the Souldiours or Heeres of Maab, doe represent wicked spirits, and the finnes of the world.

The Men that espied the Moabites, and threw the dead bodie into the Graue of Elifeus; doe signifie the Apostles, who provided for the peoples sauing health, against the mallice of wicked Demons, and against the burthen of finnes: and therefore plunged mankind (being dead) into the Sepulcher of Christ, that is to say, into the Water of Baptisme, because the Water of Baptisme is Christs Graue or Sepulcher, wherein wee are sanctified three times in the name of the blessed Trinitie, in regard that Iesus Christ continued three dayes and nights in the Sepulcher. Whereupon, Saint Paule saide to the Romaines: We are buried with him in his death by Baptisme. Concerning the dead man, that hauing touched the bones of Elifeus, reuiued, and rose vpon his feete: read but the same Apostle, in his second Chapter to the Colossians; and there you shall finde him perfectly described.

It is the fourth Booke, in the vulgar edition.

The Interpretation, of the Dreame of the great King Nabuchodonosor.

Nabuchodonosor, or otherwise called Nabuchodonosor, King of Babylon, beheld

Dan. 1.

Nabuchodonosors Image.

beheld (in a Dreame) a very great Image or statue, the glory whereof was high, and it had a terrible regard. His head was of fine Gold; his Breast and armes of Siluer, his belley and Thighes of Brasse; his Legges of Iron; and his Feet were partly of Iron, and partlie of Earth. He saw afterward, that a little stone (came of it selfe) out of a Mountaine, and descended from such an height; as by the very blow of his fall, the Image was broken in all parts, and beaten into Powder. Daniell interpreted this statue, and gaue the signification thereof in the Kinges presence, as is contained in the second Chapter of his Booke: but heere it is more amply interpreted, and in a larger manner.

The signification of the Image, which Nabuchodonosors saw in his Dreame.

The Image or Statue, denoted the Monarchies of the World; the head of Gold was the Kingdom of the Assyrians; the Breast and Armes of Siluer, the Empire of the Persians; the Belly & Thighes of Brasse, the Monarchy of the Greeks; the rest remaining (consisting of Iron and Earth) the State and Dominion of the Romaines. The stone is Iesus Christ, who descending from the Celestiall Mountaine, hath humbled all these Kingdoms, & brought them to nothing. By this it appeareth, that we are in the last age; and that final time of passing hence remaineth: because, this world must be ouerthrowne and ruined, all the Kingdomes hauing already passed, and all Prophecies fullie accomplished. All which, if we were not able to coniecture; yet might wee easily comprehend by good reasons.

Good reasons to persuade that we live in the latest age.

In the first place, wee cannot deny, but that vertue is at her chiefeist height, and all Vices at their pitch of extremitie. In the second place, who euer beheld Diuinity and Learning more exalted, then it is at this day? Philosophy, Musike, Armes, Caruing, Painting, and Eloquence more common, then now they are? very children neuer grew so soone to be perfect. We daily behold, that men do not now reach to the yeares of an hundred, or if they do, it is very sildome; as in former times they did. And we may perceiue withal, that at the age of 18. yeares, a young Sprigall shewes himselfe of as good shape, and provided of as able strength; as a young man at the age of thirty in elder daies. I cannot deliuer any reason, why men doe lue in this World so short a while; except it be thorough their bad government, and that dissolutions and vices are the maine cause thereof; or rather, that God being willing to hasten the end of the World, would haue all these predictions, to be as warning pieces of his neere approach. thousand yeares, to wit; two thousand without the Law; two thousand with the Law; and another two thousand after the first comming of the Sonne of God. This was not the Prophecie of Helie the Thesbite, but rather the inuention of another Helie, a Rabbie of the Iewes, vpon the Talmuds; in the tract Senedrim, Chapter Helie; in the tract of Idolatry, Chapter Litne; and in the Tract of the Sabbath. The coniectures of whom, are reported by Rabbi Isaac, vpon the first Chapter of Genesis, the principall whereof are these that follow.

The first Versicle of Genesis, containeth the Summary of the workes of God, expressing six times the Letter N. Now, Alpha significeth a thousand. Moreover, God perfected the World in fixe daies, the seauenth hee ceased from his workes, and sanctified the Sabbath: And, a thousand yeares are with God, euen as yesterday which is past, so saith the Psalmist. Finally, the fixe first Fathers, Adam, Seth, Enos, Caynan, Maleleth, Jared, are dead; the seauenth; to wit, Enoch, was transported a liue vp into Heauen. After fixe thousand yeares then, during which time, traualles and death will be in their vigour: shal begin the seauenth thousand of repose, and of the life immortal.

Nicholas de Cusa, a very wise Cardinall, gaue many other coniectures of the last times, which I wil relate here at large. If wee desire (saith he) to haue knowledge of the time (how little founer it be) concerning the ending of the world, and the last daies: wee haue iust cause then to meditate on the traualles, which our Saviour Iesus Christ endured in this World. For, as himselfe hath taught vs, if we will liue as Christians; we ought to follow, and learne of him. Learne of me (saith he) for I am humble & meek of heart. In like manner, himselfe hath giuen vs example; to doe as hee did, if we desire to bee his followers. Moreover, hee assurcth vs, that all the faithfull are his members, when hee saith; that which is done to the least of his, he reputeth it as done to himselfe. And thee, in her totall perigrination in this World; imitateth her head Iesus Christ, who opened Heauen by his ascenion. He hath gone before; as his rule and example; his Church followeth after, as his Image and resemblance. Moses behelde the truth, as the flaming Mountaine Sinay, by visions of the verity, and after the Milton was vanished, hee did according to the example which he had seene. Iesus Christ entered into this World, in the forme of a young Infant, hee increased in age, and in wisdom, became a man, teaching the truth, and walking in it, vntill such time, as (to bee a Testimonie thereof) he was taken from this world, by the mallice of the Iewes, who made him to suffer death vpon the Crosse. Neuertheless, hee hath leith his seede, which is his Church, in whom he abideth, as Adam in Eue; his Wife formed of his Flesh, and brought forth of his side: to the ende, that his Spouse the Church (full of his Seede), should afterward be nourished in the House of his heavenly Father, by her glorious assumption vp into Heauen. The Church was regenerated from her Infancy, such like an Infant, shee hath increased in yeares and in wise dome, and (by little and little) shee shall accomplish and finish the time of her Trauailes in this World.

Christ his entrance into this world.

The Church the Spouse of Christ.

The time of Christs being on earth, signified by the militant Church.

The yeare of Iubilee.

This Parable is not set downe in Nicholas de Cusa.

Now, if we would haue a lively example, we may lay by coniecture, that the time which Iesus Christ liued vpon the Earth; is represented and declared, by his Militant Church. We know, that hee is called the Sonne of Man; and the Lord of the Sabbath. Likewise, in him was accomplished, that which was prophesied by Esaie, to wit; The yeare of the Lord, which yeare of the Lord, is the yeare of Iubilee, which yeare of the Lord, is as much to say, as the fiftieth yeare, at which time of Iubily in Israell, euery seller might (by right) recover againe the things which he had sold, without restoring the price received. All this time is reuolued by the septenary number, to wit; from seauen daies; from seauen yeares; and from seauen times seauen yeares, which are fortie nine yeares. After which, the fiftieth yeare following this laborious reuolution, is the yeare Iubilee, free and full of liberty, in which all seruitude ceasing, liberty returneth freely againe. And it is to be

be noted, that fifty yeares of common account by the Catholique Church, do make one yeare of Iubily of the Lord our God. And the Church, who (as his owne Image) followeth her Lord and Patron, doth both demonstrate and explicate by the number of fiftie; onely one of the yeares of Iubily of her Spouse. So that, the revolution of one yeare of the Lord, made in peregrination of his Church, is answerable to one sunny revolution of Iesus Christ, the true Sun of righteousness. By which reasons, wee make coniecture, that the Church cannot traualle in this World, about fifty Iubilies, which are 2500. whereof already we haue had 29. which are past; considering, that since the ascension of our Saviour, even to this present, 1452. yeares haue runne their course. This is the allotted space, and very greatest continuance of the Church, after her Bridegroom, whereof there is much to be abridgd.

Now if we will consider further, the things which our Lord & Saviour hath done, and those which he suffered after the twenty ninth year of his age, vntill the day that he arose, triumphing our Sin, Death, and Hell, and then, if we extend those yeares into Iubilies: wee may (by coniectures) foretell what shal happen to the Church. So that, in the foure and thirtieth Iubily, after the resurrection of the Redeemer of all mankind; she may well hope (by the goodnesse of God) to be raised vp into the glorie, to the ruine of Antichrist. And this is thought, that it will happen, after the birth of our Lord Iesus Christ into the World, 1700. and before the yeare 1734. And as in the time of Noah, the consummation of sin came by the Deluge, the 34. Iubily after the first Adam, according as wise Philo the Jew hath written: we may also fore-tell by coniectures, that in the 34. Iubily after the second Adam, both sin and the World shall be consumed by the fire of the holy spirit. And then shall the Church be transferred out of this corruptible world, into the glory of the liuing, by the comming of her Spouse to Iudgement. And yet the houre of his second comming will be vncertaine, for come he will, & when least doubt is made of him; like as a Thiefe commeth in the night, and as the deluge came vpon the earth. Philo the Jew declareth, that Moses (at the houre of his death) desired God to reueale vnto him; how much of the time was passed, and how much (as then) remained: whereunto God answered, that two had already passed, & two were as yet to come. And so Moses being full of vnderstanding, yielded vp his Soule. Heerein then (saith he) God reuealed four times to Moses, two past, and two to come: of which, from Adam to the Deluge or Floud, passed the first time. The second, after the floud, vntil Moses. The third, from Moses to Iesus Christ. And the fourth, from Iesus Christ, to the end and consummation of the world. Now, the last time took beginning at the Resurrection of the Son of God, and continueth to the ending of the world, vpon which good reason, the Saints (oftentimes) called them the latter daies, and the ends of the world.

Now, notwithstanding that these supputations of yeares are very diuers, according to the truth of the Jewes, according to the 70. Greeke Interpreters, as also according to Iosephus & Philo: I am of the minde (neuertheless) it is much more true, that there hath passed so many Iubilies from the death of Moses to Iesus Christ; as from Adam to the time of Noah, and as many from the floud vnder Noah, vnto the death of Moses. In like manner, as many Iubilies haue and shall run their course, from the resurrection of our Saviour, to the end of the last times, and of 34. Iubilies. Moses died (according to that diuine reuelation) in the midst of these 4. times, whereof two were finished, & two were then to come. There are many other coniectures of the latter daies, which are found written; and yet are so diuers, as no one agreeth with another. And to speak truly, the ending of the world, and the general iudgement is vncertaine to any creature: for it is onely in the hand and power of God, whose secrets are concealed to himselfe, and he being God referred them to his owne peculiar knowledge. So that, if those ancient men would needs vnder take to write thereof some particularities; yet they al deceiued themselves by abusing coniectures, far off from all verity. We then of these daies, who haue much lesse learning & iudgement iudgement then they had, without any comparison, and enioy not a sparke of the like sanctity; ought to cease and desist, fro ouer-curious search into things to come, especially daies, houres, and moments, which God hath so restrained to his owne power, that the Angels in heauen do not know them. For so himselfe saith; Of that day and houre, no man knoweth, neither the Angels of Heauen, but my Father onely. But sure and certain are we, that the world shall perish by an vniuersall flame, and shall bee renewed: which the Spirit of God deliuered by Moses, in his Song in Deuteronomy. Fire is kindled in my wrath, and shal burne vnto the bottom of Hell, and shal consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the Mountaine.

Sophocles the Pagan Poet, seemed to touch with his finger (as it were) the ending of the World, in diuers verses, translated by John de Maumont, the meaning whereof briefly folowes thus. The Age shall come that will bring vs riches from the high Heauens, when they shall be filled, and round enuirt with fire. All places on the earth the flames shall enclose, and burne all things, as well in the water, as in the Ayre. Not anything in this world, vnder earth, or in the deepest Sea, shall scape from burning. When then, by so cruell a flames fury, all things shall be consumed: the Springs of all waters shall be without course, like a bottomlesse gulfe. No fields shal produce any more fruits, nor the earth be inhabited: No ships shall float vpon the Sea: No birds fly in the Ayre. But a cruell tempest of fire, with thunder, shall hurle Heauen and Earth into eternall ruines, burning the Earth and all things into Cinders. Then shall her great backe resume no other effluence, or yeelde any nourishment, for all is brought into putrefaction.

Saint Peter writeth; That Heauen and Earth which is at this instant, are reserved for Fire at the day of Iudgement, and the Elements shall reuelue themselves into fire. Saint Augustine answered a demand which might he made, as thus. When after the Iudgement is ended, this World shall bee burnt, before (instead thereof) a new Heauen be created, and a new Earth: in what place shall the Saints be, when this burning is performed? Considering, it followeth necessarily, that they should be in some corporall place, because they all haue bodies. They shall be (saith he) in high places, where into the flames can neuer mount, as likewise the Waters of the Deluge could not. For they shall then haue fish bodies, as they may bee where they will be, without fearing the Fire of burning, being made immortal and incorruptible: as the corruptible and Mortall bodies of the three Men, Sidrach, Misack, and Abednego lived, without being offended in the fiery furnace.

Now, if we will be Christians, wee ought to beleue, that the Resurrection of the dead, is in Flesh, and that it will be done in a moment, or in the twinkling of an eye, saith the Apostle: but our Faith herein is not vnprofitable, although our vnderstanding doe not perfectly comprehend, howe, and in what manner it shal be done. Let vs leave then to God, the causes and reasons whereby this is to bee done, and let not vs enquire (ouer busily) after his admirable secrets. I could continue on this discourse, with diuers other Chapters, and handle in them this Resurrection, setting downe the solution and answers of Doctors in Diuinity, touching those high questions and demands, which may be made in this matter. But I will saile no further in so high a Sea, nor enter into an Eurytus of reasons, where the Billowes may cause the sinking of my poore Spirit ship; therefore here shall be my Heauen and landing.

The Conquest of the Kingdome of Naples, by Charles the eight, King of France.

Philip de Comines, a worthy learned Gentleman, who was Counsellour to King Charles, and serued him in the action; giueth notable testimony thereof, and therefore I think it not amisse, to vse his own words, in regard of his grauity and authority. He relateth first, the cruelty & tyranny of Ferdinando, King of Naples; and of his Son Alphonso, in causing 24. Noble

The Iudgement of Philip de Comines, of the Conquest of Naples, for the finnes of the Kings thereof

The tyranny, crueltie, and vicious life of the Kings of Naples.

Bithoppicks and Abbais sold for money

Noble-men (their Subjects) to be most cruelly murdered in Prison: then, discouering of their vices and wickednes, he afterward speaketh of Gods iudgements vpon them, proceeding in this manner.

No man (saith hee) was euer more cruel, more wicked, more vicious, nor a greater Glutton, then Alphonso, though his Father Ferdinando was more dangerous then he: for, in making men faire weather (as we terme it) and good cheare; he commonly betrayed them. As he dealt by Count Jaques, whom he murdered villainously, though hee were Ambassadors with him for Frances Sforza, Duke of Milaine, and so he dealt likewise with many other, neuer vsing mercy to any, no, not so much as to his owne Kinsman. Besides, he neuer had any pity or compassion on his poore people, for hee made a very merchandize of his Kingdom, insumch; that hee forced his Subjects to feede and fat his Hogges, and pay for them if they chanced to die. He bought vp all the Oyle and Graine in the Countrey, before it was ripe, and sold it afterward extremely deare, compelling them to take it at his price, and, while he sold, no man else might sell any. If any Noble-man or Gentleman were richer then the rest; hee forced him to lend him great summes of Money. He tooke from his Nobility their races of horses, or else made them keepe them for him, whereby he had many thousands of Horses, Mares, and Coltes. Both the Father and the Son tooke many Women by force. They neuer had reuerence or respect to the holy Church; but sold Bithoppicks, as for example, that of Taranto, which Ferdinando the Father sold for 12000. Ducates, to a few for his Son, who (he said) was a Christian. He gaue Abbais to Faulconers, with charge, to keepe him a certaine number of Haukes at their expences. Alphonso the Sonne neuer kept any Lent, nor made so much as any shew to keepe it. He neuer made conscience of any committed sinne, nor euer communicated: and, to conclude, it is not possible to doe worse, then they both did.

Thus saith this Authour, of the liues and manners of these two Kings, and then hee further addeth, concerning Gods Iudgements vpon them. It may (saith he) seeme to the Readers, that I haue spoken this on some particular passion, or hatred towards them. But (in good faith) I haue not said it to any other end, then to continue the course of my History, and that it may appeare, that this voyage to King Charles to Naples, proceeded onely of the will of Almighty GOD, who ordained, that so young a King, destitute of Councell, Money, and all sufficient meanes for such an enterprize: should be his Comissary (as it were) to chastise these Kings, who were wise, potent, and rich, and had many wise Counsellours and graue personages about them; yea, many Subjects, friends, and allies, abroad in Italy, whom it imported to conferre and defend that Kingdom. And yet neuertheless, though they fore-saw the storm long before: they could not find meanes to auoid it, nor make resistance any where. For, excepting onely the Castle of Naples, there was not any place, Town, or Fort, that stayd King Charles at one whole day. Insumch, that Pope Alexander said very wel; That the French-men came with Chalke in their hands, like Harbingers, to make and take up their lodgings where they pleased: For they had not occasion, so much as to put on their Armour, in all the Voyage.

Therefore I conclude, according to the opinion of very many good and religious men, and other sorts of people (So the voyce of the people is the voyce of God) that GOD did punish these Kings visibly, and in such euident manner; that it might serue for an example and admonition to all Kings, to liue well, according to the commandement of God. For these Kings whereof I haue spoken, lost their Honours and Realme, great riches, and mooueables of all sorts; yea, and their owne persons in the ende, three of them in the space of one year, or little more. And, as I haue understood of some (that were verynere there) they found (in pulling downe an olde Chappell) a Booke, whereof the Title was; The Truth, with her secret counsell; in which Booke, was contained all that had happened after vnto them: And when they three (onely) had read it, they burnt it.

Thus much I thought good to set down in the words of this wise and graue Authour, to the end, that not only the bad liues of these Kings, but also his iudgement may appeare concerning Gods Iustice shewed vpon them and their whole Kingdome for the same. And this may also be confirmed by other periculers, which Guicardine recounteth of them, and of the successe of that warre, signifying, that Ferdinando the Father being verie wise, and vnderstanding of that intention of King Charles, to come and inuade his Kingdom; he feared so greatly the successe (in respect of his owne bad life and his sonnes) that hee laboured by all meanes possible, by Ambassadors and Friends to diuert him from his purpose, offering to pay him yearly Tribute, of 50000. Ducates, and to holde his Kingdom of him, by fealty and homage. And when hee saw that nothing would preuaile, hee fell sicke with sorrow, and died before King Charles entred into Italy.

And Alphonso his Sonne (who then succeeded him in the Kingdom) though he bragd long before that he would go so farre as to the Mountaines, to meete King Charles if he came forwards (which he said, he would neuer beleue he durst do yet afterward, when the French were in Italy, and came so farre as Rome, hee tooke such a fright, that hee cried out euery night, he heard the French-men coming, and that the verie trees and stones cried France. And, as Guicardine affirmeth (who was not a man either easily to beleue, or rashly to vrite Fables) it was credibly and constantly reported, that the spirit of Ferdinand, his father, appeared to one that had bene his Physician, and bad him tell his sonne Alphonso from him, that he should not bee able to resist the Frenchmen. For God hadde ordained, that his progeny should (after many great afflictions) bee deputed of their Kingdoms, for the multitude and great enormity of their finnes. And especially, for that which he had done (by the perswasion of Alphonso) himselfe, in the Church of S. Leander, in Chata neere to Naples, whereof hee told not the particulars.

Furthermore, the same Authour signifieth, that Alphonso was exagitated with suspitions and feares, whiles he was waking, and in his sleepe, with the present ration of the Noblemen, whom hee had caused to be secretly murdered in prison; (as I haue declared before) and that being in this miserable perplexitie, hee resigned his Crowne vnto his sonne (that was called Ferdinando after his grand-fathers name) and ranne away into Sicily, in such haile, that his Mother in law (with whom only he communicated his intention) being deuorant to flie with him, could not perswade him to stay for her so much as three dayes, which hee earnestly desired, to the end, the might haue that comfort at least, to be Queen of Naples a full year. But hee told her, that if he would not go presently with him, hee would leaue her: protesting (as Philipp de Comines testifieth) that if any sought to stay him by force, hee would cut himselfe out at the Windows. Asking her further, if she heard not euery one crye France, France. Thus being tormented with the horrour of his owne Conscience, and the terror of Gods Iudgements alreadye false vpon him: hee fled into Sicily, taking with him diuers sortes of delicate wares, (which hee had alwayes loued ouerwell) and some Garden seeds to sowe, and a few Jewels, and a little money, without taking any order in the World, for his goodes and Moueables, which he left in great quantitie and abundance, in the Castle of Naples.

But being arrived in Sicily, and touched with Gods grace, hee fell into the account of his bad life past, and of Gods Iustice executed vpon him, hee became penitent, gaue great almes, and entered into Religion, in which estate, hee dyed some after of the stone, with the extremest torments that could be imagined, as some of the Religious; with whom hee liued, tolde after to Philipp de Comines; as himselfe writeth. And to conclude the Tragical History of the Kings, his sonne Ferdinand to whom hee resigned his Crowne, being assembled all his forces, durst make no resistance any where vnto the French, but fledde before them from place to place, vntill at length, almost all his Subjects forsooke him, and rebelled against him; whereupon, hee fled also into Sicily, and within awhile dyed thereof. Loee heere the miserable calamity which (for the finnes of these Kings) fell not onely vpon them, but also vpon their whole Kingdom, seruing for many yeares af-

CHAP. XXII.

Of a Courtier, And what manner of man he ought to be.

He reason inducing mee to write of a Courtier, is to take away a false peruasion, imprinted in common and popular Iudgement,
in thinking; that a Courtier is none other, then an affrontor of Merchants, a Dis-sembler, a Flatterer, Inciuit, a Lier, a russian, a Swaggerer, a troublesome fellow:
In briefe, a man made vp of all Vices, because that in the Kings times, the Sonnes to late King Henry the second, raising in young yeares, many then were such, which being well obserued by that worthie and great man, the Lord de Pyrack, in his Poetrie of Quatraines, hee sung thus:

Go not to Rouelles, if thou loue no dancing,
Nor venter on the Sea, if thou feare danger:
Go not to Bankets if thou canst not eate,
Nor to the Court, if thou speake what thou thinkest.

Now at this present, liuing in such a time, when wee haue a King of a consti-stant age, of a ripe vnderstanding, and Princes and Princesses, that will haue hone in their Courts, but people of ver-ue; I purpose to propound, what manner of man a Courtier ought to be, and his ends. To qualify this error of the people, wherein they haue bene led full manie yeares. Moreover, such as would or else pretend themselves to be Courtiers, by what meanes, and with what great facility they shall attaine thereto.

First of all, he that desireth to followe
the Courts of Emperors, Kings, Queens, Dukes, Dutcheffes, Marquesses, and Earles, or other illustrious persons, ought to be a Gentleman by birth, and of a noble house of Antiquity: because it is lesse reproachfull for a Yeoman, to fall in the exercise of Vertuous actions; then for him that is Noble borne; who erring from these steppes which his predecessors walkt in, soyleth the name & honor of his house and race. Before hee go to Court, he must be past the age of Adolescence, which is about twentie or fize and twenty yeares of his age: for being much older; he will not finde it to his liking. Hee must be well featured and formed, both of his bodye and countenance, least he be misprized and scorned.

He must be of an indifferent stature, to wit; neither extremely high nor low: for men of such sort, are lookt on like things of monstrous ouer. Beside, men of so great stature,ouer and aboue their common addition, to dull vnderstanding are verie vnapt to all exercises of agility, matters verie commendable in a Courtier.

He must be expert in all kind of armes,
to helpe himselfe, as neede shall require, both at all times, and in all places. He must be a good Horseman, and active in managing him; that he may be knowne (among others) to be hardie and valiant.
He must be loyall and faithfull vnto him whom he serueth, and addicted to accord quarrels and contentions, his own honor safely kept, and his for whom hee maketh the agreement. Besides, as hee ought to be skilfull in Wrestling, Leaping, dancing, and playing on some or manie Instruments of Musicke; so should hee likewise readily sing any Poet or Historian.
He must be exquisite in speaking diuers Languages: if he be French, English, or what else, he ought to speake Latine, Italian, Spanish, yea the Germaine tongue also, if it be possible. And for his better attaining thereto, before hee practise any of them, he must haue visited the Countries where the Languages are naturally spoken. For, to learne them by Bookes, he shall neuer pronounce them truly. I meane the like of other Nations, in regard that the Frenchmen, Italians, Spaniards, and Germaines, do ordinarily conuerse together.

He must not vie any foolish presumption, nor be a reporter of wearisome Nouelties, or so vnadvised, as to speake Offensiuie speeches, in steade of such as may better please. Hee must not be Opiniuie, or Contentious, as some doe being crosse and troublesome, like Flies to gainay euery man despitfully, without any respect at all. He must be no prater, Vaine, glorious Boaster, Lier, Flatterer, or Knatt; but moderate and peaceable, vying euermore (especially in publicke) reuerence and respect towards his Lorde, which is most commendable in a seruant. Fame and renowne do follow all good parts; if they appeare in action, both in due time and place, and he cannot faile in these things, but to his own great dishonor. He must make no vants of himselfe, except he be truly valiant, & haue adde some great enterprizes, or done some memorable Stratagems, Neither must he vie any iests, that may offend his Prince, or others: except hee order his iests, and so satir them, as the Prince may speake their worth for wit and dicretion, and not reprove them with want of Iudgement; but instead of displeasure, thinke them to deserue both respect and recompence.

To this purpose, wee may alledge the Historie of a Marshall of France, teamed of S. Andrew, who knowing that King Henry, second of that name, could hardly finde an Architect to his liking, to forme him a model for two bodies of lodgings, which he purposed to build at Fontainebleau, brought him a man of Lymosine, a Mason by his trade, yet ignorant. But hauing fitted him with sufficient habite, he made the King beleue, that hee was a great Architect, verie deeply experienced in that Art, & that it was the same man, who had projected al the buildings which Charles the first, Emperour and king of Spaine, had caused to be made. And indeed, this poore man had bin in Spaine, in his younger yeares, to gaine some knowledge by Trauaile, for his best practise could not maintain him in his own coun-trei. And hauing gotten in Spaine (in the compass of fixe or seauen yeares) some fittie Reals of siluer, thinking himselfe to be the richest man in his Country, hee returned home againe. Hauing spent a good part of his Money, he had married another Wife; for al Lymosine, or people of those parts, vying Mechanical professions, when (for lucre sake) they trauaile into Spaine: they marrie there (for the most part) to women that doo but lend themselves (as it were) for that time, and coming into their owne Country, there they are at libertie againe to take other Wives.

This poore Mason came to dwell at Orleans, hauing spent well-nere all his Reals, and eaten vp his Wifes Dowrie beside, which might amount to twentie pounds; he heard there of some other Masons, that earned daily fiftie or eight sols, or sours, and in his Countrey, they had no more but two sols, or fix blanks.
The Lorde Marshall meeting with this Mason by chance, as hee walked one day abroad in the fields, to passe awaie the time pleasantly: hee fell into Conference with him, and found that he had a verie proude and ouer-weening presumption of his owne sufficiency. So much the rather, because hee was a workman at the building of the new Conueit of Nostre Dame de Monferat. Vn hereindeed hee hope to supply the Masons with Mor-ter, which made him of opinion, that he was the verie best Architect of his time: Albeit hee vnderstood litle or nothing, scarcely knowing howe to order or lay a stone in a wall in his right place.

The King crediting the Lord Marshals wordes, spake a long time together in good French to the Mason, and yet vn-derstood nothing backe againe from him:
for hee stode with his Hat on, without vi-sing any reuerence to the King, or respecting him any more, then if he had bene his daily companion. Sometime, hee called his maistie Monsieur, or my Lord
the King, speaking one while Lymosine, then againe thrusting forth a word or two of spanish: the King perceiving nothing all this while, but continued his speeches earnestly to the Mason, that hee might at full vnderstand his mind.

At length, the King beholding that all the standers by smiled, and aboue all, the Lord Marshall, desired to knowe the reason of their Laughter; which being disclosed to him, himselfe fell into a verie mirthfull humour, and laughed heartily, because he had no better noted the Language, the Crispe countenance and ignorance of the poore Mason. Nor did the King any way take the iest offensiu-ly; but contrarywise, was well pleased, & much commended the Lorde Marshall for it. The like manner of iesting, inuented by a quicke and apprehensiu spirit, with obscuration of time and place, may be permitted in a Courtier, not offending his Prince, but vsed with such discretion, as may rather procure recompence, then any disgrace.

In these pleasant behauiours, he must vse no bitter or vnflattering mocks, girds, or tants, neither towards poore or Rich, and especially not to women, who (in regard of their imbecility) are to be respected. He must forbear entrance into the Princes Chamber, except he be called, or commaunded thither. If the Prince haue retired himselfe, to recreate his spirit, beware of vsing any speeches to him, that may fauour of irkelomnes, but rather of Delectation. Let him not request any thing for himself, that formerly hath bene moued by another, and may be to his aduantage, euermore shunning importunity in such proceedings. Let him attend the fauours of his Prince, and not demand them; auoiding solicitude either he be thought vain glorious, or weake spirited.

By foule and vnfitting actions, neuer seeke to compass fauour, as seruing in murderous or Bawdy employments; but if such occasions be offered, let a dissembled defenseless excuse it, or some other private matter, cause present retirement, which may returne answer, without any other reply. For a Courtier that falls into such employments for his Prince, vpon ouer-much pressing, may well declare the case to be dishonest; and if hee still persist, let wisdom giue direction to withdraw from his Court. For, reprehensions may not bee giuen to Princes publicly, but private and apart, albeit he exceed his Prince in yeares. For, a Courtiers aime only should be, to teach his Prince. A Courtiers Garmentes ought to be of blacke colour, or of such darke decencie, as may rather expresse grauity, then giddinesse or glory. Except it be in Armes, Maskes, or Triumphes, where gay and goodly colours are more fitting, and Imbroderies, Iewelles, and Magnificent pompe.

Let him entertaine one only Vertuous friend, and not two (for two will carrie themselves better together then three) conformable to himselfe in life and manners. Neuertheless, hee must loue, honor, and respect all other friends, according to their worth and merit. He must also endeavour daily, to comfort himselfe with men of esteeme, Noble by Nature and birth, and such as are truly knowne to be men of Honor and Honesty, rather then Villaines, or people of no credite. His care likewise must be, to be beloved and honoured of them, which he cannot faile of, if he be courteous, humane, liberal, affable, and kind in company, ready to pleasure any, diligent in seruice, & carefull of his friends honor, either absent or present, supporting their naturall and tollerable defects, without breach of amity betwene them, for small matters, correcting such errors in himself, as shall be lovingly shewne him, without esteeming himselfe aboue others, or affecting the highest and most honourable places. And he must not imitate some humours, that seeme to despise the world, & strue (by a kinde of trouble some aueritic) to prescribe Lawes or directions to others: so that, besides their mollesious and quarrelling condition, euery for the least Trifles in the world; they will reape where they should not, and seeke all occasions to complaine of their verie best Friends, which is an odious and bad behauiour.

If it happen that he bee called or challenged to the Duells or single fight (as oftentimes it falls out in the courts of Princes) and by indiscretion or rashnesse, he must not ouer-violently and vnadvisedly present himselfe thereto, but with a cool and temperate carriage, euery as compelled or enforced to his answer. And if the businesse can fall out no otherwise, but he must needs proceede to the acte; for safety of his honor, he may boldly vndergo it.

It is also absurde and vnlightie in a Courtier, to carry himselfe extreamelie or enraged in any sport or recreation: for then hee resembleth rather a furious Madman, then one of ciuill and ferled condition. His conuersation must be sober, and (about all things) hee must auoid drunkennesse, and beware of those trickes, which are too ordinarily vsed in Courtes, in striuing who shall soonest make a man drunke, onely to shame and disgrace him. In being a map of such behauiour, euery one will bee iure to note and scorne him; and the Prince himselfe will stande doubtfull of his honestie: or, how he should trust him with any case of Consequence, for Drunkardes are vnapt per-persons for State affaires.

If he bee invited by his Prince to anie play or pastime, he may safely yield therto, not in hope to make gaine of him; but only to yield him contentment. And let him be careful, that he be not too opiniue in any accident against him: but giue way to him in all, and by al meanes, in regard of fo great inconueniences, that thereby do daily happen.

Likewise, let him not immitate some, who will spare no time (either daie or night) from playing, but thereby do lose many faire occasions, of performing some good Offices vnto their Prince, whence might be deriued great merit and fauors. Some haue bene noted so assidue and earnest, that they would play away lands, houses, Garments, yea, their verie Horfes and Armour: and afterwards, borrow (by importunitie of their Friendes) without any re-payment, whereupon, haue ensued Contempts, Quarrels, and Blood.

Let him not speak of any thing which he vnderstandeth not, wherein hee shall expresse more Wisedome to bee silent: for it is an honest shadow and cloake to his ignorance. Likewise, if he haue anie imperfection in some part of his bodie, let him hide and conceale it by all possible meanes. As did Ferrand King of Naples, who would neuer plucke off his Gloues, because his hands were not white. Iulius Cesar also did daily weare a Chaplet of Bayes, because he was bald.

He must keepe his credite with Merchants and others, not following the dealing of many, who are beholding to such as lend them: yet must be daily importuned to make repayment, euery vnto his goodnes, as their goodnes and landes must be seized on, yea, sometimes their bodies confined to prison. Thiese behauiours, do rather relish of a man vterly lost and forsaken, then of a Vertuous Courtier.

In his talke and discoursing, hee must report no Myracles, that is to say, things that are not likely, nor neuer were. They that make profession of relating such nouelties, are euermore held for Lyes; and euery man that is a liar, will carry the like credit of beleefe, when he speaketh truth. Laughter likewise, except it light vpon good ground, is no vray commendable: For any man, that is subiect vnto long laughter, and without some sounde subiect, deliues no better vnderstanding of himselfe, then of a meere Poole.

Now, because no Court appeareth to be compleat, except it be accompanied with Ladies, let vs admit the case, that our instant described Courtier, bee in such a Court so worthily furnished, & where he may bee become an amorous seruant to some beauty, and to an honest end for (otherwise) he will find his own perill. He must not immediatly make knowne his passions by parlance, with furious gestures and oblationes, as many vnadvised Courtiers haue done. But the best bewayer of his affections, are continence, a sigh, respect, fear, & humble meekenesse, which auails more then a thousand fond words can do; and hee may fo order his carriage, that his eyes may serue as his best messengers, & beare the true Emballie of his heart, to his dearest esteemed.

Afterward, by equal degrees, he may attaine to speak with his Goddesse, when a touch, or kisse of the hand, and such like honest fauours, may cilly be deriued from any Ladie of respect, honourable affected. Wherefore, hee that hath not lost the restraint of reason, will gouerne himselfe wisely, observe fit times and place; and (when neede requirith) will containe due regard verie diligently, although it bee in neuer so sweete a posture, because publick and apparant loue, is a matter of great difficulty to order.

The ends then of a perfect Courtier, such an one as I cannot heere sufficiently describe; is (in mine Opinion) to win by the meanes of those qualities which I haue set downe to him, the fauour and affection of his Prince in such sort: that his seruice may bee alwaies commendable, and to tell him the truth in all things that are conuenient for him; to wit, without feare or danger of displeasing him; & so to order himselfe, that when he knowes his mind inclined to matters inconuenient for him, to bee so hardie as to gainsay them. Seruing him in gentle manner, and gaining fauour by the good parts in him; to the end, that he may preuent all bad intentions in him, and conduct him the pathes of Vertue. And so, our Courtier hauing nothing but goodness in him; accompanied with promptitude of spirit, chearefulness, prouidence, wife-wisdom, knowledge, in learnings, and all other virtuous qualities: hee shall (in all occasions) worthily make appaunt to his Prince, what profite and honour cometh to him and his, by means of Iustice, Liberality, Magnanimity, Affability, Familiarity, and all other Vertues which are conuenable for a good Prince. And contrariwise, what infamy and losse proceedeth from those Vices, which are some enemies to these Vertues. And for a full conclusion, 'as manie times it happeneth, that a Vertuous Courtier maketh the Prince good; so a vicious Courtier maketh his Prince wicked and detestable. Of this mind were all such, as haue medled in Writing of a Courtier; and among others, Balthazar the Castellannus.

CHAP. XXIII.

How a man may giue praise and commendation to himselfe, without impeache or prejudice to others.

Cicero, in the third Booke of his Oratour saith; That no man can honestly commend himselfe, but others will conuenie enuie thereat, and reprove him for it. Concerning this saying, albeit it hath beene allowed by many; yet it is not generally receyued and warranted. For, a man may lawfullie commend himselfe, without attraction of enuie vpon him: especially, if hee be a worthy Soldier, or a man of such merit, as can speake of generous actions, or valiant employments, if they be performed by him, and their Character apparant. Iulius Cæsar may serue for an example, who hath spoken great matters of himselfe, and yet (for al that) no way discommendable therein. His Commentaries which discourse of nothing, but his braue and generous exploits in the Gaulish Warres, were scene and read of all men in his time, yet no way blamed or despised, so farre as we know: but on the contrarie, were highly praised, both in regard of his eloquence, as also his singular expeditions.

But, if he had attributed to himselfe, or made vaunt of more then was performed by him: hee could not haue floode cleare from mallice, yea, in great men, who durst and would haue boldly tolde him, that hee lyed. And all such persons as doe make vaunt of small matters, or of any thing done by the meanes and helpe of others, attributing such actions soly to themselves: they cannot doe it, but with great shame and infamy.

In men of good and worthy respect, it hath bene, and is permitted (euen for the benefit of others) to speake deferuently of themselves, and to their owne advantage. As, if in procuring to be credited, we render a reason of an honest integritie, by some effects of our owne past before; to the end, that hauing the meanes to continue our Vertuous actions, for the profit of manie: we may embrace their praise, in despite of their owne spleene (as we teame it) and constrain them to receiue both profite and pleasure from vs, euen such as would else shun all like occasions.

This was it, which made Themistocles vse these wordes in the Councille of the Athenians, euen when he sawe them fully glutted with his good deedes. O poore people (quoth hee) why doe you suffer your selues to receiue so manie benefits from one and the same person? At another time hee vsed these Words to them. In time of Raine and Tempestes, you make your recourse to me, as vnder the spreading armes of a Tree. And when faire weather comes againe, you seare downe each branch as you passe by.

Homer maketh Nestor to speake his owne Valiant deedes, to encourage Patruels, and nine other Knights, in attempting the Combate (bodie to bodie) against Hector. In like maner, the words of exhortation, action of the hande, and example with the Spurre of emulation; is liuely, and pierceth meruailously; yea, it bringeth (with courage and affection) hope to attaine vnto the height of anie thing, which otherwise woulde appeare impossible.

A man may also commend himselfe before an ingratefull person, to shewe him him his fault, in forgetting former benefits receiued: A stranger, to gaine the good opinion of Inhabitantes, amongst whom he is newly arrived may attribute some honourable Title vnto his present condition, and speake well of himselfe. As it is to be noted in Virgil, that Eneas did, after the Destruction of Troy his native Countrey, wandering by Sea and Lande, to seek a new dwelling, vsing these Wordes (when Enquire was made of him) Sum pius Eneas, that is to say, I am Eneas the Trojan, full of Pietie and Religion, flouing the Goddess his aged feble Father, and his verie young sonne, whom (with great perill) he had saved from the ruine and destruction of his Countrey; and this was not vnfiting in him.

I haue many times bene amazed at Cicero, who Writes (as I haue sayde in the beginning of this Chapter) that a man in praising himselfe, dooth but attract Malice and Enuie on his owne head: And yet notwithstanding, there is an Epistle of his owne, which (in verie vehement affection) he wrote to an Historiographer; wherein hee entreats him, not to be vniuersall of inferring in his Histories of memorable actions, what hee hadde written perticulerlie of himselfe. In mine opinion, there was neither manners nor Modesty, but excessie beyond al reason.

There is nothing more vaine, or further off from equity, then for men to pursue the Quest of their owne praise & renowne. Chrysippus and Diongenes were the first Authors, and firmest of al other, in the contempt of glory; for they saide,

That among al desires, there is none more dangerous, or with greater care to be avoided, then that which cometh to vs from the approbation of others. And all the glorie of the world, is of no such merit; as that a man of valour standing, should so much as stretch forth his finger, only to gaine it. There are manie men in these dayes, that will neuer adventure in the perilles of Warre, or where their duty most commandeth them: if they thought that they should not be scene, or it should not be publickly reported, that they haue performed some perticuler deed of praise, beyonde the honour they pretended to enioy, only because they are couetous of glory and reputation.

If this might be allowed for good, then men neede not to be vertuous, but in publicke; and the operations of the soule (where is the true seat of Vertue) should serue vs to no other end, but to vie them as a rule and order, without any endeavour to attain the knowledge of them in other persons: Vertue then should bee a vertue vaine and fruitles thing, if these deuised her commendation from Glorie. For, what is more casuall and accidental then reputation? To cause that our Actions should be scene and knowne, belongeth to the Hande-worke of Fortune. Oftentimes, the reputation of an action well performed, continueth (it may bee) but three or foure dayes? Other-whiles, so long as hee and his liueth; and yet some after, no more memorie remaineth of either.

Some there are, that will rashlie and willingly fall into daunger, to purchase false Honor; and doing so, he is neuer after so much as talk of: whereby, both he and his renowne dooth periish together. It hath bene mere hazard, that is reported of some Captaines; Cæcilius, Romaines, Persians, French, Germanes, and others; as also of an hundred thousand men, that are dead, in execution of worthy enterprizes, or hindring of them, yet none spoken of, because all depetted on Fortune. Wee reade, that Cæsar was neuer wounded; yet was he present in more then fiftie battalies, and at infinite Citties surprizing. Whereas others, vpon much lesse occasions, haue bene maimed and slaine: and what can be faid of Cæsar here, but that it was his good Fortune?

It hath bene, and yet is an ordinary Vice, that we are more desirous of great then of good Reputation: And it appeareth to be sufficient, that our names run thorow other mens mouths, as receyving there both life and lasting, and must bee there kept out of our owne possession. But Wise men do propole vnto themselves a more iust and certain end, in any important enterprizes, to wit; actions of Vertues, which are so Noble of themselves; as there needs no other praise or recompence to be sought for, but eue their owne worth & value; and Namely, not to seeke for their esteeme, in the vaine of humane iudgements. And yet notwithstanding, this false opinion fer

Women of what degree fouler, may be aduerfified, when they are sought after by lasciuious men; not to make refusal, by saying, they holde their Honour in account: but rather to tell them, that it is their dutie to gouerne themselves chastly.

Lysander, the great Lacedemonian captaine, answered a certaine odde Fellow, who told him; That he would commend him euery where, and counter-checke all his Dispraisers. I haue two Oxen (quoth
he) in the fildes that cannot speake, and yet neverthelesse, I know that which is good for labour, from the other that is not. Heereby he gaue to vnderstand, that vertue stood in no neede of mens Commendations, considering thee carrieth with her selfe good renoune and honor; but such men as do not performe any Vertuous acte, they (indeed) haue need of popular praises.

Alcibiades the Athenian, made a moc-kerie of such, as by sumptuous buildings, Statues, Trophies, and composition of Books, promised vnto themselves an immortal reputation: for he taught them, that the true and only means of compassing praise, was to liue iustly and Religiously. It was also one day told him, that certaine scelerous and bad persons commended him: whereto he replied, If such men praise me, I feare that I haue commissed some foule offence: perswading himselfe, that such kind of people can neuer giue any good reputation.

Erethron the Sophister, hearing that he was ordinarily commended by Alexi-nus, answered; That is a great meruail, for I do nothing but detract and speake evil of him in all places where I come. Declaring by this answer, that he would not haue his renoune to be wronged and baffled by such an one as was worthy of nothing but reprehension. And to speake the truth, this Alexinus was a man of no reckoning, or desirous to haue anie good speeches vsed of him. For, vpon a time, as hee was verie vehemently depraui-ng Stilpo the Megarian, reputed in those times for a great Philosopher, one fode-denly told him, that it was not long since that Stilpo had spoken verie well of him, and with great respect, giuing him extra-ordinarie Commendations: By Isotier (answered Alexinus) I say as this present, that Stilpo is a very braue & excellent man.

Thus yee may discern, what vanity and inconstancy was (in an instant) apparantly discovered in Alexinus.

The Reader may gather by this Discourse, that hee should neuer giue anie praise of himselfe, except hee haue done something that commendeth it selfe, and may thereby incite others to Vertue, although thorough want of Modestie, he shall otherwise bee blameable. In like manner, not to deferre or keepe himselfe from dooing well and Vertuously, when any occasion shall aptly offer it selfe, and where his owne periculer dutie both bindeth and commandeth him, albeit no Witnesses, Beholders, or Scruieners stand by, to Register or set downe his actions in Writing. So banishing from vs all such vanity, wee shall well content our selues with that recompence, which Vertue draweth after her continually;
because it is immortal, and subiect vnto no perishing, as that Renoune is,
which dependeth wholly on mens iudge-ments.

Laine, and Nicholas Pichinine the Italian, men verie singuler and expert in Armes:
who were in the time of King Alphonso, of Arragon and Naples, and of Lewes Maria, Duke of Milaine. These two Captaines were very contrarie and eniuous against each other, because they feuerall-ly pretended, to beare chiefe honour in Armes about his competitor. In which respect, they both declared such courage and dexterity of spirit; as for a long while it was vehemently doubted, whether of them merited most to be preferred. This equall contention so long continued, till after expece of many yeares, and sundry well fought batailles on both sides; Pichinine was Conquered: by meanes whereof, Sforza hauing the right apparantly on his part, got the glorie, was made Duke of Milaine, and was the sole Maister, or (at least) the more fortunate man.

These two Contenders, attained (by diuers meanes) to great esteeme and reputation. Nicholas Pichinine, was so little of bodie, as for that cause only he was called Pichinine. But albeit he was of so little stature, he was contrarie thereto, in greatnesse of heart, and vndantable resolution. He was a man of few Words, and them he vttered but badly too; yet he comprehended in them many great matters. With his Soldiers he was of a chearfull and recreatiue spirit; and bountifull to his friends; but sharpe and furious to his enemies. In warre, he was euermore desireous to come to the point, and alwayes (as occasion gaue way) hee would giue present bataille, wherein he wanted neither wit or counsell, and was prouident in exposing himselfe to perils: euermore hoping ease, and of such a prompt disposition, as many times he would take his enemies vnprouided. Hee much delighted in Watch-Towers, Beacons, and Ambuscadoes, affecting more to vie the seruice of Horle, rather then Foote, in warre; coupling still to haue his followers Valiant, sharpe of Naure, & dreadfull. This Captaine was of so great spirit, that he could no way be daunted, or declare any signe of feare, albeit his enemies were neuer so many in number. He had a singuler grace and dexteritie, in causing his men to march faire, and succeeding them safely: and to conclude, hee won so many excellent Victories in di-uers parts of Italy, that he was renowned for a singuler good Captaine.

Now, as concerning his Competitor, Frances Sforza, his qualities and dispositions were quite contrary to those of Pichinine. He was bigge of body, well proportioned, and strongly limbed, of gentle countenance, a quick stirring eye, bald-headed, a good presence, copious in discourse, and well ordered, a lively spirit, and well aduised, desirous to reach high enterprises, and patient in aduersities. He alwayes auoided the meanes of breaking warre, labouring more to vanquish by besieging, or temporizing, then present fight. He would neuer giue bataille, except hee were enforced thereto, or that he saw himselfe vpon a great aduenture. He would haue his men march in good Order; and by the best meanes to be valiant, and yet gracious: making more account of his Infanterie, then his Compleatell Horsemenn, continually preferring them to the greatest stratagems, because hee placed best trust in them. He was firme and constant in all his enterprizes, quick and wise in beguiling his enemy, and discouering his Fallacies in all Brandaues made vpon him. In Nouell intentions, he would stand vpon his guard; being a man of ready counsell, and a prest spirit in all occasions.

By which Rules and Obseruations (although they were so different from those in the other) he was esteemed as a woorthy Soldier, attaining (by diuers meanes and deuises) to the Dukedom of Milaine, and to be one of the cheefest men in the world. Of these two men, so deferuently famous, manie Moderne Historians

CHAP. XXV.

*That the Lyon naturally feareth the Cocke:
with many other notable matters concerning the Lyon.*

Nothing in this World of allurance.

OD hath not made any creature in this Worlde so strong and powerfull, but there abideth in him some cause of feare or terror, and something is ordained to offend him. In like manner, there is nothing in this world firme and assured, for one thing is destroyed by another; and the same also afterward, ruined by some other thing: so that we know not what may bee warranted, or which thing can bee kept from corrupting.

Naturall loue
or hatred amongst creatures.

Hence it ensueth, that oftentimes we shunne such things as are likely to hurt vs, and fall (some other way) into perils, which we least suspect or imagine. Moreover, among Beastes and other things created, there is a kind of naturall Loue, or Hatred, by a secret and concealed propriety; by meanes whereof, some seeke and pursue, and others shun and auoyde each other. What Beast is more strong then the Lyon, the Prince of Beasts? Not any, and therefore beares he that name, because (according to som Iudgements) the worde Lyon in Greece, signifyeth a (King): Or, according to others (Sight) & that in regard of his perfection in seeing, he is so named. But bee it howeuer, this powerfull Beast which euerie one feareth, so soon as he espieth a Cocke, he fearfully gets him gone: and that by a secret propriety in Nature, euen as the Hare shuns the Hound: and not onelic doth the sight of the Cocke cause this auoydance, but the verie smell, if he feele it far off; or hearing him Crow, it makes him maruailously afraid. Nor doth he shun this creature only, but also the noise of a Chariot or Waggon running on the way: and by no meanes can hee bee compelled to stay, if he see a man bearing any light in his hand. Which seemeth to bee an incredible matter, that a Beast

so furious, should stand in awe or drede of so small a thing: and yet notwithstanding, it hath been noted by experience: Besides, that which is Written by Platarch, in his Booke of the difference betweene Hate and Enuie: Pliny, Saint Ambrose, and Albertus Magnus, who sayeth and maintaineth, that if the Cock be of a White Colour, hee maketh the Lyon stande much more in feare of him. Nor can there any assured Reason bee yielded in this case, but euen (as I formerly saide) that it commeth by a secret propriety in Nature. And yet Lucretius, the Auncient Poet, sayth: That the Cocke and his Feathers haue a certaine propriety or quality, which the Lyon feeling, hee receiueith great terror thereby, and is not able by anie meanes to endure it.

Some others do attribute the cause of this feare, vnto the supream and celestiall Influences, and not vnto the Beastes Sight, Smell, or the matter it selfe. For, (say they) these two Creatures are subiect vnto the Sunne, the Vertue whereof toucheth the Cocke more then the Lyon: and thence it ensueth, that the Lionour and lesse Vertuous in this kinde (albeit the bigger and greater in strength) feareth and obeyeth his superiour. And they say moreover, that in regarde the Cocke is of the Sunnes Nature, hee reioyced and singeth in the morning at the comming and rising of the Sunne. But be it howeuer, we know that the Lyon is more strong, and of greater spirit then all other Beasts; also, extreme in fury & crueltie, against all other of the like Nature. Neuerthelesse, wee haue infinite plain and manifest examples, of his great Mildenesse and Clemencie, whereof it shall not bee amisse to alledge some, according as I finde them credible recorded.

Apion the Greece writeth (according as Aul. Gellius declareth) of a matter seen by himself, & the same is likewise affirmed by Elianus in his Book of Beasts) that in certaine castles, solemnly obserued in the Citie of Rome, it was vled as a custome in the great Theater (where diuers kinds of Salvage and cruell beastes were kept, as Lyons, Leopards, and others) men condemned to death were brought and put in to the end that either they might be denoured of them, or to deserue life by valiant liant defence of themselves, a Spectacle (indeede) verie cruell and inhumaine. It happened vpon a day, that among other offenders thus brought thither, a man named Androdes, seruant to a Romaine Senator, was to take his Fortune, and amongst the other Beasts in the Theater, there was a Lyon of insigne power and greatnesse, as also verie cruel, which had bin brought lately out of Affrica, and the eyes of all the Beholders were fixed on this Lyon. The Beast walking Maiestically about the place, beganne to looke aduisedly vpon Androdes; and seeming to consider, or take some acknowledgement of him; went steppe by step toward him verie gently, albeit, in opinion of all the By-standers, to rent and teare him in peeces. But their expectation was deceiued, for the Lyon bowing downe his head, came curiously to Androdes, who (trembling) awaited nothing else but immediat death; and walking along very lovingly by him, stroked his bodie on the legges and thighes of Androdes, kissing and licking his hands and feete, Leaping familiarly & gently on him, euen as yong Whelpes, and other waiting Dogs are wont to doe, when they haue not seene their Maisters in a long time.

Androdes perceiuing the particular affability of the Lyon vnto himselfe, without any shew of the least kind to any of the other condemned persons: cheered his dismayed Spirits, and made much of the Lyon, smooched his head & hayre with his hand, and looking aduisedly on him, came to former knowledge of him, deliuering manifest signes of ioy and gladness, conceiued by this notice taken. Whereat the people were not a little amazed, & stricken with great astonishment, giuing forth straunge and variable speeches, according as each fancies made coniecture. By meanes whereof, the Emperour caused Androdes to be sent for thence, and being brought instantly before him, desired to vnderstand some reason for this private and familiar acquaintance, and where hee had formerly seene that Lyon. Whereunto he answered, that hauing bene in Affrica, at such time as his Lord was Lieutenant Generall, and great Governour there and of that Province in regard of some wrongs & outrages done to him by his saide Lord, hee was enforced to become a fugitive, and hauing no other place of shelter or safetie, went secretly into a great Forrest, where he tooke vp his lodging in a Cauer or Den. Not long had he staid there, but this Lyon entered in vpon him, and not only abstained from doing any harm but lying downe before him, shewed him one of his pawes, which was wounded and bleeding, euen as if hee would haue desired helpe and remedie of him for his griefe. Androdes dreading no danger by this milde behaviour, tooke vp the Lyons legges, and looking vpon the bleeding wound, found a great sharpe Thorn sticking in the foot, which plucking forth so gently as possibly he could, hee stetched the blood, so that the paine appeared to be indifferently appeased. This beeing done, the Lyon laying his head in the lap of Androdes, slept verie foundly; & from thence-forwards, the Lyon walking abroad daily, would bring the best preyes he could get (by his hunting) to Androdes, who drest his food in the Mid-dayes Sun, because hee had no other fire, and was well contented with such provision.

After hee had liued thus continually with the Lyon, for more then the space of three yeares, he grew to bee wearie of this kind of life. Wherefore vpon a day, when the Lyon was gone abroad about his wonted game; Androdes departed thence, to take such fortune as might befall him. Not farre had he trauielled from the Forrest, but he was met by some, that knew him to be a fugitive seruant: and therefore brought him home to Rome to his Maister, who iudging him worthe of death, as others in the like case were vicially sentenced, sent him with the other offenders, to the publike Theater, there to be torne in peeces by the wilde Beasts, and there the Lyon tooke knowledge of him, as formerly hath bin related. Wherein the Emperour had heard this admyrable History, in his owne gracious Nature, & at the peoples importunity: Androdes was deliuered and set at liberty, so was the Lyon likewise, because hee had extended such fauor to him. Thenceforward, and a long time after, the Lyon daily walked thorow the trees of Rome, in the company of Androdes onely without doing harme to any body, which was the cause, that manie Romaine Citizens affected Androdes greatly, and bestowed diuers liberall giftes on him, rearing him the

H h 3 Lyons

The Lyon wounded, comes to man for remedie.

Plin. lib. 8. Of Mutor the Syracusan, that holp another wounded Lyon.

Lions Physicion, and the Lyon the host to Androsius. Thus the Lyons misfortune, to bee wounded in the foote by a Thorne: instant of Nature taught him, to make his recourfe to man for helpe. And this appeareth to be verie true, because we haue manie more examples to the same effect, alledged by Authors worthy of credit.

Pliny, in his Booke fore-named, speaketh of a Syracusan named Mutor, who being in Syria, mette with a Lyon, that presented himselfe gently before him, & couching downe on the grounde, made signes (as it were of entreaties) to him; but the Syracusan being fearful of his life, fled away from him, with all the hast he could vie. The Lyon still followed, and got againe before him, fawning on him, and licking him verie kindly, till at length the Syracusan perceived the Lyon to bee wounded in the foote: which the Lyon lifting vp vnto him, euen as if hee desired to be caled; Mutor tooke forth a sharpe splinter of Woodde, which (by treading thereon) was runne farre into the Flesh, and so the Lyon was released. This Historie, being painted in a goodly Table by the same Mutor in Syracusa, continued there long after, as a true Testimonie thereof.

Plin. lib. 9. Elpis of Samos, who cured another Lion wounded.

The same Authour speaketh also of another man, named Elpis, borne in Samos, who being disimbarqued in Affrica; espied somewhat neere vnto the Hauens, a Lyon roaring, making towards him, moaning, and complaining verie grievously. The man being fearful, for safetie of his life got vnto a Tree, at the foote whereof, lay the Lyon flat vpon his backe, deliuering manie cries and moanes, lifting vp and shewing his paw all bloody, euen as to moue the man to commiseration.

Elpis looking more aduisedly, with better courage descended from the Tree, and drew a great Thorne out of the Lyons foote. In acknowledgement of which good turne done vnto him, so long as the Shippe remained in that Hauens, the Lyon brought him and his men dayly, great store of Flesh, which hee hadde kild in hunting, in a neere neighbouring Forrest, wherewith they were long time relected.

These Histories, are the better to be credited, by that which (in like manner) happened vnto Saint Hierome, who healed a Lyon, that hadde received the like hurt; in recompence whereof, the Lyon kept companie with Saint Hieromes Assie, that was Laden with Wood, euen till hee brought him home vnto his Hermitage.

Wee read moreover, that Godfrey of Ballen, after hee had Conquered the Holy Land, rode vpon a day on hunting in Iudea, where hee found a Lyon fighting with a Serpent: which Serpent had lo writhed and knit his taile and body about the Lyon, that he was in verie great danger of death. But the Serpent being slaine by Godfrey, the Lyon in remuneration of this benefite, followed and accompanied him daily, without departing from his guard: and euer when he went on Hunting, the Lyon serued in stead of his Grey-hound.

It chaunced afterwards, that Godfrey sayling vpon the Sea; the Lyon was leste behinde him, and his Maister returned not, to take him with him in the Shippe: yet such was the Loue of the Lyon vnto his Maister, that he would needes swim after him in the Water, and was drowned before hee could be succored. Concerning those Lyons of Babylon, that did no harme vnto the Prophet Daniel, and diuers other besides, that (in the times of Dioctesian and Numerian, Emperours of Rome) not so much as touched those Christians, which were nakedly throwne vnto them, for foode and sustenance: I set not them downe as examples of the Naturall loue or qualitie in Lyons, because God had a working power in so high a businesse; and those blessed Patrons proceeded only from his appointment.

Amongest other notable things of Nobleness in this Beast, one Writeth; That he will neuer doe anie hurt to man, except hee be thereto constrained through great necessitie and Hunger. If hee then chaunce to meete a man and a Woman together, hee addresseth himselfe rather vnto the Man, then vnto the Woman; and neuer (or verie seldom) doth hee anie hurt to Children. It appeareth, that the Lyon (in imitation of man) hath some Audacitie in things that concerne honour, with a kinde of feare to derogate from it. For, if hee finde himselfe to bee pursued, and knowe knowes that he is seene: he goes with a slow and tardy pace, to declare no want of courage in his flight. But if he know himselfe to bee in the thickest Woodes, and where no eye can catch hold of him: his flight is then to his vttermost power. It is further saide, that when hee flyeth in this manner, he neuer looketh behinde him, to declare thereby, how much hee contemnieth them that follow.

The Lyon, by meere instinct or motion of nature, is of such great and perfect knowledge, that if any man wound him with a Lance, or any other kind of a capon: let him bee in the company of neuer so many men, yet length of time is no hindrance to him, but hee will selekt him out among them all, and be reuenged on him, if he can. To this purpose, Attianus declareth the History of a young Infante, nourished and brought vp by Iuba, King of Mauritania, who growing further in years, and rising on hunting with the King; wounded a Lyon with his Launce. But the Lyon, recouering his hurt, within some long while after, the King passed by the same Mountaine where the Lyon was wounded, accompanied with the same young Gentleman that did the deeде, and a great many more in the same assembly. The Lyon knowing him that formerly had hurt him, came with great fury and animosity, and entering into the thickest of them, vsed his sight and sauer in such sort, as, if the young Gallant had not bene stronglie defended, the Lyon had torne him ther in pieces.

The same Authour, and sundry others beside doe assure vs, of matter (in my mind) very maruallous, to wit; that if a Lyonelle haue companied with another Lyon: her Male doth take knowledge of it by her smell, and then will beate and punish her very grievously. Likewise, when the Lyon waxeth to old, as he can fight no longer, neyther chafe any other Beastes: his young Lyons, that are more strong and able, doe helpe to provide for him, and killing their feuerall preyes, they bring it to him where he is, to feede thereon. The Authours to approve al these things, are Pliny, Aristotle, Albertus Magnus, and Iulius Solinus; who doe write many other matters, which now I speake not off. Onely I thought it good to set downe these examples, for to confound cruell and vnthankfull men; in shewing them, that among brute and sauage Beasts; clemency is not only found, but also acknowledgement of good turnes receiued.

CHAP. XXVI.

Who was the first Man that tamed the Lyon; And of Lysimachus, a Captaine to great Alexander; what hapned between him and a Lyon.

He powerfull Beast, whereof we haue discoursed in our precedent Chapter, although he is so cruell & furious; yet notwithstanding, he hath bene tamed and made gentle, by diligence and dexterity in Man. The first that euer vndertook that labour, was a Carthaginian by birth, and named Hanno; but the reward he receiued therefore, was banishment from his Countrey. For they said, that this act of taming the Lyon, was a prefiguring of such a Spirit in him; that hee would make himselfe Lord of the countrey. But Plinie saith, that the reason why the Carthaginians banished Hanno, was; because he hauing thus qualified the fierce Lyon; he might the more easily perswade the Citizens, and worke with them what himselfe pleased. He maketh report also of Marke Antonie, Cozin to Octauian; who caused Lyons in such sort to be tamed, and brought to gentleness: as liec would put their neckes into yokes; and make them draw his Chariot where soeuer he rode. We finde that the like was done by Helio-gabalus, of whose prodigalities and lubricities, we shall finde fitter place to discourse. King Iohn of Castile, second of that name; had a Lyon so domesticke and familiar; that at all times when he sat in his Siate, the Lyon would lye downe close at his teete. Meffire Leques de Deffa, Arch Bishop of Seuille, had the like. Lodouicus Calvus writeth, that hee read in a good and approved Authour, of an Ewe, which conceived and eaned a Lyon, a matter very monstrous in Nature. We likewise read of men, that with their hands haue slaine Lyons, as Samphon, Dauid, Hercules, and others.

I remember also, I haue read that Lyfymachus, one of the Capitaines to Alexander the great, slew a Lyon in this manner following. Alexander had then in his company Calisthenes the Philosopher, who was a man free, learned, and wise; and (according to the true quality of such a man) would oftentimes giue him good enstruitions, and reprehensions also, when hee did not as became a King. Whereupon, Alexander growing into displeasure against him, caused him to bee put into a Cage among his Dogs. This was such a shame and ignominy, as so free and vertuous a Spirit as Calisthenes had, was no way able to endure: but rather would voluntarily haue embraced death, and wherein he was holpen by his Scholler Lyfymachus, who grieved not a little, to see his Maister so dishonorably dealt withall. When Alexander was aduertised thereof, in a great rage, he caused him to be throwne before a Lyon, that the Beast furiously might deuour him. But Lyfymachus, being a Man of excellent courage, secretly armed his right arme and hand, afterward, when hee was exposed to the Lyon, and saw him come running (greedily gaping) to deuoure him with a bold and vndaunted Spirit: hee thrust his Arme into his throat, and held him by the root of the tongue so strongly, that albeit the Lyon did him much harm with his pawes, (whereof he was afterward in danger of death) yet would hee not let goe his hold, vntill the Lyon seemed as quite choaked and strangled, by keeping his Arme so long in his throat. Alexander hauing intelligence thereof, desisted from all further anger and rage against him, and commaunded him to be carefully recovered: holding him (thenceforward) for one of his very chiefeft fauourites, yea, and in such account, as (after the death of Alexander) hee was one in the number of his Successors, & a most powerfull King. The Authours that doe aouche the truth hereof, are Juliane, and Plutar. in the life of Demetrius.

CHAP. XXVII.

That the most and greatest part of people in the world, spake at the first but one language onely, which was giuen them by the will of God: And after the destruction of Babel, then it was changed.

Orphyrus, Julian the Apostat Emperour, and other enemies to sacred letters, do confesse with the learned, that from the beginning of the Worldes Creation, as there was but one Man and one Woman: euen so there was likewise but one Language onely, which continued to all the people on Earth, vntill the Deluge; yea, till the destruction of Babel, for seruice of the people which made their abiding thereabout, and (by presumption) had made a Tower, or rather a high mounted caufey, to warrant and defend themselves from another flood, if to be there should any other happen. But me-thinks, that the people of those times were very grossly conceited, in seeking to fortifie themselves by such cunning: because it had bene much better to hinder, then to whet on the anger of God.

There was neuer any man found, or heard of, how great an enemy soeuer he was to the holy Scriptures, that could euer render any reason of the variety of Languages, which are spoken in so many Nations: but onely that which Moses alleadged; to wit, that it was done by the will of God, to the end, that the Earth might be wholly inhabited, as it was before the flood, and the great race of Noah (finding themselves dissemblable in tongues) might therefore disperse themselves abroad. For men desired not the tongues, but the deuotion of tongues deuoted Men, neither was it any intention of men, vsed then sufficiently by necessary knowledge of Nature, and by the inuention of Artes and Sciences; but a punishment of God inflicted on mankind. It is a case very cleare and euident, that Languages are not profitable, but in their diuersity, and and if there were but one onely vied in the World, it would bee meere vanity to know many: for all the first tongues had diuers originals, and depending (in any thing) one vpon another.

Neuerthelesse, after that Warres began to be moued through the world, the people that were brought into subiection, receiued the Language of the Conquerours. And it is a true marke of Soueraignty, to constrain the subdued to change their Language; which the Romains much better executed, then any Prince or people whatsoeuer: whereby they seeme (as yet) to command in the most part of Europe. Likewise, the last King of the Hetrurians, being vanquished, did all that the Romains pleased, but yet he would neuer receiue the Latine toong. And by the like reasons, the Gauls, who spake as the Helvetians (as Glareanus and many other Authours thinke) in the time of Cesar, as by coniecture may bee gathered in the Commentaries of the saide Cesar: did afterward learne the Latine Tongue, because they were conquered by the Romains. After that againe, they spake the language of the Francians, a people of Allemagne, who were mingled among them, by their victories gotten ouer the Romains. In following time, the Goths, Vandals, Hunnes, and other people, that ranged thorow the world, left them also their tongues. In briefe, of all these severall languages, the Gauls (at this instant called the French) builded and framed one perculer tongue, euen that which to this day they enioy. So that all the fore-said tongues, haue had their variant changes, in lesse then fiftene hundred yeares, very neere three times each severall tongue: for at this day, and so henceforward, it will bee impossible to vnderstand the language, that hath bene spoken for the space of foure hundred yeares in France.

This hath happened in the very same manner at Rome, and in Italy, since the time of Cicero and before, for he saith; that no man can vnderstand those Hymnes, which the Priests called Sally, or Saleni sung in their processions, which were composed in Latine; that Language being then there spoken; and very soone after the foundation of Rome: As also the Sibyls Verbes, and many other ancient bookes of those times, that contained very sacred things. But being fearefull to offend the Gods, or to induce any nouelty in Religion, a matter which draweth after it daily too many calamities: the Senate would haue no other Hymnes to be made, nor that any one should mingle other matter among them, or comment or correct those Bookes of the Sibyls.

It is generally knowne, that the ancient Language which Rome vsed first of all, was pure, delicate, and most eloquent Latine: and now at this day, there is hardly any one word thereof truly retained. The Italian tongue now spoken, declareth in plaine apparence, to haue taken originall and encreasing from Strangers, vpon the Empires declination; especially from such as did most harme to Italy it selfe; to wit, the Gauls, Prouincials, Goths, Hunnes, Vandals, and other barbarous people, all voyde of humanity; who instead of Trophies, haue left them nothing but words and names, euen the most excellent that they had. It is not vnknowne to vs also, that the Arabians had planted their Language throughout Asia and Africa; and yet within few yeares, Philip King of Spaine, hath constrained the Moors of Granada, to change both their habite and Language. Pers, commonly tearmed the golden Castile; a very great Prouince, now speaketh no more her naturall Language: for the Spaniard hauing conquered it, hath there planted his Language, although it bee distance thence the space of a thousand and fise hundred leagues; euen as hee hath done the like, in all his other conquered Countries, in those Prouinces tearmed the new World.

In the Isle of Mallta, they were wont to speake the Punick tongue, to wit, that vsed by the Carthaginians, when they would needes hold superiority ouer the Romains: and now at this day, the Greek tongue is spoken there, but very corruptly, mingled also with Scythian. That they had no other Language but the Punick; is easie to be proued, because it is not aboue thirty yeares, since there was found engrauen in olde Marble, this which followeth, written in Greek Letters, and yet nor withstanding, the Language seemeth for to bee Hebrew.

Also, as the Foundation of Castle Anthela was laying, there was found vpon an olde Stone of Marble-lapser, these words engrauen; IEHIEY IEPH-DAIA, and others, which (by the injury of time) were quite defaced. And these latter wordes, were written (for the more part) in Hebrew Letters, and hardly was there found any one, were he Arabe or Iew (who doe surpass all other Nations in the vnderstanding of Languages) that could deliuer the interpretation thereof.

Egypt, from the time of Mercurius Trismegistus (Author of that worthy booke titled Pimander) that was before Abraham and Moset, had a peculiar Language: a thing yet to this day to be seene, by Bookes written in the Egyptian hand, and in many places of Palestine, in the tongue vied in those dayes, which (I say) was in the time of the first Kinges that were named Pharaohs, wherein nothing is to be comprehended, neither read, albeit the Letters are very visible, and not defaced.

Neuerthelesse, at this day they doe not speake that Language, but the Arabian Tongue, without retaining any one word of her ancient tongue:
which is saide to bee graue, briefe, accompanied with goodly tearmes, and proper to comprehend all Sciences, as all the Easterne partes (well neere) are,
and apto discourse of Diuine matters;
much more then the Greeke, full of ostentation and vanity. Which being well perceived by that worthy Ec-clesiasticus, the fore-named Trismegistus:
he desired of GOD and the King, that his Bookes and Writings might not passe through the Grecians hands, neither bee translated or commented by
them.

Here we are to note, that if (at this day) we haue any Bookes of the ancient Egyptians, they came from the Greekes and Iews, who traduced them into their Language, when they kept their Schooles, where they taught all Sciences: witnesseth Socrates, Plato, Democritus, Xenophon, Philistratus, Ambli-chus, Apollonius, and diuers other great personages, who went purposely thither, to be enstructed in good Sciences, whereof great account was made in those times. And let vs not forget Moses, the great Law-giuer, who was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians: as we may gather by the words of Saint Stephen, in the tenth Chapter of the Actes of the Apostles.

In Palestine, and in Ierusalem, they were wont to speake the Syriack tooing now a dayes they speake the Arabian.
Belonius, in his second booke of Singularities, hath noted, that at this day there are spoken twelue feuerall tooings in Ierusalem; and yet notwithstanding, as I haue formerly saide, the Arabian tongue is the most common. Greece hath lost her ancient Language, for in the Cities and Townes, the Primitive tongue is now not spoken: but a new kinde of Language, which the Turkes (since they began to bee Gouvernours there) brought thither with them.
And yet neuerthelesse, in some peculiar places, they speake Greeke verie vsuallie. But by little and little, as the naturall borne Greekes, by reason of their Princes tyranny, became Vagabonds, and went to seeke out other Countries: euen so they (for the more part) hoping there to meet with better entertainment, made themselves Mahumetists, that is to say, they forsooke Christian Religion, and (by the same meanes also) left their Mother tongue, enclining wholly to the Turkish and Arabian; and therefore, before an hundred years can be expired, they wil not speake any more Greeke.

In the Kingdome of Tremissem, otherwise called Telesio, seated on the Coast of Barbarie, in the Mediterranean Sea, they were wont to speake the Phoenician tongue: now adays they doe not retaine any one word thereof, but speake the Morisio Language, because they had beene formerly subdued by the great King Mansor. The cause why this people spake the Phoenician tongue (although they were distant from the Countrey of Phoenicia, verie neere foure hundred Leagues) I wil briefely declare, according as Prosopius setteeth it downe in the Historie of marke thereof, in these wordes. *All this

In these Countries dwell the Gergesites, Iebusites, and others, who when they be held conquered by the Saxons, a people of Germany, they long time kept the Saxon tongue. In following time also, growing frequent with the French, hoping to ouer rule them: they well neere quite changed the Saxon tongue, begetting one Language, consisting partly of French, Danish, Saxon, and Pictish. So that out of all these tongues, they forge one intirely new, and that little about three hundred years since. Which hath beene well obserued by venerable Beke, a great Diuine, and Sir Thomas Moore, sometime Lord Chancellour, and a very learned Gentleman, and both these Men of the English Nation.

The Polanders, Vandales, Bulgarians, maine* or Tentonicke tongue: but at this day, they speake the Sclauonian language, that is to say, Illyrian, witnesseth Ladslaus King of Lithuania, who about theyere med Anne, the Heire of Poland, that could speake no other Language but the Allemaigne, as then in those times it was spoken in Poland: would neere leaue her company, vntill he had learned the Lithuanian tongue, which hee easily attained vnto in eight months space. The Allemaignes also say, that the language which by them is now vied, is not their ancient tongue, but is very diuers, and hath borrowed great store of wordes, from people by whom they haue hitherto beene foyled, or ranaged, or by being employed in Warres, as among the Gaulles in Italy, Spain, Greece, and the Easterne Countries. Neuer should I growe to any conclusion, if I were to set downe those feuerall people, that haue changed their Language since the Deluge: or prouue, that there is not any Nation at this day, which speaketh the Language of our first Father Adam and Nob. All haue changed, and yet wil change, so long as the World endureth; for such is the Nature of vicissitude, in things of this world.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of Caruing or Caruing, and of Painting: which of them is most ancient and excellent.

IN these times I haue heard of very many different opinions, concerning these two Arts of Statuary of Stone-cutting, and Painting; to wit, which of them is most commendable; and best worthy of praise. Very pertinent reasons are alledged both for the one and other, for in the Statue or Sculpture, there is discerned an artificiall imitation of Nature, representing therein the members wholly round, well formed, and fully measured, euen as if Nature herselfe had shaped them, and much better imitated then in a Table, where we but behold the superficies and colours, which beguile the eye. For the substance is much neerer to truth, then the resemblances. Beside, Sculpture or engraving, is more difficult, because if a fault be therein committed, very hardly can bee amended: in regard, that the Marble or other matter is not to bee pieced or patched, but another figure must of necessity be made. Which falleth not out in painting, for it may be altered a thousand times, adding thereto, or diminishing, by daily amending. Statues were (in elder times, & yet are to this day) esteemed sacred things, to beautifie Temples or publike places, for the commemoration of famous persons; and such actions of theirs as were heroicall: especially such as we see in the Porches of Temples, and diuers within; which are placed to no other end, but for a remembrance of holy Men or women, that performed many pious deedes, and stood for plantation of the Faith. And for the great respect then made of them, it was permitted (by Emperiall, Edictes) to Offenders, and Slaves badly vsed by their Maisters; to haue their enfranchisement, and ease from further persecutions, by holding fast vpon some of those Statues, till audience might bee graunted to their oppressions.

Such as hold Painting to be more excellent, make their allegations; that thereby is imitated much more truly, the very Nature of the thing so represented; then it can be by the Statue. And that it must needs be so, they produce (for example) that which is written by Plinie, concerning one Zenxis, a Painter of Heraclia, who presented a Table, wherein hee had painted bunches of Grapes so naturally: that Sparrowes flying by it, strowed to rest on them, and pecked at them, as taking them to be true Grapes indeede, so that his workmanship was reputed to be both famous and singular. At another time, the same Zenxis painted a young Man in a Table, carrying like bunches of Raisine Grapes in a Dish, which were so liuely made: as the Birds were thereby againe deceived, the Birds likewise descending from the ayre, to peck at them as if they had beene very Raisins, without any feare at all of the young man.

They say moreover, that Parbhastus, a Painter likewise, and an emulator of the forsaide Zenxis, painting a Partridge vpon a Colonne in Rhodes, drew it so naturally according to life: that (in the iudgment of euery beholder) it seemed to be aloue indeed. Nay more, the perfection of painting this Boile was such, and so complete, that bringing other Partridges before it (such as now adaires are kept in Cages:) they would call vnto it, flutter their Wings before it, and vse their kinde of singing, taking it for a liuely Bird indeede. They yet goe further, saying, that Apelles painted a Horse according to life, and other Painters making prooue in their skill of the like; would needes vse tryall of the most ablest workmanship. Wherevpon, it was thought fit to bring liuing Horses before him, for better approbation of the experiment, and being brought before those figures painted by the other Painters; they stood still, without any shew of account or motion. But when that which Apelles drew was presented before them; they began to stirre, tread, and winnow, which they did not at the sight of any of the other: whereby, the greatest honour and advantage in Art, was adiu'dged to Apelles, and he reputed to bee the most excellent Painter.

Now to speake mine opinion here-in, I say, that (for all these Fables, lesse seeming true, then Pliny writes them) Painting cannot be accounted to be the more excellent Art: For all Creatures that fly in the Ayre, or feede on the earth, or liue in the Water, do nourish themselves, and are more moued by the sense of smelling, then by sight. To approoue the truth hereof: let any man paint a Rat, and draw it neuer so artificially according to life: then let it bee presented before a Cat, to try if she wil stirre, or offer to take it. Let any man also set a Table before Fowles, with painted Capons, Hennes, Cockes, Pigeons, or such like; let there be likewise painted in the Table, Barly, Oates, or any other Corne fit for them to feede on; and try if they moue or cometo touch it. Let any Painter portraite a Ginne or Snare, with either a Goose, Lambe, or any other prey surprised in the Snare, counterfeited by Art most naturally; and then make triall, if a Wolfe or Foxe wil offer to lay holde on it, which indeede they would doe, if they had life.

In like manner; let there be painted in a Table a goodly Mare, formed with all

all features nearest to life, then bring a Stallion before it, and try if he wil offer to couer her. Let there be also in the same Table a goodly heide, with diuers Horses feeding at pasture; and try if he wil beare them company. Shew to any Horse painted Proudere, and try if he wil whinnow to haue it: which naturally he wil do, if he be in his Stable, although there be none at all offered to his sight. By these Allegations I would plainly shew, that Creatures (of these kinds) do not so much moue themselves by sight, as by sense of smelling; and that all which Pliny hath saide of these Paintings, are meere fables, for these Creatures haue no knowledge of Paintings.

If serueth to no purpose, to say, that the Painters of these daies, are not so sufficient, neither do make such exquisite workes, as those in former times did. I answer, that there are men as excellent euery way, & that wil not giue ground in any iot, to the very best before them. For, there are yet to be seene in these daies, both Paintings and Statues of ancient Grecians, Romaines, Egyptians, and other Leuantines; which come nothing nere (by much) in perfection, to things done by Painters and Statuaries of our time. I dare make them my Iudges, who, being curious in the sight of such things, and trauielling thorow lower Germany; haue visited the Chambers and cabinets of many famous houses, as also in France and Italy, and what else is to be seene in Churches.

There is another History alleadged, borrowed likewise out of the same Plinies shop, that Parbhastus deceived Zenxis by a Table, whereon nothing else was painted but a Curtaine, and it being presented to Zenxis, to yeeld his iudgement of the workmanship; he offered to draw the Curtaine, to behold what was figured vnder it. I answer, that this History, how true soeuer it be, & whether it so hapned or no, may make painting to bee much more commendable, then all the other Fables formerly deliuered from Pliny. For as man is the least of all creatures, in exquisite perfection of sense, and that often deceiveth himselfe, in the senses of sight, touching, tast, and smell; yea, euen in iudgement, especially when he is detained by a preception, or passion of Spirit; and then apprehendeth one thing, when hee seeth another: might it then fall out with Zenxis, in regard of the thing, to beare to Parbhastus.

Haueing considered these fables alleadged by Pliny, which serue only for the praise of Painting; I will now shew down some reasons of vniuersall, whereby I wil approue Painting, beyond Caruing or Grauing. In Statues or Carued Figures, there are many things defective, which cannot faile in Painting, and principally day-light and shadow; because both yeildeth a different light, from that which Marble or Stone affordeth, and that the Painter imitatively, with clearest or obscurely, more or lesse, according as the thing requireth, which the Image-maker cannot performe. And yet notwithstanding, though painting doth not make the Figure round: yet it sheweth the muscles and members in rounded shape, so that they are discerned, as ioyned to those parts which cannot be seene, & by such apt meanes; as it is easily knowne, that the Painter vnderstands and perfectly knowes them. And herein is required another artifice more great, in forming the members that lengthen or shorten, according to the proportion of sight, by reason of perspective; which by the power of lines and measure of colours, day-light and shadowes, doe shew in their superfluous on a plainewall, nere or farre off, more or lesse, as himselfe pleaseth.

Nor is the true imitation of naturall colours, a matter of such small moment as some do imagine; in counterfeiting flesh, shape of Garments, and all other things requiring colours. And yet the Caruer cannot doe this; much lesse expresse and represent the gracious sight of the eye, black, green, or otherwise, with the splendour of amorous beames, or in Colour full of reuenge. The Caruer also knowes not how to discover the beames of the Sunnes, Lightning, Thunders, and other such like things; as faire Lockes of Haire, nor the goodly troopes of armed forces, nor a darksome night; nor a tempest on the Sea; nor a flash of Lightning, nor stormie Windes, nor the be-fiedging of a City; nor the Sunns rising in the morning; or Aurora her selfe, (bringing bright day) in her colours like Roses, dis-¹⁰sparkled with radiances of gold and purple. Briefely, he cannot represent Heauen, Earth, Seas, Mountaines, Fortresses, Fields, Gardens, Rivers, Cities, or Houses, all which the Painter can perfectly shew. It is also well known, that if a Painter apply his colours vpon a carded Statue, whatsoeuer it be; it will appeare so much the more commendable. In this respect, me thinks that painting is a more Noble Science, and of much greater artifice, then Caruing or Grauing, and I think that our ancients held it in great reputation, & as highly as other things: albeit, both these Arts do seeme to issue out of one & the same fountaine, because that in both the one and other; Geometry is very requisite, for the vnderstanding of perspective. This Science appeares to me, not to be mechanicall, because it is very conue-²⁰nable, & may well be vied by any Gentleman. I remember I haue read, that our ancient predecessours, especially throughout all Greece, would haue Noble mens children enstruckt in schools in the art of painting, as a Science most honest, and very necessary. It was admitted in the first degree of the liberal Arts, and soone after defended by publicke Edict, that it should not be taught to Slaues or Seruants.

Among the Romaines, Painting was held in great honor, and thence it deriued a most Noble fir-name, euen from the House of the Fabij; for the first Fabius was fir-named the Painter, because he was (indeede) a very excellent Painter. And so much was he addicted to painting, that hauing painted the wals of Templum Salutis; he placed there his owne name; as thinking, that although he was deriued of a noble house, honored with many Titles, Consulships, triumphes, and other dignities; albeit he was learned, well read in the lawes, & numbred amongst the best Orators; yet he was of the mind, that hereby he might (neuertheless) increase his renowne, by such an especiall splendour and ornament, and lefit it to memory, that he was a Painter.

Moreouer, many other are recorded of noble houses, that haue bin famous in this art, in which, beside the Nobility

& Dignity thereof, many commodities are thence deriued. Especially in the time of wars, for designing and portraing Countries, situations of Riues, Bridges, Castles, Fortes, and such like things: which thus may be described to others, euen as if they were exactlie imprinted in memory, which otherwise were a difficult thing to do. I conclude then by this discourse, that the Art of sculpture or caruing, is much inferiour to painting: yea, and it will be of much longer continuance, if it bee kept in a dry place, and wel sheltered from winds and raine, and the longer it lasteth, so much the more pleasing it is to behold.

CHAP. XXIX.

Against such aged persons as think nothing to be well done, but what was performed by themselves in their youth; blaming extremely the present times, and what is now done, in respect of the former; And what is the cause thereof.

³⁰ HAuing many times considered, (and not without great admiration) whence such an error ensueth, which verily may be beleueed, to be proper and naturall to aged people; because it is commonly noted in them, that they doe wholly (as it were) commend times past, condemning the present, and blaming our maners, actions, & whatsoever else they themselves did not in their younger daies; Affirming also, that all good customes, behavior of life, all vertue, and all things grow worke and worke: Truly, it seemeth to me a matter farre off from reason; nay more, very matuious, that mature and ripe age should wander so strangely. For long experience begetteth custome, & (in sollemne allowance) presumeth to iudge perfectly of men. And yet herein their iudgments were so much corrupted, as they neuer perceived, how the world began daily to impair, and that the Fathers were better then their children; a very long time remaining, to arise at the vttermost degree of wickednes, times still declining from better to worke. And yet notwithstanding all this, we behold it daily, a vice proper and Aged people do oftentimes loose both reason and iudgement.

Our fore-fathers were more happy then their children

A reason for the inconueniencies before alledged.

The cause of our generall instant discontentment.

and peculiar to age, euen as it hath bin in former daies; so to continue still among vs liuing. Which hath bene knowne and made manifest by the writings of many very ancient Authours, and especially by the Comicks, who (much better then any other) expressed the true Image of humane life. Therefore I conceiue, that aged people hold this false opinion, because our yeares poasting away so swiftly, as they carry hence many other commodities; so (among others) they rob vs of our blood, and a great part of our vitall Spirits. In regard wherof, our complexion changeth it selfe, and the bodies Organes become feeble, that should exercise the vertues of the Soule.

And this is the cause, that in these our instant daies, the delicate and sweet floures of contentment doe fall from our heartes, as Leaues doe from the Trees in Autumne, and, in stead of clear and free thoughts; obscure, troubled, melancholly, and sad conceits get entrance, accompanied with a thousand calamities. So that, not only the Body, but the Spirit also becometh sick, which retaineth not any iot of our passed Spirits, except a long remembrance, and Image of that acceptable time of youth: which wee perswading our selues to finde againe, it appeareth then to vs, that Heauen, Earth, and all things else are glad thereof, and do smile at them (verily) in our sight; resolving our thoughts, that in them (as in a faire and goodly Garden) the sweet Spring time of ioyfulness still flourisheth. In which respect, perhaps it would proue profitable, when (already) in a cold and backward season, the Sunne of our life beginneth to decline to wardes the West, in despoiling vs of our pleasures: that we would also (there-with) loose the remembrance of them, and finde (as Themistocles said) A Science en-⁴⁰franchising how to forget them. Because the senses of our body are so fallacious; that oftentimes themselves do beguile the iudgement of the Spirit.

And therefore it seemeth to me, that aged people are of their condition, who setting forth from any Port or Haue, doe still fixe their eyes vpon the Land: whereby they conceit, that the Shippe moueth not, but that the land & houles are in motion, which neuertheless is quite contrary. For the Haue, as all the times, and former or present pleasures, continue still in their wonted estate, and we (with the Ship of mortality) saile away; we poail on one alter another, throw this impetuous Sea, that deuoureth all things. Nor are we euer permitted to take landing againe; but being continually tossed by contrary winds, our vessell runs and breaks it selfe againe: it one Rocke or other.

The Spirit (then) of a man waxing old, a subiect contrary to all kind of pleasures; it cannot apprehend any taste of them. And, as all sorts of Wines, although they be neuer so good, seeme bitter to such as are troubled with a Fetter, in regard that the taste is changed, only by the meanes of corrupted humors: euen so in aged people, by reason of their indisposition (albeit there is no defect in desire) all pleasures seeme vn-⁵⁰sauiory, cold, and far differing from such as they remember once to haue effiaed, and yet those pleasures (in themselves) are the very same which they were wont to be. And because they finde themselves to be depriv'd of those pleasures; they complaine and blame the prettime, as if it were naught, neuer considering, that this mutation proceedeth from themselves, and not from the time.

On the contrary, when they sit down, & call to memory their passed delights; they then likewise remember the time wherein they enioyed them; and (in that respect) repue them to be good, because it appeared then, and so do they, that they brought a sweeter relish with them, which they (yet) remember to haue felt when they had them. For, in effect, our thoughts doe harshly condemne all things, that haue bin companions with our displeasures; and loue at them that haue suted with their likings. In which regard, it happens sometime, that wee see an ambitious Fellow, take great delight to behold a Window, although it be shut against him: yet hee conceiue a liking thereof, because (in former time) he had the fauour there to gaze on his Lady, or loues Mistress. In like manner, to see a Jewell, a Letter, a Garden, or any other thing whatsoever; that seemeth (as yet) to be a testimony, to former effected pleasures: where.

The Spirit growing aged, hath such pleasures.

Another excellent comparison.

No defect in the time, but in our selues.

Pleasures appere to be good, according as we taste them.

Comparisons not vnituing the present punishment.

whereas on the contrary, a goodly, faire, and rich adorned Chamber, will appeare hauefull to him, that hath been imprisoned therein, or that there hath suffered any dislike.

I haue knowne some, who (by no means) would drinke in a Cup that resembled some other Cup, wherein (being sick) they receiued a medicine. For, as the window, or the Ring, or the Letter, representeth to the one party, a sweete remembrance, which to him is the more acceptable, by how much it appeareth still a pertaker of his former enioied pleasure: euen such is the other parties conceit, that the Chamber, or the Cup, are still fresh Ensignes of his imprisonment, or sicknesse. I think, that for the very same reason men (in years) are moued to commend passed times, and throw blamefull aspersions on the present. By means whereof, in speaking of Varres, Courts of Iustice, or those belonging to Princes, & such like, they asseme: that those in their time, and wherof they do yet bear remembrance; were much more excellent, and filled with more singuler men, than they are which at this instant they daily behold.

So soone as such cases doe come in question, they presently begin to exalt infinitely, the people that liued in their former times, and declare, that (in those elder daies) it could not bee found, but very rarely, that a man committed a murder; that then were any combats or fights, ambushes or treacheries: but an assured honesty and faithfulness, an amiable and loyall iustnesse among al Men. That in Courts (in those times) reigned so many good manners, & such a perfect honesty: that all Courtiers were then religious, and Saintes; that they would not take part with any man, who had offered a bad word to another, or had vsed any signe of dishonour to a Woman of Honour.

On the contrary, they say, that now in these daies, they behold all things to bee quite opposite to the former, and that not onely among Courtiers, men of warre, and young people, brotherly affection is lost, and all laudable manner of living: but also in Courts and Cities, now raigneth nothing but enuies, euill will, wicked manners, and a life most dissolute, abounding in all kinds of vices. That Women are lasciuious, haue lost all shame, and men (for the more part) are become effeminate. Moreover, they blazon their garments to be dishonest, and ouer pompous. In breefe, they reprehend a number of things, among which (truely) there are some that wel deserue reprehension, because it cannot be denied; but that there are (among vs) many bad and wicked men, by whose means, this present world must needs be fuller of errors, then that which these good people so highly commend.

It appeareth to me, that they doe ill discern the cause of this difference, and declare themselves to be meere fooles: in that they would now haue the world to be wholly good, without any euill remaining in it, which is a matter vtterly impossible. For, euill being contrarie to goodnesse, and goodnesse to euill: it appeareth euen necessary (as it were) that by a certaine kinde of repugnance and contrariety; yea, by a manner of counterpoise; the one should sustaine and strengthen the other. In such sort, that the one failing, or encreasing; the other likewise should encrease, or run to ruine, because there is no contrarie, without another.

Who doth not know, that no Iustice could be found in the world, if there were not grieuances, iniuries, & oppressions? No magnanimity, if there were not pusillanimity? No continence, if there were not incontinency? No health, if sicknesse had not his course? No truth, if there were not lying & falshood? Nor any felicity or happinesse, if there were not fals and misfortunes? For this cause Socrates said well with Plato, He maintained very much, that Elope had not made a fable, feigning therein, why God did not vniue pleasure and griefe together, tying them to such extremities, as the beginning of the one might be the ending of the other. For we doe euidentlie behold, that no pleasure would at any time be acceptable, if sorrow had not gone before it.

What is he that could discern, how precious quiet rest and repose is, if first he haue not felt the pain of traualle and wearinesse? Who could tell, what the benefit is of eating, drinking, and sleeping, if first he had not endured hunger, thirst, and watchings? Let mee tell yee then,

Some faults that merite reprehension.

An answer made to these complaints.

No contrary, but it hath another.

A reason for the present annoyances.

The saying of Socrates and Plato.

The goodnes of all things is approoued by the harme of their contraries.

then, that passions and diseases are giuen to men by nature, not principally to make them subiect thereto, for it would seeme very inconuenient, that the who is the Mother of all, should (by her counsell and wisdom) send vs many harms: But nature hauing made health, pleasure, and other good things: sends after them sicknesse, displeasure, and other annoyances. For all vertues being first graunted to the world, by the free gift and fauour of Nature: afterward immediately, all vices, by a contrary concatenation or combination, follow as their companions or attendants. So that the one encreasing, or decaying; she is compelled to grant (in this manner) that the other also shall encrease, or grow to decay lance.

Wherefore, when old men doe extol the passed times, affirming, that no men were then so vicious, as now they are in these daies: they may also alledge their ignorance, whether then such virtuous men were to be found, as many are well approoued to bee at this day. Nor is there any matter of maruaile heerein, because there is no euill so great; as that which springeth from the seede of corrupted goodnes. And for this cause, Nature producing now great store of Spirits, of much better temper then before they were, as such who of themselves haue turned to goodnesse: hath performed a better workmanship, then in those times (hee did) wherof they talke so much, euen as they that turne to euill, doe so much the worse. We may not then say, that such as cease to doe euill (because they know it not) do in this case deserue any praise: for although they haue sildome committed any harme, yet (notwithstanding) they would haue done much more if they could.

Now, that the Spirits of those precedent times in general, were much inferior to them lately or now liuing: may sufficiently be knowne, by all matters obserued of them: as well in learning, as in Painting, Statues, Buildings, and in all other things. And yet Men of yeares, doe reprove and blame many things in vs, which are not (of themselves) eyther good or euill, onely because that they (in those daies) did them not. They say, it is not fit for a young man, to ride on his Foot-cloth Naggethorow the Citie, but especially not on a Mule; or to wear any skinnies of Fures in Winter; or a long Gown in the Spring time; or any bonnet; vnlesse the Man haue attained to the age of eighteen years. And other such like things, wherein (truely) they greatly discontent themselves, because that such Customes (beside the commodity and benefit they afford) haue been brought in by vs, and are as pleasing now to euery one, as then men delighted to goe in Cascookes, or Jackets, with open shoes; and close Breeches. And for a man to shew himselfe Gallant, he must carry a Hawke on his fist all day to no purpose; daunce, without holding his Mistress by the hand, and vse many other fashions, which were then much esteemed; but now doe appeare to bee grosse and vnbesitting. These are most of their foundest reasons, why the customes of these times should not bee obserued; but remaine still to the cunnies of aged folke, extolling themselves, by saying: Twenty yeares and more were past with mee, and yet I slept with my Mother and Sisters, and knew not (in long time after) what a Woman was. But now, Boyes, almost as soone as they be borne, know more naughtinesse, then the tawlest Men could reach vnto in those daies. When they vtter these speeches, they doe not perceiue, how strongly they confirme, that the very Children of our time, haue much more spirit, then aged Men had in those daies. And that was well noted by Horace the Poet, in his time, speaking of our ancients, to this effect: They commend what soeuer themselves did in their youth; And will haue young people to forme their liues by their Age. But I purpose to shew more particularly in the following Chapter, the grossenesse of people in those former times, and the subtilty of braue Spirits in young men of these daies.

The inuolucres of aged people against young.

Ancient treachery in a Gallant.

Objections vnto the aged.

CHAP. XXX:

A comparison betwene the Buildings, Feasles, Garments of Men and Women, Armes, and manner of making warre, in the daies of our fore-fathers, and those that are used in these our times.

Our predecessors forme of building, very groffe & rude

We will begin, without v-
sing any other preamble, with those Buildings,
which were made in the
daies of our fore-fathers;
consisting of nothing but very chicke walls, bad Windows, continually beaten with winds and stormes; chambers subiected one to another; the vaults or houfes of Office, euer more in the most eminent places, of the House, which ought to bemuch further off, both from the nose & eyes; imitating nature, who hath placed those partes in our bodies, through which our vncleanness is to be auoyded, farre enough off from the eyes and Nose. Of this fashion, and in such manner of building, it is no long time since, that the more part of Masons and Worke-men shapd Castles, being places of pleasure, and Country houfes of pleasure, in no other kinde of constructure. But within an hundred yeres, or there about, a great part of them are demolished: and (in stead of them) others erected; after our Mo-desne manner, much more commodious, and of lesse cost, in regard of the time.

The Feasts & Banquets of
our elders.

The first fer-
uice.

The second
seruice.

Some what let vs say, concerning their Feasts and Banquets, and obserue in what manner they were ordered. The meate serued into the Table, was alwayes in great Chargers, filled with Pease and Bacon; Gammons of Bacon; huge Neats tongues salted; great pieces of Beefe, boyled Poultry, with portage about them; boyled Mutton, Veale, & other grosse food, common (almost) in eury ordinary family; and they gorged in these Victuals, so long as they could crum any more into their bellies. Afterward, they brought in other meats, answerable to the former, but roasted and larded (oftentimes) with vnfaury lard,

but it would serue for Pigs and Hares.
After this second seruice had stood as while on the Table, well-neere to no effect: then came in more dainy meats of Fowles; as Mallards, wilde Duckes, Ringdowes, young Pigeons, Partridges, woodcocks, Quales, Pheasants, wood-hennes, Plouers, Turtles, and others of like kinde: which are carried away (like the second seruice) almost neuertoucht, for they (good men) had filled their stomackes with the first course meates, feeding hungrily on them, and drinking sower wines, such as Summer marreth, so they left the best and daintiest meats indeede, for their Varlets and bafe Ser-uants to feede on. Was not this a verie lourdery and blockishnesse, to vfe their meates in this grosse manner? The Masters eate nothing but the very heauieft meates of all, and their Knaues did feede on the lightest, most exquisite, and best for digestion. Let it then be helde no matter of maruaile, if those men had grosse and heauy Spirits, because, according to the opinion of Plato: Our manners do follow the temperature and quality of the Chylus, or white iuyce, of the digested meates which we vse to eate.

But in these daies, this manner of furnishing the Table at Feasles and meetings, is no more vfed: for in well go-uerned houfes, they serue in both boyld and roasted meates, grosse and delicate together, that each man may eat according to his appetite, or what he best li-keth vpon the boord. For (vnder submission to better iudgement) I thinke it no way fitting, that the seruant should feed on the finest, and his Maister on the coarsest; the Knaue serued like a Lord, and his commander like a Buffone.

Proceed we now to mens garments.
First, the head, hauing bush naturall (as they terme it) a huge deale of haire on it; must haue as big a Bonnet to couer it, which (in those daies) were cald Span-nish Bonnets, hauing a turning vp behind, double fringed with red, and this turning vp contained halfe an Elle of woollen-cloth. I haue seene one of the in Paris, that weighed foure pound and sixe ounces. Another fashion they had, more honest and lighter, teamed the Crosse-Bow-Cap; yet with seauen or eight Elles of Riband about it: This ponderous wearing (in my minde) did

Their Doublets (I meane for the better sort of men) were of leather or coultre Linnen Cloath behind; and before, of Woold, or Serge of Arras, which ser-ued halfe the Breast, and so on the armes likewise; yet some (from the Elbowe to the Wrists) vfed to weare Velvet or Satin.
This kinde of Doublet, the Frenchmen teamed Nichil-au-dos, Nothing Be-hinde, and it was cut according vnto the fashion of Weomens Gownes nowe adayes, that shewes their Breast naked.
The Weomen also in those dayes, had their plaited Collors, wrought with silk, either Blacke or Red, and they were fastened behinde the necke and Shoulders with Silke-Laces: so that they hidde and kept close that which was fairest, & wold haue made them most gracefull. Mens Hose or Breeches, answered in length to their short skirted Doublets, being made close to their limbes, wherein they had no meanes for Pockets. But in stead thereof, they hadde a large and ample God-piece, which came vpp with two wings, and so were fastned to eyther side with two Pointes. In this wide room, they had Linnen bagges, tied with like Pointes to the inside, betwene the shirt and God-piece. This serued as the receipt for Purse, Hand-kerchers, Apples, Plummes, Peares, Orenge, and other fruits. But did it not seeme verie inci-uill, that sitting at the Table, hee should make a present of such, preferud for som-time: in so sweet a Coffer, euen as now adaies, some (as mannerly) vfe the like out of their Pockets? As for papers, Letters, and such like, which they ordinarie receiued, they were to put them in their Hat-bandes, or weare them at their Gir-des, like Gloues: wher hung also a great Pouch, made fast with a Ring and Locke of iron, weighing three or foure pound waight, and oftentimes no money at all in it. Surely, in my poore opinion, the fashion of Pockets made in the Doublet Sleeue, or in the hose, is much more honest and commendable.

Leauing their high and vnhandfom Shooes, let vs speake a litle of weomens habits then vfed wherein I meane not to be tedious. The Attire on the Head, was of great broad Wollen Cloath, of Red or Violet colour, set out with stickes of VV oode, and made in the forme of a Suger-loafe. Her Gowne was verie large and plaited; and the Sleeues thereof so wide, that a Lambe might easilie leape into them. A Traiue also was fastned to this Gowne, which commonly containd six pages in length. At assemblies and meetings of VVomen, as the rest, so did these let fall her Traiue, dragging it after her in Halles, Churches, perhaps ouer Dunghills, and other vnfaury filthines.

Preparing to Daunce, or some other delight, it was taken vpp againe, though it ser-ued to no purpose; and then made fast behind; either with a Trach-hooke of Siluer, or a Button of Golde, or of Iuorie.
This Garment was not made without great charge, and was verie painfull also to her that did weare it. For I haue heard aged Women (of very honorable houses, that liued in those times; and vfed the same habite) credibly report; that they haue knowne and seene some weomen, who were meeterly afflicted vnder such long traind Gownes.

Moreouer, were it Winter or Summer, in regard of honour, they also were furred with Ermins, Martines, or Sables.
I forbear to speake of their heauie Varddigalles, worn vnder those long & wa-gthy Gownes; the Fore-part whereof, was couered with Silke, or Cloth of gold or Silver, & all the rest was coultre Ram or Canvas. At Night, when they haue gone to bed, their bellies and thighs haue beene greuously chafed and staid, by reason of so heauie a waight; and extremity of heate.

As for the defencive Armes then v-fed, which was Harnesse; were they not (beyond comparison) more masie and heauie, then those that now adayes wee warre withall? Neuertheless, they were commonly pierced with Arrows, Darts, and Quarries of Crosse-bowes, which in those times were their best weapons. But in these daies, they are so well made and yet not (by three partes) so waigthy; that they will resist a Musket shotte. The like is to be vnderstood of their Swords, and other Weapons of Defence: for in one word of their vse, there was more stiffe, then now we haue in three; & yet they will performe as much, nay more, then their then did.

It hapned manie times, that in their Sword-fight, the one man stepping aside

the verie waight of the Swords fall, hath snot it into the ground, so that he could not easily recover it, but stoode vnto the mercy of his enemy. If we traueleye tho-row some partes, in auncient Castles or Fortresses, or Armories of long continued Cities; some of these vnwealdie weapons are daily to be seene.

They neuer made Warre but foure months in the year; or fixe at the most:
after which time, both the one side and other withdrew themselves till Winter was past and gone. This course is quite contrarie vnto that which is to be done in the time of Warre: For, in Winter is the fittest season, and then doe our best warlike spirits performe the best exploits of Warre. Then are surprisals ap-pete, in regard of long Nights, when Riuers and Ditches (being filled with Waters) are strongly frozen. Then dooth a good Capitaine take occasion, to make his attempt vpon some place, either to surprize it by scaling, or otherwise. For,
then the Spies, Sentinelles, and Watch, are more subiect to sleepe, then at other times. And so much the rather, because (usually) that mens Bellies are better fed in this season; then other-whiles they are, in regard of the plentie of Victuals, which makes the bodie sleepeie and slothfull. Likewise, by the fauour of Long Nights, a great deale of Ground is easily ridden, and the Enemy set vpon, when himselfe least surmizeth it, without much effusion of bloode, with lesse Companie of Men, and weakest Charges.

In those Elder dayes, they thought it a great offence and dishonor, to surprize an Enemy vnprouided: but he must haue a day assigned him, when hee pleased to accept the Battaille: and this was the reason, why war was continued so long a time.
But we see quite contrarie, that Warre now commeth sooner to an end, by compelling the Enemy to come to fight, and providing politticke Ambuscadoes for him: in imitation of Hunters & Woodmen, when they chase wilde and vnruely Beasts, that will neuer yeild, except they be enforced thereto. For if they escape, they will continually retume to their first bad Nature.

It was a Custome helde in those former Battailles, and verie often obserued, that when men were wearie with Fighting (being oppressed with the heauie load of troublesome Harneisse, Goates of Maile and Brigandines; where-with their bodies were covered, besides their maise and waightie Swords) they should go repose themselves to take breath, yea, (many times) to eate and drink, and then retume to the fight again. As the French men did on the day of battell, before the City of Alexandria, about the year one thousand three hundred ninety one, whiche day they then lost, with Count John John d'Armignac their chiefe.

In those times, battails continued the space of a day; and if they were not then concluded, they went to it againe the next morning, to know who then should be Superior. This was more for honor many times, then any profit ensuing thereby, and to haue Songs afterwards made of their sloth and negligence. But in these dayes, within two or three houres (commonly) the battell is won or lost, as I my self haue obserued in five fought battels, where I stood not as an ydle spectator: & thelike haue I heard in other places, performed by the best and most approued Captaines of these times.

What shall wee say of their Duello, Combate, or single fight, betweene man and man? It was commonly performed with Swords, tearmed two-hand swor-des, without standing vpon anie warrable Guard; but both parts meeting resoluedly on foote; the one receyuing a stroke, while his Enemy stood waiting for another, without any counterte. For, euen like two Smiths beating vpon an Anuile, euen such was their behaviour, smiting alternatiuely, vsing then nothing but cut and slash, without any foine or thrust.

In our daies, this kinde of fight endu-reth but a moment of time, for nothing is vsed but Estocadoes: so that within three or foure thrusts, the deadly combat is concluded. For Breuities sake, I omit many other remarkable thinges: as that they would eat no kind of flesh, except it had some strange fauor, like Venison and wilde beasts. Now albeit these vicades were dangerous to health, yet I refer it to all mens iudgments, for it is most certaine, that vse of such foode infecteth the heart, and is the cause of differencie.

themselves respectiue: must Learne much better directions, and imitate the worthy inuentions of these daies, leauing those grosse absurdities (for the most part vnprofitable) of our Elders, which themselves approued and esteemed, but verie slenderly to any purpose.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Antiquity of Fraternities, Brother-hoods, Fellowshipes, Societies, or Companies: And to what end they were at first instituted.

HE first Princes and Law makers, that had not as yet discovered the difficulties, how to maintain their subjects by iustice; permitted fraternities, Colledges, & Communities, the end, that the partes and members of one body (in a Common-wealth) being at Vnity, the whole Common-wealth it selfe might be the more easily gouerned.
As wee may perceiue Numa did, a King and Law-maker amongst the first, who established Fraternities and Colledges, of all Trades and Occupations, and to each Brother-hood, he appointed certain Patrons, Priests, and perticular Sacrifices, after the Sabines name was abolished;
that deuicd it selfe somewhat from the Romaines.

Lycorgus also, not only gaue the same permission, but likewise strictly commanded the good entertainment of such Communities, as well generally as perticular, & that all the Subjects should take their re-fection in those Colledges, from fifteene dayes, to fifteene dayes; and he cald such Assemblies in Greek, παιδία or φιλανθρωπία a Parishonia, that is to say, of lining Fri-gally, in regard of the amity they hadde sworne one to another, as also in all the Cities of Greece.

There were likewise of the like Fraternities, which were called παιδία. As in Italy, the selfsame Colledges were called Sodalitas, for Vnion, Frequentation, and Amity, which they helde together, eating and drinking (in one Assembly)

the most part of their time: and having no other Iudges but themselves. It there grew any difference amongst these Companions in Society, they knew that amity was the sole foundation of all Societies, and to be much more requisite amongst men, then Iustice. For, Iustice who is neuer pitifull, but holdes on her direct course: oftentimes maketh friends & enemies, and Amity giuing way to her Seuerity, establisheth true naturall Iustice.
Considering, that the sole aime of all lawes Diuine and Humaine, is to maintain loue amongst men, and the loue of men towards GOD, which could neuer be compassed, but by frequent and sociable Conuersation, and ordinary vinity.

The verie same wee may see in the law of God, the Feast of Easter to be recommended in the company of ten, to reuerse persons; beside the Feast of Tabernacles, and ordinary bankets of sacrifices, which God commanded to be solemnized with all ioy and gladnesse, which were entertained in the Primitive Church of Christians, who oftentimes made such Feasts, which they called αγάπαι, for the Kisses of Piety and Charitable embracements, which one gaue vnto another: besides the fraction, and ordinarie Communicating.

This Order is yet better kept in Swe-dia, then in any place of the world: For,
in all Cities and Townes, Fraternities and Occupations haue their Common Houses, where they keepe their Feastles and Banquets; and there is no Village so little, but it hath a Common house only for this purpose, wher (continually) suits, Quarrels; and Contentions, are lovingly concluded; and the sentence is Written downe with White Chalk, vpon the Table where they haue Banketted, in token of a white & pure ending of all strifes whatsoeuer. It were very necessary, that such an honest Custome should be euery where vsed: for it would preuent great expences and charges, belloved in triuous and idle pleadings, whereby infinite persons are vtterly vndone.

And euen in like manner as at Rome, according to the Institution of Numa, artificers, Merchants, Priests, hythops, & all sorts of men had their Fraternities, and certaine Gods for their Patrons (as Mercury was assigned to the Merchants, Ater the example of Solon, who ordained by his Lawe, that all Communities and Brotherhoods should be permitted, with power to make such Statutes as they pleased, Even so in like manner, Philosophers had Fraternities among them, especially the Pythagorians who assembled together ordinarily, and lived (for the most part) in common.

Herodotus (who lived before Rome was builded) writeth, that there were certain Societies of men in Egypt, who would beate and whip themselves so long as the Sacrifice endured, when they immolated a Cow to their God Apis. Romulus having entered into alliance with Tatius, King of the Sabines, instituted a number of Priests, which were called the Tatian Fraternity. The said Romulus made himselfe one of a Brother-hood, which was called Amalx, that is to say, belonging unto the Filde, whereof hee was the Twelfth man.

About the time of Romes first foundation, because many VVolves lived then thereabout, which destroyed the Cattle, so that great losses were daily received: the Romaines, who were onely but sillie warlike Shepherds, instituted a fraternity, and associated many men together, electing God Pan to be the chief Patron, to the end, that unanimously, and with one consent (when occasion required) they might oppose themselves against the VVolves; this was their first foundation. Nor long after, nere unto Mount Palatine, they founde a Litter of yonge VVolves, which having destroyed: they afterward builded there a field Temple, dedicated to their God and Patron Pan, according as then their power and ability served them. This Fraternity kept their Celebration annually, and the Brothers went naked, running thorow the Citie, holding long strappes of Goates skines in their handes, wherewith they vied to lath their bodies. The women among them, such as were barren, would (in like manner) strike themselves on the palmes of their handes, and verily beleened, that these superstitious Ceremonies would cause them to become fruitful. As may be noted in Juvenell, thus mocking a woman:

Nec prodest agilis palmas præbere lupo.
*VV*hich is as much to say, as, it serves thee to no purpose, to present thy handes

thus to the Luper-
cal Brother-hood, to be made fruitful. Marke Anthony the Emperor, he was one of this fraternity in the year, 700. after it was instituted, & ran stark naked through the City, as the other did. Julius Cæsar likewise, that many Brotherhoods were made at Rome, after the decease of Emperors, whom the Senate (in a manner) deified. As, in regard of Augustus, the Fraternities were called Augustales, and Flavianes, after the Family of the Flavians. Aurelians and Antonians, in respect of Aurelius and Antonius, Emperors.

Tertullian, Byshop of Carthage, in the time of great persecutions and of Paganisme, beholding certain Brother-hoods to be made among the Pagans, carrying meats into the Temples, performing of Sacrifices, eating together, and giving to the poore: hee admonished the Christians to doe the like, but not to meddle with any reverence to the Gentiles gods, only they should continue firme in the Christian Faith. And it is verie like, that Popes, Byshoppes, and other holy men, have perwaded the Christians to imitate those Assemblies and Fellowships: for continuance of prayer to God, and censuring and separating one from another, when it should truly be known, that some one among them, had done an acte vnbecoming the name of a Christian. Also, to conferre amiably amongst themselves, if any strifes or contentions had happened in the Company: then to accord such differences by their Pietie and Love, rather then to plead those distastfull matters before Iudges; keeping purposely an Informer among them, onely to accuse such delinquents. They would conclude amongst themselves, to redeem prisoners for debts, and pursue the delivrance of prisoners for their Faith; leuying a Collection of such sums of money, as should easily compasse this businesse. Also to give aide and assistance to Christians, being in persecution, and forced from place to place: contributing for reliefe of the poore, comforting helplese VViddawes and Orphanes, giving them food, cloathing, and maintenance. To marry and lend helpe to poore maids, in some competent and reasonable dowries providing for the Funerals of needy people, dying in necessity, or being martyred, not having any thing left to burie burie them withall, but onely referred to their care and mercy.

Some Brother-hoods learned of those faide Pagan Egyptians, to whippe themselves, and do practise yet to this day, yea even to effusion of blood, to subdue their bodies (as they say) enclined to voluptuousnesse; and this they do twice or thrice weekly: Others more rarely, according to their Deuotion. These Fraternities haue filled themselves Ninivites, because they finde in the Sacred Scripture, that the Inhabitants of Ninivy, being warned by the Prophet Ionas, that they should be destroyed for their sinnes: heereon they became verie penitent, put on sackcloth and ashes, and chastised their bodies, to appease the wrath of God.

The first Society or Fraternitie made among Christians (so farre as my iudgement reacheth) was in Ierusalem, where the cuer-blessed Virgin Merie, the Mother of Iesus, all the Apostles, and many other, as well women as men, Disciples of Iesus Christ, met together, and were in number about fixe score, after he was exalted vp into Heauen, where they receyued the Holy-Ghost, and afterwards, remaiend long time in their Brotherhood and assembly.

I will not say, that both Holy and vertuous assemblies haue not bene abused, vnder pretence of Pietie and religion, because it is long since, that it hath bin too well noted in Italy, when the factions of the Guelphs and Ghiblins were vnder full saile, labouring with one consent (vnder the pretence of fraternity) quite to exterminat one another. As much is found to be done in Germany, especially in the Diocesses of Treuts, Cologne, Lirge, Meyence and elsewhere, during the troubles of their Countreies.

This miserie also made way into France; gathering vp Monopolies, in sted of congregating like louing Brethren; yea, bandying and eleuating themselves against their King, and against the Catholike Church, which succeeded to nothing else, but multiplicity of seditions, only to support the part they had taken. But such vnlawfull assemblies are reprooued by the Church, and no such Fraternities should be permitted in Communion of the Sacrament, prophaning holy things, & the peace of the Church. For, they ought not to intrude into such matters as appertaine only to the Prince, vnder colour of reforming, but they should be taken as seditious, factious, and scelerates; yea, to be quite cut off from the bodie of the militant Church.

Thus you see, what I thought good to discourse, concerning the Antiquity and Vtility of Fraternities or Brother-hoods. And that they were not instituted by the first Christians, for Sporting, Dancing, and Drinking, as many ignorant and debauching persons haue thought, and so laboured to perwade the simple people.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of Polybius the Romaine Ambassador, and his opinion of the Iewish Commonwealth, when hee was at Alexandria in Egypt.

Obisius the great Historian, a most elegant orator, and learned Philosopher, School-maister, or (as some will haue it) companion vnto Senecca the Affrican, being sent by a Senat on Embasie, to Alexandria in Egypt, hauing heard of the ciuill warres that then were in Indea, made a mockery of the Iewes, and such as held opinion that the church and Doctrine of God, should be constituted by the Iewish people. For then, all that Nation was full of troubles and intestine broiles, the great sacrificing Priest being violently dispossessed of his estate by another, and this man slain or murdered by another. Euen as Iason did, who expelled his Brother Admetius; & then, his Fellow afterwarde caused his Brother Omas to be murdered. In briefe, by Ambition of the Sacrificers, who raised ciuill warres; they prophaned the blood of their Fellow-Citizens, the Dead bodies of their elders were scattered in the streets, yea, hurled into the Porch of the Temple.

During which time, Antiochus King of Syria, called thither by one of the factious, exercised cruell thecutes in eue-ry City. He placed his Garrison in the Temple, celebrated the Feast of Bacchus in the City, in which City only, stode the Temple of the true God. Circumcision was interdicted, and because two Women had caused their Children to be circumcised, they were led naked thorough the City, bearing their strangled Infants at their Breasts; and (at length) themselves were throwne over the wals. Another, who had seauen Children, was stoned, dismembred, and fried in a burning Caldron, because shee would not eate Swines flesh, contrary to the Ordinance of the Law.

Beside this, during these Calamities, there were risen three different Sects, of the Essenes, Saducees, and Pharisees; who more tormented the Church, and her true Doctrine, then all the massacres committed by the Lewes. In the end, Polybius to behold this so much deformed estate, thought then, that the Romain Senate (where there was a Scipio, a Laelius, a Scandus, a Cato, a Fannius, and others, that governed in the World wisely) was the place where God delighted most to be; & that he fauoured the Romans most. For, they prospered more in all their conquests, then all other Princes or people of the world did: and hee iudged the affaires and condition of the world, according as hee saw people in their good or bad estate.

Now, albeit it was verie strange to see the Church in such a disposition and deformity, yet notwithstanding, there were (euē then) some good members that cleaued fast to her: Such were Simon, Zachary, and many others, both Maisters and Disciples in her Diuine School; and after them, the Almones or Machabees. I alledge these things for many Reasons: First, to the end, that we should hold this Consolation, that God hath euermore his Church truly permanent, especially in this mortall life: to the end, that alwayes some part of mankind should truly know God, call vpon him, and celebrate his name, and that part need not doubt, but that they are preserved, counter-gar- ded, and heard of God.

If Polybius had seen some hundreds of yeares afterward, when the Popes were expelled out of Rome, and persecuted, he would haue said as much of the Catho- licke Church. As we read of Pope Alex- ander, third of that name, molested so many wayes by the most potent Empe- ror Frederick Barbarossa, finding no place in all Christendome for safety of his life: that (in the end) hee was constrained to retire himselfe to Venice, in the habite of a poor Priest, hiding himselfe in the church of La Charita, where he was received as a poore Chaplaine, and relieved for the loue of God. But at length, being known for the man he was indeed, hee found as- sistance, and was re-seated in his place. Pope Clement fift of that name, in regard of the factions in Italy, durst not abide at Rome, but was compelled to hold his See at Avignon, where (after him) it was con- tinued by his successors, the space of threescore yeares and more. Likewise, there have happened about three and twenty Schismes in the Church, some whereof, lasted seauentene yeares and more: sometimes three Popes were elected at one time, who made most cruell Warre one vpon another; One, defend- ing Emperors; Others, for other Prin- ces. I cannot expresse the Cruelties, In- solencies, Disorders, and Wickednesses, which (during these troubles) were com- mitted in the Church. And yet neuer- thelesse, in these hot times of Molesta- tions, there were many good people, full of Piety, as well women as men, among whom Gods true Church was still pre- served and manifested.

For proofe whereof, while these three Popes were thus in contention, to wit; Symmachus, Laurentius, and Petrus Altinus; there flourished great store of wor- thy personages, that were of Holie and vertuous life, of whom I wil name some. Fulgentius Byshop of Hispalis, a Monke; Theodoret a Gracian Priest; Isidore, By- shop of Auuergne; Eusebius of Carthage; Dionysius the Abbot, Aulus Prudentius, Senerius, Bishop of Treues; Egippus the Diuine; S. Patrick of Ireland; Pomerius and Honoratus; Cassiodorus, the Monke; Fridolin of Basile, and many others. If an hundred yeares after Polybius liued, he could haue seene the Romain Common- wealth wholly disspaired by the factions of Pompey, of Cesar; then of the Trium- uiri, all the World being filled with Ci- uill Wars; to attribute that which those famous Romans (in his time) had con- quered, by so great prouidence and dif- creet preservation, hee would then haue said, said, that God did not respect Rome more then he did any other nation. He should also then haue well noted the Pagans, among whom, Vertue, true Doctrine, and Honesty, was daily persecuted and de- spised: for then, if a man did but faigne to haue the truth, he was sure his Throat should be cut.

But Polybius is excusable, for he had no knowledge of God, but was a Pagan. He could not comprehend, that the pas- sage to the Kingdom of heaven, is thro- row infinite Tribulations. He beleued, that there was no other Paradise, but on- ly to liue happily in this world. Hee was an Arcadian, borne in the Citie of Me- galopolis, a great Philosopher and His- toriographer, verie well skilled in militari- Discipline. He wrote fortie Bookes in the Greeke tongue, containing the gests and policies of the Romains. Of all which Bookes, at this day, hardly is any more to be found; then five: the rest were lost and burnt by his Maid-servant, being ignorant what they were. But a young man, that sometime attended on him, know- ing the merit of his writings, hindred the Maids follie, and preferred those which wee haue, from hurling them into the fire.

Titus Livius hath bene much behol- ding to him, for it plainly appeared, that he followed him (word by word) in ma- ny of his passages, without altering any thing: and yet it was the space of an hun- dred years, or thereabout, between him and the saide Titus Livius. He was not so superstitious as some other Historiogra- phers, who mingled false miracles of their Gods among their woorkes: as ap- paritions of Gods, Goddesses speaking with Captaines; or heads of stinies; that they rained downe Blood, Milk, Stones, and such like; that Beasts did speake, Ri- uers conuert their Naturall colour into Blood, and other things meereley incre- dible. Nor did he write the Orations of Ambassadors, Captaines, and Kinges, wholly at large; without forgetting any iot, as many other Historians (both be- fore and after him) haue done, laboring to perwade their Readers, that those at- taires whereof they discourse, passed ac- cording as they are set downe; which is not easily to be credited.

Now, as concerning the cause why he went into Egypt; it was not to see there what God was, or any of his wor- kes: as did Plato, Democritus, Chrysippus, Anaxagoras; and others; for he had read what those Philosphers had written, and many more beside. But the Romaine Senat well knowing him, although a stran- ger, and that he had done very much ser- uice to Scipio, in giuing him good aduise and Counsell, for his conduct in the wars of Africa, and of Carthage, depused him their Ambassador, to negotiate and ac- cord some matter of peace, between Pto- lomy Euergetes, King of Egypt; and Antio- chus, King of Syria, and of many other great Prouinces, who formerly had ran- ged ouer the Egyptian Territories, and Polybius accorded them verie worshiplie: Having ended his Legation, he returned to Rome, where (it is said) he died, deeply charged with yeares.

He taught and instructed that Noble Scipio, in many Vertues, and among o- ther precepts which he left him: that he should neuer remoue out of the place, whereto occasion called him, 'till hee had won himselfe a friend there. In brief, euery man of good iudgement, will not iudge rashly, of good or euill persons, by outward apparence, beholding them to be fortunate, rich, or poore, nor seeing them afflicted; but rather, by their good actions, vprightnes of life, and purenesse of Doctrine.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of a strange conceit or opinion, in the Wo- men of Moscovia, to wit; That if they be not beaten by their Husbands, they thinke that they are not loued of them.

Imagined (for a long time) that that which is reported of the Women of Mos- couia, should be a meere Fable, to wit; that if they were not very often beaten by their husbands, they presently supposed that they did not Loue them; although it is vied as a common Prouerbe: See that loveth

Children of a Family, being under the power of Masters, Tutors, or Parents, they will hardly confesse themselves, to be beloued more than any other, because they are beaten more then other. Neuer-theless, the VVomen of Moscouia doo hold this opinion quite contrary vnto all other else-where, that if they be not beaten, they are despised, and no way esteemed.

I am well assured, that no man can perfwade this for allowable, to the women of France, Italy, Spaine, England, no nor to the German women, or that they would accept, and let it passe for currant Doctrine: although, if it happen that they should bee beaten, euen when they standing, they will strive to cry first, yea, and to beate their Husbands too, if they could; or otherwise iniurie and abuse them. And VVomen-Neighbours to Laurentius Surinus, a Religious Char-treux of Cologne in Germany, VVrites in his Booke of memorable matters, as well Ecclesiasticall as Secular: how it happened (in his time) that a Germane trauailed into those parts, and married with a VVoman of that Countrey, and his wife made a great complaint to him, that hee did not loue her, neither bare her anie kinde of affection, because he did not at any time beate her. The Germane hearing this, made answer; that hee loued her entirely; and perfwaded himselfe, that blowes could be no true signes of Loue. Afterward, he vsed to beate her fo extremely, and so often, that he found

(by good prooffe) his Wife did loue him much better then he did before. But his beating was such, and so immeasurably, as (at length) the Hangman brake both his legs and necke.

I was verie familiar with a Germane of Lunenburg, whose father was Ambasador for Ferdinando, Emperour, first of that Name, not long since deceased, deputed to Basilins, Duke and King of Moscouia; and hee assured me, that this Opinion was a Custome, and still in vse with the VVomen of that Countrey, & heard his Father faithfully report it. For he being lodged in the house of an honorable Burgesse in the City Moscouia, about the business then referred to his trust, sawe his hoste oftentimes beate his wife vpon no occasion, and yet notwithstanding, shee left not to loue him, and they spake still kindly each to other, without the ve-rie least shew of discontent; and yet the said woman was very often beaten, sometimes with his dagger, or a staffe, or kickt with his fecte. He said moreover, that there was a Gold-Smith in the same Ci-tie, with who this Ambassador often frequented, because he knew him before in the Towne of Lunenburg. This Woman sent word by one of her young Children to her husband, that hee had not beaten his mother (so much as once) at that weeke time: but if he would not beate her, she would neuer loue him, neither would she provide any more diet for him. The Goldsmith being verie busily employed about his worke, regarded not his fonnies words, neither remembered his custome so generally in vse; as those (Naturally borne in the Countrey) had great respect vnto it for their owne quiet. For hee was a man humane enough (as a Germane) and allowed not this barbarous bebauiour, to smite his dearest friend and wife,

or so much as to shew her any vnkind countenance: yet afterward, vpon her importunity, and to discharge his dutie, hee gaue her halfe a dozen blowes with a Cudgell on the backe and shoulders, & puld off her Head-attire, wherewith she was well contented, and called him presently to an excellent prepared Dinner.
Otherwise, if a whole weeke should passe, and he not beate her, there could be no quiennesse in the house, nor should he get one good looke of her. This is an ordina-

In brieft, this manner and custome of men beating their VVives, could not arise but out of Sathans shoppe; for the Christian Church hath euermore condemned it. There are none in these parts, but Knaues, Fooles, lealous Coxcombs, Drunkards, or men void of vnderstand-ing, that will exercise such Barbarous behauiour on their VVives: yet let mee not be mistaken, for I do not excuse some VVomen, that deserve to bee beaten for their vices and badnesse, and will giue extraordinary occasion to be sharply handled by their Husbands. But my meaning is, of vertuous, discret, and well aduised women, whose merits are not mealy to be cherished, but highly respected by their Husbands.

CHAP. XXXIII.

That those things, which some Authors haue left written, concerning the Destruction and ruine of great Troy, performed by the Greekes, are true.

Cannot choöe but meruel
very much, at the wilful tinacity of some men, who rathly haue esteemed, that those things written by many good Authors, deseruing credite and faithfull opinion of the warre and ruine of Troy in Phrygia, should be meer Fables, and ydle vanities. This error happened, because they haue not read some Bookes, VVritten by parties present at the VVarre on either side, as well Greekes as Trojans: as Dionysius Cretes, and Dares Phrygius, and others, who collected also their VVritings out of sound Authority, liuing not long after the time when those things happened. As Herodotus and others, that heard them reported by Captaines & Commanders, who had charge in the said VVares: among whom, was Phyllos the Greece, and some others beside, that selected them out of verie authent Authors. As namely, Quintus Sep-timius the Romain; Danaësius Sigeus; Emilius Macer the Poet; Enclides the Magistrum Phyllostiphan, and Homer, who was about eight score years after.

Many Monarques, Kings, and other Princes, took the paines, coming from farre Countries, to see the City of Troy:
as Alexander the Great, that found it ruined by the Perfians, who likewise deströed all that part of Asia, wherein it was seated. But Euthymus, Nephew to Alex-memnon, builded it againe, after that the Greekes had sacked it: raigning there, & his successors (as is affirmed) vntill such time as the Perfians ouerthrew it. Alexander the Great, then hauing read manie Heroicall actions, performed at the besieging of this Citie, and finding it had desert, caused it to be re-edified, & gaue great immunities and Priuiledges to the inhabitants, whom hee exempted from ordinary tributes; instituting there Free-Payre, Martes, and Markets, for all such as would dwell there, or Negotiate with them: in regard whereof, it was named Alexandria. M. Antichus, Dioctian, & Claudius, Romaine Emperours, potent and mighty, tooke paines to trauell the-ther from home, not without much cost and labour. And to leaue a memorie to posterity, of their being there, they caused a goodly Columbe to be erected, (which is yet (at this day) to be seene) of white Marble, very great, and placed in it being called Troy: but in regard of the great Antiquity thereof, it standeth not directly vpright, but leaneth some-what towards the sea; and thereon is engrauen these words following:

Imperator Caesar, M. Antoninus pius, Felix, P. M. Maximus, Trib. Pl. p. p. XV. Consul. III. Provinciarum Asiaticarum, & fluminis, pontibus Julius a-

And on the other side of the said Piler, was likewise written:

*Imperator Caesar Augustus, Dioctia-no, P. Col. II. regnante Tribunicia vice postulante, M. F. T. et Claudius, C. VIII.
P. R.*

In the time of the Warre which the *Romain*s had against Antiochus, this City was againe destroyed to the verie foundation by a Romain Captain, named Flam-inius, because Antiochus was possessed thereof, and had planted there his Garrison, which did much harme to the Roimaines. Yet it was new builded againe.

(but I know not by whom) because in the time of Marcus Aurelius the Emperour; there was an excellent Vniuersitie in the same place, of all Sciences, and Galen the Physitian was then a Student there.

Likewise, Saint Luke testifieth, that Saint Paul passed thorough it, and that he raised vp there, a young man, named Eutichus, that fell downe dead out at a Window, from the third Loft of the house: Also, that he preached there, and celebrated the holy Communion, where there remained a great number of Iewes. Three hundred yeares after, or thereabout, this Citie was once again destroyed by the Goths.

I thinke it was yet againe re-built afterward, and that the Inhabitants were Christians, because (at this day) manie crosses may be seene Engrauen on stones, enclosed in the walles of diuers temples therein, that stand (as yet) most part of them, being not wholly destroyed.

At this present, no person dwelleth there, nor within a Leagues compasse round about it; I know not whence this diffinition should proceed. The neere Neighboring Inhabitants do say, that before the Turkes got their entrance into Greece, it was then to be seene in the same condition. The six ancient Gates, are yet there (almost) intire, with their Porternes. The Towers about the walles in many places are yet standing vpright; and the height of the VValles are (verie neere) firmly standing; against which, are erected strong Piles and Spures of two Fadomes breadth, to sustaine them vpright.

The wals were builded of Free-stone, blacke like Iet shârd, but spungy; asking a large time to goe about them: and the Ditches are not (as yet) filled vp. There are two Castelles, verie ancient, within the circuit of the Citie, builded vpon the pendant of a Mountaine: one of the which, being much higher then the Citie, as hauing command thereof, and was called Ilion Castle. The other being much lower, had command of the Sea; both of them being builded of bright Marble; and so excellent in their construction, as it is impossible for anie man in the world, wholly to demolish them.

Concerning matters within the Citie, there are yet to be discerned the marks and traicts of such goodly buildinges, as exceed my capacity to expresse. There are yet to be seene strong Conduits and Cisternes, without any water belonging to them. The streets are verie confused, by reason of the houses ouerthrow which (for the most part) was flat forward. Of VVells or Fountaines, there is no more but one now to be seene, and that is neere to the Sea side. Natural Baths are there yet to be noted, holding their nature dry and hot, builded by excellent Art, and Artificially couered with fine Bricke. But be it howe soeuer, it must be much greater matter, then as yet I haue heard of, that shall or can cause mee to beleue those things for Fables, that are written and reported of the greatnesse, wealth, and power of this Citie.

There are yet many Sepulchres to be seene, both within and without the Citie, of Captains and Princes, as well Troians as Greeks, that were slaine during the warre, made (in Anticke manner) of Marble, all in one peece, after the fashion of a Chest, the couers whereof are whole & sound. Halfe a League or a mile from Troy, is the Isle of Tenedos, where are the most part of the Greekes Sepulchers. As that of Achilles, who was the terror of the Troians, yet slaine by Paris. He was so highly esteemed, that many of his blood were afterward carried thither, to lye by him in his Tombe, so much did they admire his memory.

This was the Tombe that Alexander went to visit, weeping ouer it, and much complaining, because he was not so happy, as to haue a man that could so well publish his praises, as Homer had doone those of Achilles; it remained yet entirely whole, with diuers Greeke Verses thereon engrauen. And about the yeare of Iesus Christ, 1379, when Balarath the son of Selim reigned ouer the Turkes, there was found in the said Isle of Tenedos, the Sepulcher of an Amazon Queen, named Marpesia, who after many booties, being richly laden with spoiles, made hir return to this Island, verie fore hurt and wounded, and there ended her dayes. This Tombe is yet to be seene, betweene two hilles of indifferent height; and a litle before one of them, there is a Greeke Epitaph on the couer of the Marble Chest, and there her name is comprized in faire Characters.

At any time, with opening verie little ground, or passing not about a foote in depth, many other famous tombs might be easily discovered. As the Tombe of Atax was, in that quarter where Achilles encamped his men. About this Isle of Tenedos, there are many other little Islands, of as good ground as that of Tenedos, but vn-inhabited, except by some poore Fishermen, that make their retirement thither sometimes. And it hath beene imagined, to be haunted with spirits, which speake to men; in regard whereof, the men that resort thither, and abide there any time, do say, that the spirit of Homer wanders in those Islands, where he did (in former dayes) Phyllophize; and that he flew himself to certain Shepherds, as they passed that way to feed their Cattle. Thus you may heare the opinion of such as doo now dwell about Troy, and neere the Isle of Tenedos, touching visions and spirits that appeare in those Islands.

As for the Rivers of Simois and Xanthus, so much renowned by many Poets which watered the fields of Troy, we can now say no otherwise of them, but that they are small Brookes or Gullies, scarce able to nourish a Loach or Minnow: for they are dried vp in Summer, and in the deepe of Winter, a Duck cannot swim there. But our Poets have published so many Fables of these Rivers, as they should seeme to haue beene much greater, then now they are. Yet must we not (for all this) say, that the History is not true, because Painters and Poets are Licensed to embellish their woorkes with more then their instant subject requireth; and we must likewise vnderstand, that vnder Poetical fables, there is vniuall a morall sense conuayed.

As concerning the Scituation of this Citie, Theuer maketh a quite contrarie description thereof, and saith; That these two fore-named, are great Rivers: and that it is seated in a good soile. I would be loth to contradict such a person, but that which I write, I haue gathered from Belonius a Physitian of Mans; in the second Booke of his Obseruations: and I my selfe haue heard him often report, being at Paris, at Zoll, that foure yeares he frequented that Country. Afterward, a man of Rohan, named Albert le bon, declared that he had bin in those parts, and remained there, a whole Winter, agreeing in all things which Belonius had written. I thinke verily, that Theuer was neuer there, but what he hath recorded, was onely by heare-say.

That which hath giuen occasion to some, not to credite the destruction of Troy, is (as I haue heard) the iudgement of Paris, concerning the beautie of the three Goddesses. Dares Phrygius writeth, that it was nothing but a Dreame which Paris had as he slept vnder a Tree, being wearied with Hunting in the Forrest of Ida; and Poets making vse of this dreame, haue aduised young Princes, not to imitate the folly of Paris. For he refused Riches, which Iane presented him; and wisdom and vnderstanding in all things, offered him by Pallas, if to cyther of them he would haue giuen the Golden Ball. But suffering himselfe to be swayd by voluptuous desires, hee chose rather to giue it to Venus, the Goddess of loose and mis-governed affections; that he might liue (alwaies after) in such licentious liberty. And, as an especiall note of his skillfull progression, hee made a Rape of faire Helena, wife to Menelaus, King of Lacedemon, that entertained him in his Court as a kind friend. A matter, which caused the ruine of all his family, and of all the Troian Kingdome beside.

Secondly, they alledge also as a fable, that Priam commanded his son Paris to be slaine, because Hecla (his Queen) being great with childe, had a dreame that she should be deliuered of a fire-brand. And hauing conferred with interpreters of dreames, the King was informed, that the infant then in hir womb, should be the cause of his ruine, and of the whole kingdome. This dreame might verie likely be dreamed by Hecla, in regard, that verie often, Princes and Princelices are (by especiall grace) forewarned of God, both in dreames and otherwise, concerning diuers things which are to happen, to the end, that they might prevent them. For accidents good or euil do not only touch them, but all the people likewise. In brief, Paris from his infancy was so vicious, as his father could neuer afford him a good looke. And when he was in his youthfull dayes, without any aduise of his Parents, he married a Nymph of the Fields, but yet free was verie faire and virtuous, Named Oenone; and afterwards fou-

Thirdly, they affirme for a fable, that which Dittys Grecians, Homer and other Authours haue Written, of the Plague dispersed in the Campe of the Grecians, when they assembled to plant their siege before Troy, the Armie consisting then of no lesse, then twelve hundred thousand able men. Euery man knoweth, that contagious Diseases doo feldome cease from pursuing great Armies, because men liue there vnwholesomely, in regard of Corruptions by dead Bodies, and other annoyances amongst Men: Besides, Welles and Waters abused or corrupted; for men and beasts drinke all together, whereby the ayre becometh infected.

The people then perceyuing so great a Mortality, without finding any Remedy for it, had re-courfe to their Goddesses, and consulted with Oracles. The Priests being then verie subtle and crafty, made answer: That this Pestilence ensued by the anger of Diana, and this was the reason thereof. Agamemnon, Brother to Menelaus, elected Chief Leader of the Armie, had slaine a goodly Hinde, which was Priuate and Sacred, and was kept by the Sacrificing Priests (for pleasure) in some Fielde or Forrest, Dedicated to the saide Goddesse. They made them also beleue, that they had oftentimes seene Diana, to take great delight in sporting and playing with that Hinde. Wherefore, if they would haue the plague to cease, they must Sacrifice the Daughter of Agamemnon, King of Mycenae, who was the onely cause of all the euill.

Now, it is well knowne, that this ydle practise or Gallerie, was expressly prepared against Agamemnon, by some of the other Kings, who were malicious and enuious (esteeming themselves aboue him) because he was chosen chiefe Soueraigne, and commaunded ouer so great an Armie, wherein were no lesse then thirtie nine Kings. And this was deuised onely to discontent him, and giue him occasion for to depart home againe: yea, and the Oracle being entrusted to this Cooleage, returned that answer.

Being on the verie point of constraining him to deliuer his Daughter to bee

Sacrificed, Achilles and some other of his Friends, who had Credite sufficient with the other Kings, found the meanes to redresse this extremitie. For, they being assited by some of the Priests and Sacrificers, than re-consulted with the Oracle, hauing receyued a good summe of Money, returned a report, that Diana would be contented with the sacrifice of another Hinde, and of a Bull, which accordingly was performed.

Then the Græcian Armie entered into their prepared Shippes, which amounted to the number of cleauen hundred and fortie Saile, or thereabouts: and dislodging thence, chainged the Ayre. So, by Naturall Reason, that Contagious infection ceased: and thus should that part of the Historie bee vnderstood.

For the Palladium, which was an Image of Woodde, representing Pallas false from Heaven, with a mighty thunder, into a Temple newly made, which the Trojans had builded in the Citie; which being finished, and they not knowing to what God or Goddesse they should make their Vowes, or elect as their Patron, this happening in the Night time, the Gates of the saide Temple being fast shut.

This was nothing else, but onely a meere inuention of men, and principally of the Sacrificers, and Couetous Idolatrous Priests, who found the meanes (one Night) when there was great lightning, Thunder, and Raine, to bring the saide Image thither secretly. And commencing the next morning to open the temple Gates, in the presence of manie people; they made them beleue, that in this terrible time of night, the Image was descended from Heaven. Whereupon, the Trojans admiring this deceitfull wonder, sent some of their Noblest Citizens (with the Sacrificers) to Delphos (there to consult what was to be done with this statue descended from heauen. The Priests of Delphos, vnderstanding the drift of the subtle Trojans, conspired one with another, to answer by the Oracle (which was a Virgine closely concealed in the Vault, and well instructed in his answer) That the Image of Pallas had not bene sent from Heaven, but for the more assurance and preservation of the Trojans estate; and that so long as shee remained within the Temple, the Citie of

A remedie found against so great an inconvenience, by redrafting of the Oracle.

A fourth reason, the Palladium image of Pallas in Troy.

Simple people are foolishly deceiued, especially vnder the cloud of Holinesse.

Both sides abused by a false Oracle.

Troy could not be surprized by Warre. The Trojan peopleooke this Oracle for an Article of Faith, and so did the Grecians also: for it brought them into dispaire of euer taking the Citie, and gaue the other side vndoubted assurance, that they should neuer be surprized or vanquished; and the better to countenance their perswasion, the Trojans placed strong Guards (ordinarily well payed) about the Palladium.

Now, it fortuned, that by long delay of time, many rough battailes and skirmishes, and all places of entrance into the Citie so strongly besiedged; that Troy could no way bee supplied with victuals. But being thus seuerely beleagured, the more part of the best men of warre; yea, euen the most resolute and valiantest Trojans, dyed with hunger: and none remained, but tyred weak men, wearied with sustaining so long a siege, and voide of any hope of succour. Some Princes, and other men of marke, foreseeing that the Palladium could not bee preferred; without speaking to Priam their Kings, (who was then very old and feeble) or Heuba the Queene: conferred closelie with the Grecians, (who were as much weary and tyred as they, desiring nothing more, but to raise their siege, & returne hometo their owne Countrey) yet made an outward bold shew, of stil continuing the siege. When they met to capitulate, among others were Antenor, Aeneas, and some else, who promised, if they might haue their liues and goods saved, they would admit the Enemy benefit of entrance. Promises past on both sides by sollemne oath, in a place very secret and free for the purpose; the people (in meane while) supposing, that they treated of a truce among themselves, of the reddition of Prisoners, and retouery of worthy mens bodies, slaine in the skirmishes. But aboue all thinges else, the Grecians strictly held, that the Palladium should bee deliuered to them: for they were perswaded, that they should neuer get entrance into Troy, so long as the Image continued there, so farre did the deuill (then) preuaile with men. This fortif light beleefe, S. Angustine verie exceedingly wel mocked, when he said: The Trojans were keepers of the Palladium, but not the Palladium of the Trojans. The Guards were wun with Money, and the Priests that were there desired; contrary to their Oath and Vow, suffered their Palladium to bee lost; and another Image put into the place, very neerelie resembling it, covered with the same ornaments and Jewels, whereof none was then mindfull.

The Palladium being now in the besiegeders power, they were highly contented, and sent great presents to the Traytors, with reiteration of their Oathes. Whereupon, in the dead time of night, the Traytors opened the Gate called Seca, whereon was embossed the head of a Horse, and by a flaming Torch, gaue signall to the Grecians for entering the Citie, which they did, hauing yet the Traytors Children in their hands as hostages. Thus was the Citie taken, King Priam slaine, his wife and Children led away Captiues, and such as remained of the Royall Issue, were murdered, and almost all the people massacred: Faith was kept with the betrayers, but yet with great difficulty: neuertheless, after the reddition, they were exempted from spoile. To wit, Antichis, Father to Aeneas, Antenor, neere Kinsman to King Priam, Polydamas, Volagen, Amphidamas, Dolon, and diuers other; to whom Ships were giuen, for conueighing thence their wines, children, & whatsoever else they could carry away. After the sacke had continued the space of eight daies, the Citie was wholly burned, but they had great difficulty to destroy it: for the buildings were all of Marble, or of free Stone, strongly couered and tarassed. But the Grecians were very great in spleen against it, because the most part of them (in this long siege) had lost many of their Kinned and deere Friends, beside their owne hard sufferance in the warre.

There dyed in this besiedging, eight hundred, eighty and sixe thousand Grecians, vntill the reddition of the Citie; and sixe hundred, seauenty; sixe thousand, as well of the Citie, as such succours as was sent them, by Kings, Queenes, and their Allies abroad, without making any account of both Men and Women, that were led thence captiues.

As concerning the Horse of wood, which which is said to be made by the Greekes, within whose belly men were hidden, and whereof they made an offering to Pallas, to compass the means of breaking the walls thereby, and so to overcome their enemies: these (truly) are Poetical Fables. But yet we were to observe, that the City was surprized at that gate, whereon there was the head of a Horse (very highly) embossed, and of blacke Marble, as before we have said, and it remaineth yet to be seene.

A life reason,
the fables of
the Amazons.

Next, for the Amazons, which are said to come to the succour of Troy, conducted by their Queene Penthesilea, this is a Fable too. But yet we must credit that this Woman was a Queen, and commaunded ouer many Countries; a Friend and neere Ally to King Priam, in whose aide she came: bringing with her eight or ten thousand men, and not Women, that were slaine in several fights; and the her selfe (at last) in a single combat with Achilles. For, there was neuer any Country, inhabited only by Women, nor is at this present, which I purpose else where to shew.

A somewhat reason,
the ten years
siege of Troy.

It is also held for a Fable, that the Greekes should abide at the siege of Troy, the space of ten years: this is not altogether incredible, because as much hath beene done in our time. The siege which Baisazeth brought before Constantinople, lasted eight yeares and some months, in the year 1373, and yet (for all that) was not taken. That which I have written, concerning the subtilties of the Priestesses in those daies: I protest, I saw them in the hand of Monsieur Pelicin, a Parisian, Schoole-maister to the children of the late Lord De l'Aubespine, in a Booke being a Manuscript, & in the Greek tongue, which a man of the Church had given him, who was a follower of Monsieur de Fumell, Ambassadour in the East. This man had the Booke of a Caluere, or religious Greek at Mount Athos; and therein is the Interpretation of the Fables, which I have alleged in this Chapter, and many more beside. The Author thereof was one Temison, a Smyrnan, who (I thinke) was a Sacrificer, and afterward became a Christian.

There is a certaine Booke, intitled, Troy not taken, it is in the Greek tooing, and translated likewise into Latine, which is said to be composed by one named Dion the Sophister, that lived in the time of Traiane the Emperour, and neuer vied any other Garment, then the skinn of a Lyon. But he al-leadgeth such poore reasons, to proue that Troy was neuer taken, nor besieged by the Greekes: that a Childe of tenne yeares olde would set downe better. Therefore, such as doe yet hold that error, and are perswaded, that what hath beene written by many oculary Authors, and others beside of good credit, concerning the Trojan History, is no way veritable: let them see (to their shame) the ruines of that famous Citie, which yet (to this day) doe make shew of themselves, as I have described them in this Chapter. The round neighbouring places, ports of the Sea, which doe (yet) retaine the very same names, that then they had. The Tombes of such famous men (with their inscriptions) that died as well on the one side, as the other; being all of Marble, with the countures whole, but no bones in them: for neuer was any thing put into them, but the ashes of the dead, because (in those times) the bodies were all burned.

CHAP. XXXV.

How a Man may easily know, what kinde of drinke will soonest make one drunke: As with Wine, Beere, Ale, Cider, Perry, and other drinckes.

It is not the only drinke that causeth drunkennes, when it is immeasurable taken, or when it is received by Men or Women, whose braines are weake and feeble. For, there are many other arteficiall Beuerages, made in those Regions, where no Wine hath encrease or growth; as in Normandy, Bristaigne, in the more part of Piccadie, the lower Germany, and other Northerly Countries. But they make vse of Cider, Perry, Beere, Ale, Rallis, and other drincks, which procure drunkennes more then Wine.

Wine doth. In Turky it is forbidden to such as are of the Mohometane Law, to drinke Wine vpon paine of life; and there are likewise Drinckes arteficiall made.

The Caribes and Anthrophages, people that feed on the flesh of Men, make a kinde of drinke, which they call Canomim: it is made of certaine roots called Apie, and grosse Miller, champed in the mouths of Women, and then boyled in some quantitie of Water. Of this drinke they make vse after their repast, for they drinke not at all in the time of their feeding, as wee doe in these partes: but rather imitate nature, as other Creatures do. This Canomim causeth drunkenesse, more then Wine doth here, if too much be taken thereof.

In the Kingdome of Narsingua, Tavanganor, Calcut and Pern, they drinke a kinde of liquor which cometh forth out of a Tree, that is therefore, purposefully cut in the Spring time, like unto the Palme; and it is called drunkenesse also. Many Countries in the Asian Indies, do make diuers drinckes of Rice and Spices, which will procure drunkennesse likewise. In Turky they make a certaine Hydromell or Meibegim, which troubleth the braine much more then Wine. In breefe, there is not any Nation that will content it selfe with drinking Water onely: but haue deuised one or other arteficiall beuierge to please the Palate, and delight their taste. My selfe having frequented those Countries, where no Wine at all is made, but other arteficiall drinckes devised, as hath before beene declared: I haue apparantly perceived, that such as receive their drunkenesse by wine, haue quite contrary behaviour to others, that are overcome with Beuerages as of Beere, Cider, Perry, and the rest.

And although those men that are drunke with Wine, do commit a thousand follies, and counterfeite diuers antick fopperies: yet it is most certaine, that none can declare the like foolishness, and velle more argument of ridiculous laughter (when wee behold their faces, eyes, and gesture,) then such as are drunke with those drinckes, and (among the rest) with Beere. For they neither reele or stagger on any side; but onely backward; and fall downe flat on their backs: but such as are drunke with Wine, reele forward, and alwaies fall or lye vpon their face and nose; whereas the other do bruiſe their shoulders, and break their heads behind. As likewise may be discerned when they are overcome with sleepe in drinking, for they that are drunke with Beere, Ale, Cider, and other drinckes arteficiall; doe sleepe on their backs, with their bodies open. I haue beene credibly assured, that often such is their behaviour in Turky, the Indies, America, and other Regions, when they are in like case.

Where men doe become drunke with Wine, they sleepe vpon their faces, the Chinne declining into the bosome. The reason is, because the fumes and vapours proceeding from Wine, doe gaine possession in the head's foremost part, and the anterior parts of the body also. But those fumes which mount aloft by other drinckes, doe incline to the head behind, and the posterior parts also: which is a reason, that they are very obliuious, euermore sleepey, and no great praters or brablers.

The French, that (during the Strages Warres in the Lowe Countries) trauailed thither as Souldiers, would make their boasts, that they had familiarity with many Women there, when they found them to bee made drunke with Beere: for then they would fall downe backward, at which time, their pudicity might easilie be attempted, finding them in such vnwomanlike readinesse. Let them (therefore) that haue care of their Chastity, take heed how they become drunke. And as for men, ouer and beside, that many doe then disclose their owne secrets: they enter also (often times) into quarrels, destroying their health, and vndoing themselves. Our Lawes do hold them for infamous persons, that are addicted to drunkennesse.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Against the Axiome, which maintaineth, that all Repletion is naught, by what Suffenance sooner it be; But of Bread most pernicious.

Could neuer vnderstand the reason, although I haue enquired of many learned Philosophers, who (neuertheless) haue published the same also: that Repletion of bread, is more dangerous and pernicious, then all other nourishments beside. For not only it seemeth to me voyd of all reason; but it hath bene so accounted, by all them that I haue conferred with. All because all other foods, as the flesh of Oxen, Kine, Mutton, Veale, Goat, Hare, Hart, Hinde, Boare, Swine, of Fowles, and also of all Fishes which we vse, and any Fruit whatsoever; doe corrupt easily of themselves; if they remaine any while in the stomacke and be not digested: the like doth Egges, and all things prepared with Milke, except Cheese, which is saide to be (almost) indigestible. All such as vse these meates without Bread, haue neuer any good colour, but are much subiect to vsfauoury breath, and sometimes (of their owne bodies) a smell scant pleasing; neither are they so well nourished, nor so strong; as they that eate more Bread, then any other meat beside.

To proue that it must needs be so, we may behold, that the most of other Viandes, how acceptable they seeme to the tast, well prepared and seasoned with good Sauces: they doe yet (very often) bring a dislike and contempt of themselves. Bread only neuer distasteth, be it in health or in sickness; it is the last appetite lost, and the first recovered in sickness. In health, it is alwaies the first and last eaten, pleasing and most agreeable to nature, beyond all other kinds of repast. Again, it is most certaine, that Bread

(by a wonderfull blessing in Nature) is endued with all those fauours, which particularly doe incite and allure each meate to be fed on: pleasing some in their sweetness, others in their sharpnesse or tartnesse, some in their saltnesse, others in their fowrenesse, and all in their due apprehension. Bread containeth in it, whatsoever any Man can tast, or is acceptable in other meats. For, albeit other foodes haue neuer so good relish of themselves: yet can they not be sutable, or profitable to feede on for health, except they be accompanied with Bread. To speake all in a word, Bread, by his goodnesse correcteth the vices of other meates, and helpeth their vertues; whereon it is vsed as a common Prouerbe: That all meats are good and beneficiall, when Bread is their companion.

Some Spagiricks, Alchymists, and Extractors of Quintessences, haue told and assured me, that hauing put Bread into their Limbeckes or vessels of glasse, as meaning to deriue an Essence from him: they haue diuers times found the Bread conuerted into Flesh. We doe daily note (as already I haue said) that the most part of them, which doe eate their meate without Bread, be it Flesh or otherwise, they haue continuallie stinking breath. The Athletes or stout Wrestlers, (as I finde recorded in the Bookes of Galen) such as were esteemed the very best, and strongest in habitude among other men: had neuer any other nourishment but Bread, accompanied with a little Hogs Flesh.

When the Scots vsed to warre out of their owne limits, as in England and other places, if they thought to finde the Country ruined where they should passe: they arose with them a great number of Beasts for slaughter, and liued (by the way) vpon those Beastes. And because they had liued sometime by Flesh alone, their stomackes a long while would be sickly, by not hauing had the vse of any Bread. For remedie of which stomackall disease, each man particularly carried a Sackell of Meale, weighing about some pound & a halfe at the most, and a little Iron Plate, thin and slender. Then mingling a litle of the Meale, in a wooden dish with water, and dringing it into a Paste: they laid it on the Plate ouer a small fire; and in this manner (immediatly) they made Bread. This doth in some manner resemble our Waterers making of Wafers. The Scots hauing eaten of this Bread, found their stomackes well refreshed, and their bodily strength sufficiently restored; after which, they would begin againe to vse flesh onlie, according to their wonted custome.

I alledge this History, to demonstrate, that if so little bad made Bread, neither leauened nor kneaded, could restore the languishing strength of men: what then is good Bread able to do, being kneaded and baked to full perfection? This benefit of baking Bread vpon a Plate of Iron, brought much commodity to that Nation: for they needed little search after Bakes or Mills, which commonly are beaten downe and destroyed (before all things else) that in the degates of warre, the enemy may haue no benefit by them.

The Lord of Villamand declareth, that being gon forth of his Ship, and likewise all those in his company, at the Port of Ioffa, and putting themselves on the way, to trauaile by Land to Ierusalem: the Moors and Arabs entered vpon their vessell lying at Anker, and robbed them of nothing else but Bread. Other Theues also, of the same sect and kinde of men, meeting with the same company the day following: tooke also nothing from them but Bread. All Nations haue not Bread, nor the vse thereof, and such as neuer had (as many Countries but lately discovered) when Christians giue it them to eate, although it be but a Bisket, and of the very coarsest: they make great account of it, they finde it so sauourie.

I am of the minde, that he which is full, fatierye and Repletion of Bread, is more dangerous then all other nourishments: his meaning is of such bread as is not salt kneaded, and well baked, or without Leauen, because it is the more hard to digest. As for my selfe, my meaning is of such Bread, as is made of good and pure graine, well cleansed, kneaded, raised, baked, and fresh. I speake not heere of Fish-bread, which is made in Hirland; among the people which dwell on the Lake of Barrena, and that in the Isles of Imagla, Imbila, and and an infinite of Countries on the red Sea, and else-where. Nor also of that which is made of the bark of Trees, vsed in the Country of Pendana, which is called Sagu, and is saide to be very fauourie, being reduced into Meale, and afterward into Bread; As suite also of the same Tree is, in the Isles of Moliquisles. By the reasons fore-alleged, I would perswade all persons, not to forsake the vse of Bread, for fond or lickorish desire after other meats: if they couet to haue good strength, a chearefull complexion, and health.

Concerning the inuention of Bread, since what length of time it hath continued, and who was the first Inuenter thereof; there is not any thing found for certaine. In the East Countries; the vse of Bread is very ancient; for we finde, that it was vsed in the times of Abraham, and of Iacob, when his Sons descended into Egypt, onely to buy Corne, to make Bread: But neuer vsed, the vse thereof is not found so ancient; because the Romans vsed no kinde of Bread, but onely Corne boyled (as likewise the Gauls and Germanes did) till they brought it a perfect rising in sinder, and then they did eate it among their other vianda, euen as at this present we do our bread. This continued thus till the Persian warres, which was in the yeare (after the Cities foundation) 580. And then came Bread-makers, or Bakers of Bread, out of Asia to Rome; who gaue instruction, how to multure or grinde Corne, then to knead it with Leauen; and lastly, to bake it in Loaves.

Of the excellent and profitable properties of the Swallow; And the Nature of the Bird.

ject to the rigour of Winter, as also the House or Wall where she buildeth her nest, nor to be threatened by any neere ruine: Because, that by her coming, she resolvethe winter to be past, and the Spring time beginning; because (likewise) she hath in her many especial properties, by diuers benefits and other things arising to man, whereof we shal discourse hereafter: it seemed meet (in my judgement) that this Bird well deserved to haue a particular Chapter written of her, in her iust defence against such as labour to deprave her.

The Swallow
knoweth the Seasons and temperature
of Climates.

The Swallow abideth ordinarily, in Regions temperately hot, shunning the extremity of heat, and of cold likewise. Pliny saith, that this Bird, feeling the extreme heat of Affricke appoiching; the fifth thence in the prime,
to delight her selfe in a temperate ayre:
And when she perceiueh Winter ensuing, which is about the midle of September; she then returneth to the Countries extremely hot, where winter is in the same manner, as Summer is here with vs. This Bird hath such an absolute memory, that hauing re-passed the Sea, and many other Regions, which are two thousand miles off, at the least: yet shee well knoweth to returne to the place of lodging, where (in the precedent year) she made her Nest, and where shee had young ones.
This I haue scene, and made prooffe of by one Swallow, hauing tied a red Silk twine about her Claw: and the sayled not the year following, to returne and build her nest, where she had done the year before, bringing the Silke fast tyed ar her foote. She neuer lodgeth two years together, in one and the same nest.

The Swallow
cleareth the
ayre of Flies.

She is not afraid of a man, and (willingly) buildeth not her nest in Houses.
It is saide, that God hath done this in his great providence, to the ende, that such Creatures, as haue no other feeding but on Flies, which doe so much molestation to men all Summer, and in the beginning of Autumne; might thus be deuoured. It is the onely Bird which feedeth in the Ayre, and there catcheth a prey, to carry to her young ones. But some people, not knowing what they do; will breake downe their Nests, shut their windows and doores of their Chambers, to the ende, they may not enter in or out, to carry feeding to their young. Nay they doe them all the iniuries they can, breaking their Egges; yea, sometimes they kill both He and She. But if a man knew the good and commoditie, which these pretty Birdes doe bring vnto vs; they would be more milde, and let them liue in peace.

I know very wel, there are some who will alleadge, that the Dung of these Birds is so pernicious, as if it fall into a Mans eyes (as it did to Tobias) it will then, without all question, make him blind. But they that haue alleaged this Hillory, were not skilful in the congs; albeit Mathias, a man learned, hath aouched the same, following their opio-nion. For the Iewish Theologian Doctors, wel skild in the Syrian and Hebrew Languages, say: that it was not Swallows that dunged on the eyes of Tobias, but Sparrowes, which is confirmed by Dioscorides, when he saith, Swallows being eaten, doe cleare the sight, like as the Beetles, or Gnat-snappers. The Ashes of them, as well of the great as small (for their bodies being burned in an earthen pot, and Hony applyed to them) doe take away all impeachments that trouble the sight. It may then well be discerned here by that the dung of the Bird which took away the sight of Tobias, was not that of the Swallow, according to their iudgement. And Galen is of the same mind with Dioscorides: I refer it then to better censure.

She hath instructed man, how hee ought to builde, for with Straw and Morter she buildeth her Nest, and with such cunning; that hardly can any Man make the like. When the desireth propagation, the Male medleth with the Female; but not in mounting, or reading vpon her, but by ioyning both their hinder parts together, for which to yeilde a reason, Alianus saith, that he neuer knew any rendered. They fly abroad in the fields, to seeke for Wooll, which they plucke from the backs of Sheepe with their claws, and carry into their Nests, whereon they lay their Egges, to preserve them from breaking, as also the enclosed young ones from hurting.

therein, and are very skilfull in defending themselves from vermines, which are enemies to their Egges, and will bite them: But nature hath endued them with so much knowledge, as they can well preferre their Egges from harmefull vermine: for they looke but the Hearbe called Smalage, in Latine called Spium, and bring it into their Nests, and by the strong sent of bitter-nesse thereof, the vermine dyes.

Swallows

The Swallow
is skilfull in

The Swallow
cleareth the
ayre of Flies.

Their young Birdes doe resemble whelpes, that continue for a time blind:
but the Male fieth abroad, and findeth the Hearbe, by means whereof their sight quickly commeth. Very long and diligent inquisition hath been made after this Hearbe; and the Birdes very narrowly watche for it; yet could it neuer bee knowne what Hearbe it is.
If a man open the eyes of the young Birds, they recouer their sight without any other help: but some do assure vs, that (by meates of that Hearbe) their sight is the clearer. Which being known to men, the Plaine would serue to make their sight more perfect: and therefore (questing at the true Hearbe) they call it Chelidonia, or Hirundinaria.
For so many benefits, which men generate by means of this Bird, befit the recited in the beginning of this Chapter; enstructing how to build, keep our Houses cleane, delighting vs by her singing, preserving fight by that kinde of Hearbe; and destroyng hurtfull ver-mines; methinks no man should mollest her, but rather peaceably converse with her, as a guest or friend that commeth but to bebin. She catcheth naturally thing of ayre, but shee feeds vs from a multitude of Flies, as shee flyeth in the Ayre; and she should be so entertained.

(as Plinius saith) chearfully, like a good guest at her coming; and when she is willing to depart, as to with-hold her.
The Ashes and Flesh of this Bird, as we haue formerly said, doth not onelie serue to cleare the sight, and recouer it if it bee lost: but it is a remedy also for many other sicknesses. For, if wee take the Swallows first young ones, in the Moones encreasing, and cleaue them, we shal finde within little Bones in their bellies, which if we were to be taken, we should find them of many colours, and of diuers kinds, but of one colour only. These bones, wrapt in the skin of a young Hart, or Heiler (before it haue toucht the ground) and dyed with the decoction of Scilla, is a good remedy for such sicknesses, as the falling sickness, and maketh the in very chear-
ful. Plinius giueth assurance, that Swallows fishes, which are caught with Hony, doe helpe the Scuruillie, and all other diseases of the stomacke, in the throat, as also the Albugines, or Opilae or Melan, as Plinius saith, and is a good remedy for the same. There are three kinds of Swallows; whereof, one buildeth her Nest with Hony, the second, in old ruined buildings, in holes and Ca-uities of Rocks, and chinks of the Sea side; and the third, buildeth in the balkes of Riuers. In the Isle of Samos, there are Swallows, naturally all white: Behold what I haue gathered out of good and approved Authors, concerning the properties of this Bird, in whose imitation we may well order

CHAP. XXXVIII.

A Paradoxe in defence of Hard-Lodging, approving it to be more healthfull and commendable, then those great Palaces, and houses of pleasure.

Already we haue discoursed of poore and meane descent, now come we to speak of the humble cottage, the dwelling wherein I haue and will maintaine. The building of such honest houses of harbour, doe require little expences and charge, in lesse time they are erected, more easily furnished, and with far greater commodity kept and frequented, then stately Palaces, and houses of pleasure. The proportion of a handsome little house, carrieth good correspondency, and no outward wanton apparance. It is lesse subiect to the danger of Theeues, then is the large and spacious Pallace, compassed about with rare deckings, great & bafe Courts, Offices, Stables, Dog-kennels, Hearnies, Hauke-mewes, and other such superfluous delights.

The poore and simple house, is not easily toucht with lightning and tempests from Heauen; and a man may dwell there more quietly, then in the fairest, prospect Lordship; garnished with so many Gardens, Arbours, Turrets, Vaults, Mountaine-like walls, and other curiosities, which doe nothing else but tire and weary men. The poore house is sooner provided, with lesse cost then the greater. It excuseth the Maister from making Feasts, to such as commonly retorne but mockes when they are invited. The final house is free from the Harbingers make, or the Marshalls of Princes, Cardinallies, and Lords; that cannot be entertained but in pompous dwellings. Let vs but consider, where such States haue made but the least sojourning; how many things haue need of new mending? And their passage that way, resembled a storme and tempest of raine, washing all good order for a long while after. See if your Seruaunts become the better entrusted thereby, your Household in any more ciuill manners, or your house furniture in such good sort as it ought to be. I had almost forgot, that (many times) they put their Host to the perill of borrowing, inciting great Lords to affect his Liuing. So that, if they can cunningly compass the meanes in recompence of their kinde entertainment: the Host is brought to the hazard of confiscation, for the very least word inconsiderately spoken, eyther against the Prince or Religion.

This is the reason, why I cannot sufficiently meruaile, at the great follie and poore iudgement of some Men, who couet huge Palaces, and sumptuous Houses for their abiding and lodging; being much grieved and offended, if they should take but one nights rest in a meane, poore, and popular house. As if our Soule (full of all excellent noblenesse, and endued with infinite priuiledges, which God hath thereto assigned;) should imagine the body too strait and narrow a roome, for hir to abide in. Or as if (in how short time God best knoweth, whether wee be willing or no) we should not render the bodie into a much lesse Lodging, to finde out one farre more excellent and magnificent for the Soule. Can a meane House, a hard Bed, or a narrow roome, bee any hindrance: but that our Spirit (freely, and at her owne ease) may make discourse thorow all Celestiall pleasures, much better delights then can bee wished for in this world? It need not (there) stand bound to so many inconueniences; as the dwellers in faire and Lordly places, are euermore subiect vnto.

When Warre had his beginning, and entred into consultation, to burne and destroy the Countrey on all sides, as it prouoed most to yeelde disaduantage: the Soldiours, and men appointed for spoyle, receiued no charge to meddle with little Hamlets, or poore Shepherdes Houses; but the most magnificent and beautifull habitations of

of great Lordes and Princes. Beside, if neede required to make a Fieilde assembly, in what place soeuer it were: the fairest Castles & costliest buildings were sure to bee first taken vp and vted.

But let vs admit, that a poore mans Cottage suffers spoyle among the rest: yet the Man hath this comfort left him (a priuiledge beyond the large capacity of Castles) that his House will (well here) be as soone builded againe, as a Captaine can commaund and set his fieilde in order. But when a great Pallace becometh ruined, many years are required to erect it againe; besides, it serueth (a long while after) as a receptacle for Rascals and Field Run-awaies; or as a warren for Toads and Serpents; or as a Garden for Fresh-water Souldiers.

I cannot chuse, but take pity and compassion on such mens afflictions, that place their whole felicity on such things, whereby they can receiue no praise or honour. For it oftentimes cometh to passe, that the glorie of a goodly building, beareth not his name that caused it to be made; but of the new Purchaser, or the cunning Architect, who deservethly is styled Maister of the worke. But say, that the party himselfe, who was at the charge of the building, doe carry Name and Title thereof: what still glorie is it (but farre greater vanitie) to donee honour by being a Lord, ouer Stones, which are things fencelesse and void of life? To be Maister of a peece of Wood? Or when all is said, a Lord of Chalk and Dust? Were it not much more famous for him, to bee entitled a Lord of many faire Artes and Sciences? Or to win honour by some heroical, worthy, and vertuous actions.

That it ought to be so, ancient Princes and potent Lords, who more esteemed valour and vertue, then matters earthly & transitory, were neuer wont to set their affections on sumptuous buildings: but were altogether studious; and addicted to the excellencie of vertue and prowesse. Was not the house of great Alexander, little, meane, & poorely builded? And yet notwithstanding, the fame of the vertuous Maister thereof, made it esteemed of no lesse value, then other great & royall Palaces, and deferred to entertaine the famous & highly renowned Alexander. He was Caesar, neuer builded but a little house, because he would not be hindered from so many singular vertues, as brought him (although to gouern the great Romaine Empire, Mighty Emper, that conquered most Robbours Africke, had neuer any periculer Lodging: but aboad in one poore village, then in another, to make off wearinesse, and with draw himselfe from the molestacion of great affaires.

Diogenes, the graue Philosopher; that was of such an excellent Spirit, as euery man was in his time: made his dwelling in a poore Tnb; to defend himselfe from the raine, and heate of the Sunne? Hillarius, that good and deuout man, lay very hardly in the Bactrian Deserts, in a poore little Cell, which he had (as Saint Hierome reporteth) more truly made as a Sepulchre, then any House to dwell in. Calisto lodged in a House for his sake, and Calisto hid, & open about his many places, that being one day desired by a friend of his, to send him his Maister: he answered that hee could not spare it, because it seemed to counter-bait his poore lodging. This he spake, beholding a great hole in the roofoe ouer his head, which had been lately broken; and perceiving a darke cloud not farre off, that threatened a present shower of raine. Julius Drusus Ponticus, had (in like manner) a house so broken and thiered, as who soeuer was without, might easily discern and count the inuicables within, and behold what the good hap had in his house.

To speake truly, he thinks they haue a great portion of folly and ambition, that couet to dwell in goodly Palaces, holding little Cottages & meane Houses in contempt and scorn: as if those faire places, and built with litle beauty, were more defensible then the other; from meeting with the assaults of death, and infinite misshaps and distresses befall vs in the world. Such as are read in History, by contemne in the any pleasure, can say with me; that when Thullius Hostilius was smitten with thinder, he was then most merry in his Pallace: by all. W. Henry King of France was slain, he was in the most magnificent and liked all the company saying, they neuer dranke better. Whereon the Slaues said, that it was not of the wine which they had test themfor, for it beeing naught, they were faine to buy in another place. Whereat Heliodorus grew offended; because they brought not according to his command; although the wine was better, when the company was departed, he so tormented the poore Slaues that they dyed. Thus you see what ill fortune it is, to be in subiection to people ouer-seuere, and without any temperance: punishing such as they haue command ouer, rather for doing well, then ill.

CHAP. I.

Of the Emperour of Ethiopia, called Prete-lan, or Preter-lohn: Of his Originall, and Customs of his people.

He Great Emperour of Ethiopia, vnto whom we corruptlie giue the Name of Prete-biter-lan, is neither Priest or sacrificer, though he be (by some) called Prete-lan, and (by his owne people) named Belaglan, that is to say, Joy of incomparable excellencie, or of most value; and by others of them, he is also called lan, which (in their Language) signifieth Mightie. He commandeth ouer seauenty and two Kingdomes, which are all of different languages, hauing their diuersity of Customs, and the colour or complexion of their Faces, are much disfiguring. He is able to leuy in preparation for warre, a Million of fighting men; five hundreded Elephants with their Armour and Munition for encounter, with an infinite number of Horsses and Camels. His Knights or Warlike Soldiers, enter armed to the battell, each wearing a long Coat of Maile, stretching downe closely to their Thighes, a Sallet or Head-piece on the head, a crooked Fauchion by their side, and a Lance with two Steele points of Pikes. Such as haue no Sallets or Head-pieces, doe wear thick quilled Caps on their heads, plaited after the manner of Mameluke Soldiers. The younger sort, carry Darts, Arrowes, and Slings, observing the same Discipline, & be as obedient or well-governed, in ranging their battaile, as we are. They vse Drummes of Brasse, and Trumpets also, to encourage their Soldiers to the fight, which is performed with great hardiment, appointing also, sundry honours, and respectiue rewards, to such as declare themselves to be of highest merit. They doo daily pay the families of their Warriors, and make the Children that are born of them, with a Crosse, which they imprint suddenly in the flesh with an hot Iron, so that the signe remaineth, as if it were natural vnto them.

The King himselfe (most commonly called Prete-lan) after he hath bestowed some houres about State-affaires, when he perceiueth that he is indifferently eased of them: he employeth almost all the remainder of his time, in the study of Holy Readings and Histories; which being done, he vieth a little exercise of the body; and then entering into his Bath, he taketh (afterward) his refection alone by himselfe (as most of our Kings yfe to do) vpon a little Table of Gold, without any cloath or Napkin; and it is set in such a place, as there are diuers degrees or steps in ascending to it. He is serued by Pages, who are of Noble birth; and they bring him his meate (ready cut and prepared) in little Baskets or Panniers, He drinketh Fathers, throw the Kingdoms; and by want of Males, one of the Kinred; being the most vertuous; doth next succeede. This Prester-Iohn gouerneth many Countreies, and boundlesse Seas.

They have greatly erred, in their Maps and Tables; have placed his seat in Affia; being ignorant that there is a double India; the one in Affia; and the other in Ethiopia. This Kingdom consisteth (on the Levant or East side) the Red and Barbarian Seas: And on the South, the Sea called Indus; and on this side, the Region goeth like a Promontorie towards the South, to the Cape called De bona Speranza. Almost at the end of Prester-Iohn's Land, in one of his Kingdoms called Goyanica, is the founte of Ormus, a River that runneth all Ethiopia; and having made a long course, trauelesing many Islands (whereof Mauris is the greatest) it passeth dwelling along Egypt. It consisteth on the North side Egypt & Syria; and on the West side the lower Sybia, and the Mooren. But the Father of Prester-Iohn, being a warlike man, and expert in Armes, amplified and enlarged his Empire; and among other difficulte and perillous Wars he vanquished the Pergolians, who vinted poisoned Arrows, he tooke (by the way) Casana, conquered in battell, and smote off his head, as an infamous and cruel Traitor. This man raygned also in that countrey which looketh plainely Southward to the Sea, called Atumbarique, and is faue to face with the great Ile of Saint Laurence. He ouercame likewise the King of Atumbarique, who afterward became a Christian; and Thermoda Prince of the Blacke people. He vanquished also King Selan, Lord of the Adamanian Moors, whose passage was along time out of Arabia Felix; by the founte of the Red Sea, into the firme Land; neighboring on Ethiopia.

This Abyssinians (for so they are called of all Brutall subiects) haue a Patriarch, whom they name Abana; that is to say, Father. hee hath the gouernment of spiritual things, and soveraigne Authority over the Priests, which are infinite in number; and distinguished by their churches and Monasteries. To persons badly complexioned in manners, education, and corrupted in the right rules of Discipline; hee exerciseth a severe discipline, and excommunication; for that hee ing expelled and abandoned of all men, they wander and dye miserably starved. This Patriarch maketh residence (with his Senate) in the Citie of Barrara; situated in a Mountaine verie auerose and full of Woodes, enuironed with perpetual umbrages, for his better recreation; and there the branches of the broad-leaved Trees are so phiant, & twine themselves in manner of an Arch; that though the Countrey be in the midday Sun, little or no heate at all is there felt: for their continuall dawning with beauid full and liuely springes, compleateth the grace of their freshnes and verdure. This Patriarch receiveth a great leyle of tithes, as also the Rerennies of the King Prester-Iohn, who is greatly giuen and affected to Religion, as appeareth by his liberal policies and deuotion.

He distributeth these Treasures to the poore, and to Hospitals, maintaining infinite Monasteries of Friars of diuers orders of Saint Anthony, of Saint Francis, of Saint Augustine, of Saint Dominick, of the Calcarians; and of the Stacharians, many whereof the sendeth yearly to Jerusalem, to visit the Sepulchre of our Lord Iesus Christ.

When the Patriarch dyeth, such Riches of his as is found remaining remaineth to the Exchequer Royall; and then they proceed to new election of another, that shall be iudged to be the most vertuous. Hee liueth usually, although in bee lawfull son a Priest to take a Wife in Marriage; and yet he may haue none, but one. The only glories of Prester-Iohn and his Ethiopian are, that they do repute themselves to be the most ancient Nation among men; because they haue alwayes liued in their iurisdiction libertie; and were neuer conquered: either by Scythians, nor Arabs, nor Indians, nor by the Romans; but they themselves vanquished King Cambyses, and once they had put him to shame. It is reported they were once true and unitate glorie indeed; which is, that they were one of the first nations in receipt of the Christian Faith; yet neuer from the verie beginning thereof. By means of the Emperors, vnto the famous Queene Candace, who was baptized by Saint Phillip. And what since shew Conversion, they haue continually kept the same Religion to so many hundreds of years. A briefe history during this time they haue

A Letter sent from the most Mighty David, King of Aethiopia, to the most Holy Father, Pope Clement the seventh.

Of Happy and Holic Father, ordained of God to be the Consecrator of men, and to sit in the seat of Saint

Peter, to whom the Keyes of the Kingdom of Heauen was giuen, and whatsoever he bound or loosed on earth, the like should be done in Heauen, as Iesus Christ himselfe spake; and Saint Matthew hath written in his Gospel: The King to whose name Lyons doe reuerence, and by the grace of God named in Baptism, Manastiel, that is to say, inspired by the Virgin; but after I took the Royall Scepter, was named David, Beloued of God, a Pillar of the Faith of the Line of Isa; the sonne of David, the sonne of Solomon, sonne to the Pillar of Isa, sonne of the seed of Isa, sonne to the hands of Mary, by carnall succelsion, and son of Nebuchadnezzar, Emperor of high Ethiopia, of many great Kingdomes, Iurisdiccions, and Landes: King of Arax, of Cassata, of Antigara, of Angara, of Barr, of Belengangans, of Adara, of Pangana, of Ganama, whose subjects Nilus, of Amara, of Burganadi, of Amber, of Tigremallion, of Sabina, who reigned the Queen of Saba, of Burganadi, and Lord to farre as to Egypt. All these Landes are vnder my power, and mine others, great and small, which I neither number or expresse by their names, as induced hereto by any prider but only to the end, that the most fauourable God may be praised, who hath bestowed Christian Religion on so many great Kingdomes, and hath enlarged to me so great a grace, as continually I may do him service, having made me a Capitall enemy to the Mastris, and such as worship Idoles. haue beene generally (euen as yet they are at this day) mollesht, assaulted, and enuironed with Moores, Saracens, & the Idolatrous Worshippers of Mahomet. And yet, notwithstanding all those cruel Tempests (which heretofore destroyed the Romaine Empiro, and the very greatest part of Christendom, Ethiopia could neuer hitherto be joyled, either of their Dominion or Religion, albeit some Idolatrous mixture hath crept thereinto: which is the lesse to bee marvelled at, if we may credit their own saying, in alleging their constancie and Antiquity, because they deriue their Noble Original and continuance, from the royall Kings, David and Solomon; of whom, the blessed Virgin Mary (Mother to our Sauour, defended, and he himselfe, according to the flesh.)

And afterward, in the yeare one thousand five hundred thirte three, Pope Clement the seventh, and the Emperour Charles the fift, being met together at Bologna, an Ambassadour came to them, from valiant David King of Ethiopia, being named Don Francis Aluarez, a Portugall; to whom audience was giuen in the publicke Consistory, the 23. day of January. There hee presented the Letter (ensuing) to his Holinesse; & (in name of his King) he gaue the obedience observed from Antiquity, and likewise in his name, presented a Crosse of Golde, waighing a pound; having first kissed his foot, hand, and mouth. The Letter was written in the Ethiopian Language; after and translated into the Portugall tongue; then into Latine, and againe into Italian, and it was read by the Secretary to his Holinesse in the publicke presence.

Or Goyanica

wer and Religion. I am in my Realmes, a strong Collumb of the Faith, and haue no neede of any other, but put in God my whole hope and succour, he hauing alwaies sustained and gouerned me since such time as the Angell of God spake to Saint Phillip, when hee taught the true & sincere Faith vnto the Eunuch, belonging to the potent Queene Candace, Qui of Ethiopia, when hee returned from Ierusalem to Gaza, where Saint Phillip baptized the said Eunuch, by whom likewise the Queen was afterward baptized, with a great part of her house and people. The successors of which famous Queene, did neuer since faile in true Christianity, but haue continued euermore firme & constant in the faith, so that my predecessours haue not bene holpen by any but God, and haue extended the Christian Faith, as I haue laboured to do the like.

I keepe my selfe impaled within mine own limits, like a Lyon compassed with in a thicke Forrest, strong against the Moores, and other Nations enemies to Christ, that will not heare the worde of God, nor my faithfull exhortations. I haue pursued them with my sword in my hand, and (by little and little) chased them from their Nestes, by the helpe of God, who neuer failed mee; which hath not happened in like manner to other Christian Kings; for when they wold extend their limits, they went not against Infidels; as easily they might haue done, by means of assailing one another, besides their further aid of your Holinesse Benediction, wherein I also claime a part. For among my Charters, there is found the Letter of Pope Eugenius, which he sent heeretofore (with his benediction) to the King of the seed of Isaac; of which benediction, I haue iouissance, and highly delight in it.

Beside this, I holde the Temple of Ierusalem in great honor, and thither I send goodly offerings by my Pilgrims, and much more rich and costly should they bee, if the wayes were assured from Infidels, who beside their robbing the messengers of their presents, do hinder them also from free passage. And if the voyage to Rome were free and open, I wold come in familiarity and company of the Roman Church, as other Christian Princes do, to whom I am not inferiour. For, euen as they do, I confesse one direct faith, and one Catholicke Church; I beleue sincerely in the holy Trinity, one only God; and I beleue the virginity of our blessed Lady. I hold and keepe the Articles of the Faith, as they were written by the Apostles.

At this present, the Lord God by the hand of the most puissant King * Emmanuel, hath opened the way, to the end that we may visit one another by Embassies, and (ioyntly in faith) serue one God; But it so pleased God, that his Ambassadors being in our Court, they told vs tydings of his death, and the succession of his son (my Brother Iohn) in the Crown. So that the death of the Father, brought me not more griefe and discontent, then the happy comming of his son to the Kingdom, caused ioy and gladnesse.

Aed such is my hope, that ioyning our forces and Armies together, we may run thorough the Prouinces of the Moores, and vicerly destroy them. By which means, Christians may (more commodioully) go and returne from the Temple of Ierusalem. And as I earnestly desire, that I may be made partaker of the Ioue of God, in the Temples of the holy Apostles Paul and Peter; so do I wish to haue the Benediction of the Vicar of Iesus Christ, which (without any doubt) I repute you to be.

I heare manie things also of your sanctitie to Pilgrimes, which go from our Regions vnto Ierusalem; and thence to Rome, returning backe miraculouly, which hath bene to mee vnspokeable pleasure. But indeed, I should receiue much greater contentment, if my Ambassadors could vnto a shorter way, and bring me (at all times) tidings from you, which I hope they will doo hereafter, sometime before I die. God assisting, who I pray maintaine you in health and holinesse. So be it. I kisse your Holiesse, and humble pray your Holinesse to send me your blessing.

N the name of God the Father Almighty, Creator of Heauen and of earth, and of all things visible and inuisible. In the Name of God the Sonne, Iesus Christ, who is one and the same with him, from the beginning of the world, Light of Lights, verie God of very God. In the name of God the holy spirit, liuing God, proceeding from God the Father: [1] the King, to whose Name Lyons doo reuerence, send you these Letters, and by the Grace of God; am called Alham-Timbil, that is to say, Incesse of the Virgin, the sonne of King Dauid, the sonne of Salomon, son of the King of the hand of Mary, the son of Nahum by carnall succession, sonne of S. Peter and S. Paul by grace; Peace bee with you iust Lord, Holy Father, Mightie, pure and consecrate, that is the chief of all Byshops, not fearing any, nor anie one being, that may speake malediction of you; who is vigilant ouer foules, the friend of Pilgrims, a Holy Maister, Preacher of faith, and capitall enemy vnto all things that offend conscience, a louer of good manners, a holy man, lauded and blessed of all.

O happy holy Father, I render ye obedience with great reuerence, you being the peace of all, deferring all goodnesse, procuring (by duty) that al should render ye obfeyance, as the holie Apostles commanded, next vnto God. It is truly faide of you, and the same Apostles commanded vs, to do reuerence to Byshops, Archbishops and Prelates. Also to loue you in place of a Father, reuerencing ye in place of a King, and to haue Faith in you as in God. For this reason, I bowing my Knees humbly to the earth, doo acknowledge you with a pure and sincere heart for my Father; and that I am your Sonne.

O most Holie and mightie father, why haue you not sent some one hither to vs, to the end, that you might bee informed of my life and health, you being the shepheard and I your sheepe? For the good Shepheard neuer forgetteth his flocke. I should not seem to be too far from your Regions, but that your Messengers may haue the meanes to come to him; considering that the King of Portugal, Emmanuel, your Son, hath verie commodioully, and from much farther Regions of kinde, sent me his Ambassadors; And if God had deferred a little longer his calling to heauen, doubtles those matters that then were in discussion between vs, wold haue succeeded to an happy end. But my desire is at this present (euen so much as can be) to heare good, wholesome and precious tidings of your holinesse, by messengers truly and faithful, & sent expressly: because I haue neuer receiued any word from your Holinesse, but heard onely some final matters, by such as haue gon on pilgrimage in my name, and yet neuer brought me any of your letters. But in our interrogations, they haue answered (vncertainly enough), that having paid their vows and deuotions at Ierusalem, they went afterward to Rome, to visit the ports of the Holy Apostles, hauing first of all vnderstood, that it was easie enough for them to abide in those Countries, and to be accounted as Christians. And finally, it pleased mee highly to heare their discourse, by means whereof (in a sweete conceiued imagination) me thought I beheld and contemplated the figure of your Holy face, which seemed to me like that of an Angell; and I confesse to haue and honor it as Angellicall. But assuredly it wold be more sweet and acceptable to mee, devoutly to contemplate your words and Letters. Wherefore, I praye you at this present; that it wold please you to send me your Nuncio, with your benediction to reioyce my hart.

For seeing we are both of one faith & Religion, me thinks that (about all things else) I should require you to do this. Most humbly praying you also, that as you put the Gold Ring vpon your finger, and the Chaîne of Gold about your necke: such so, you wold place my amitie in the depth of your heart; that the memorie thereof may neuer bee lost. For by kinde Wordes, and Great ous Letters, amity encreaseth stronglie; especially when it is embraced by holie peace, from whence (doubtlesse) all humane ioy proceedeth. And like as the man that is extream thirstie, desireth earnestly fresh water, as is to be found in the sacred Writings; euen so my heart longeth, to haue Newes by Messengers and Letters from farre-off Countries, where in I take incredible pleasure. And not only if I might hear some matter of your Holinesse: but also, if such Newes be certaine, which haue been reported to me, concerning Christian Princes, which ioy would be answerable to that, which Conquerors get by rich spoiles and purchases.

Which now at this time may the more easily be done, because the King of Portugal hath opened the passage, which long time hath bene vsed, sending me his Ambassadors, accompanied with many valiant Knights, in the time of his Father Emanuel, & while he liued. Since when, I haue receiued neither Embassie nor Letters from any Christian King, much lesse from any Pope. Albeit in our Rolles, or Treasury of Charters, which belonged sometime to our great Grandfather, is preserved the memorie of Letters from a Pope of Rome, named Eugenius, sent into these parts, when the seed of Iacob reigned, the King of Kingdomes throughout all Ethiopia, & the superscription of the saide Letters was in this manner: Eugenius Pope of Rome, to our Well-beloued Sonne, the King of the seede of Iacob; King of Kingdomes throughout all Ethiopia, worthy to be reuerenced. And by the summary of the saide Letters, hee declared, that his Sonne Iohn Paleologus, who was as forgotten two yeares before, K. of the Romanes, was called from Constantinople, to celebrate the sacred Councell, and with him went Ioseph the Patriarke of Constantinople, accompanied with a great number of Arch-bishops, Bishops, and Prelates of all sorts; and among them also assisted the Procurators of the Patriarke of Antioch, of Alexandria, and of Ierusalem, all assembled with him in loue of the holie faith and religion. By meanes whereof the vnitie of the Church was confirmed, with grace of the Lord, and al difficulties of the past times (which appeared to be erroneous, and contrary to Christian religion) taken away: which things, being by good order established and confirmed, the same Pope had giuen to all the world occasion of reioicing, as to each one particularly.

Now at this time, wee send you this Book of pope Eugenius, that hath alwaies bin kept by vs without corruption. Wee would also in like maner haue sent ye, the tract of the order and power of the pontificall benediction, had not the Volume bin ouer great, for truly it is as big as the Booke of S. Paul to the Gentiles. And the Legats which brought these things hither on the Popes behalfe, were Theodorus, Petrus, Dysimus, and George, seruants of Iesus Christ. But you (most holie Father, shall do well to command that the Bookes of your Rols may be turned out and perused, where I think you shall find some memory of this which I haue written vnto ye, that if any thing be referred on our behalfe, it may be diligently registered among our Bookes, that perpetuall memory thereof may remaine to our posterity & successors. And truly, I account him most happy, whose memory is in letters preserved in the holy City of Rome, the seat of S. Peter and S. Paule, who are Lords in Heauen, & Iudges of the whole world. And because my beleefe is such, I send ye these presents, to the end, that I may win grace with your holinesse, and with your most sacred Colledge, hoping that from thence will come holie benediction, with encrease of all goodnesse.

Moreover, I do intreat your Holinesse to send me some Images of the Saints, & principally of the virgin Mary, to the end that the name of hir and of your holines, may be often in my mouth and memory, and that I may continually take delight in your presents. I also require ye to send me some Artizans and workmen, that know how to make those Images, and swordes and armor of all kinds, to fight withal; as also such as can engrave in Gold and Silver, Maister-Carpenters, Architects, and Malons, to make houses of stone. And men that are skillfull in Casting of Lead, Copper and Brasse, to couer the tops of those houses. Beside these men, we shall highly esteeme such worke in Glasse, or such as are Falconers, & such as can make Instruments of Musicke: as also such as can play on Flutes & trompets. Al which workmen, I desire that may bee of your house; or if you bee not so sufficiently provided, your Holinesse may easily win such from other Christian Kingdomes your children, who are all obedient vnto your command: assuring yee, that no sooner shall those workmen heere arriue, but they shall be held in great honour, according to the severall merit of euery man, and shall receiue of my liberality, ample courtiesse, reward, and wages: with this condition, that if any one heereafter, be desirous to returne into his owne Country, hee shall depart from my Court so well recompenced, as shall giue him cause to rest contented, carrying hence with him, such things as himselfe shall please, for I will not keep any man against his mind, when I haue receiued some benefit of his Art.

Now am I to speake of other things, and would gladly demand of you Holie Father, why you doe not admonish the Christian Kingdomes your Children, to agree among themselves, as it becommeth brethren, considering they are of your flock and you their Shepheard? And wel doth your Holinesse know that which is commanded in the Gospell, where it is saide: Every Kingdome diuided in it selfe shall be desolate. For if the Kingdomes of Christendome were vnit-ed and leagued together, easilie might they destroy the Mahometans, & all other Infidels, and all their actions would succede to their wish, ruining the Sepulchre of that false Prophet, which is in the City of Meca. Wherefore I pray ye, to labour a firme league of amitie among them, exhorting them to lend me fauour and succor. For on all the Confinings of my Kingdomes, I am enuironed with Moores, Mahometans, and wicked people, who (neuerthelessse) do hold such fidelity together, as wee see not the like: They interchangeably aide one another, making alliance Kings with Kingdomes, and Lords with Lords, in great Loyaltie and constancie, and all against vs: I here is a King Maore my Neighbor, whom al the other Maore-Kings (his Neighbour) do furnish with Armes, horses, and all other Instruments for warre. These men, are the Kingdomes of India, Persia, Arabia, and Egipt, by whom I daily receiue much grieuance; beholding the enimitie of Christianity ioyned together in brotherly charity, enjoying peace: & Christian Kingdomes my Brethren, not according together in any manner, nor are moued at their pittagies.

or any way giuing mee succour, as is the duty of al Christians. And so much the rather, because the most filthy sons of Mahomet so ad one another. Nor that (in this respect) I would haue you think that I desire any forces for such an enterprise, for I haue sufficient of mine owne, and more then I need. But I intreat only your Prayers and Orisons to God, and couet to find grace with your holinesse, & with all other Kings my Brethren.

This is the reason why I seeke amitie with you and them, to the end, of being furnished abundantly, with such things as are before required, to the feare and astonishment of the Moores, and that my neighbours (enemies vnto the Christians name) may know, that Christian Kingdomes (my Brethren) can giue me fauor and assistance, which truly appertaineth to our common honor, since we agree in vnitie of Faith and true religion. We are resolved to continue firme in this counsell & deliberation, which seemeth to vs, most assured, perfect, and profitable. God fulfill your desires to the praise of Iesus Christ, and of God our Father, whose name be praised of al, in al ages. And you holie Father, embrace mee with all the Saints of Iesus Christ, which are at Rome: and in the same embracement, I pray yee to receiue al the inhabitants of my Kingdomes, and they that remaine in Ethiopia. Thanks be rendered to our Lord Iesus Christ, by your spirit.

Your Holinesse shall receiue these Letters, by the helpe of my Brother, King Iohn; son to the most potent King Emanuel; by the handes of Frances Aluarez our Ambassador.

CHAP. II.

Of the ouer great Superstition of the Queen of Maury, who lost her mighty Estate, by putting too much confidence in the predictions of Astrologers.

That Superstition is a verie great vice; bringing manie discommodities and daungers: vnto such as are thereto inclined, may Ordinarily bee seene. As for example:

Note the vain opinion of this world, in meeting some accidents on the way.

The Romans were greatly addicted unto superstitions.

Cicero in Lib. de Divinat.

The Tartars of Asia very superstitious.

* Casters of mens fortune by the day & hour of their birth.

If a man (returning from some journey, or setting forth upon it, his business being serious and important, if hee chance to meet an old Woman on the way, or perceiveth a Hare to crosse the passage before him, he presently takes it for an euill encounter, and to preface some perill towards him.

Some Huntsmen also are of opinion, that if they meete a Priest or a Friar upon the way, as they ride on Hunting, they shall surely (that day) not take any thing. Some others, if they but heare a Pie to chatter, they shall shortly vnderstand of euill tidings. There are some also, so strangely incensed, that they verlie beleue, if they meete a Serpent or Snake: that day no inconvenience can betide them; with diuers other vanities beside, which fauour much more of Paganisme, then of any Christianity. Such superstitious were deeply grounded among the Romaine people, yea, much more then in any other, witnesseth the Auspices, that is; their Consultations which they would make, before they began any war or expedition, by the obseruation of Birds, beholding their flight, listning their songs, and whether they fed wel or ill; in regard whereof, they lost many commodities in their warres. And it is not to be doubted, but that euerie superstitious Captain, will hardly do any thing of desert; which Cicero well noted in his Bookes of Diuination, and maketh a mockery thereof.

This follie is dispersed thorough the world, but yet in some Countries more then other. As among the Asian Tartars who are so much addicted to iudicial Astrologie, and therein so superstitious, as they will neither build a House, Village, Cittie, Temple, or any other building whatsoever, but at laying the first stone, they will set downe in Writing, the day, the hour, the moneth, and the season. The like they do at the Nativity of their Children, then they consult with Astrologers and Gemethiques, who then do fore-tell what pleareth themselves. And these people are now (at this day) more superstitious in these affaires, then euer they were. And this is the matter which I am now to speake of, in shewing that a woman (being too much ouer-swayed by these superstitions, lost one of the verie fairest Estates in the world, and how it happened, I shall briefly relate.

The Tartarian Annals do declare, that there was a King of Maugy, named Jada, who being on Hunting, epyed a great Lake of Fresh-Water, thorough the middelt whereof, passed so strong a Riuer, as was able to beare a Boat, which came from the East Indies, a rich country. Hereon he considered, that for Commerce and good of his Kingdom, the Territorie round about it was fruitfull, and the Lakes Water nourished great store of Fish, a faire Hauen also, being not farre off thence, standing for the benefit of all Windes, being on the Ocean Sea, which is (almost) continually calme, and in that quarter it would be verie conuenient to build a Cittie. Having had Communication in this case with his Counsell, and they allowing the goodnesse of his conceit, hee gaue order to them, for further proceeding in the purpose: this happened in the yeare of the worlde, according to their supputation, five thousand, sixe hundred. This Cittie was founded vpon piles, and according to their Custome, they consulted with their Gemethiques, to know if this Cittie should flourish and continue for any length of time. Whereon they answered, that it should neuer fall into anie others power, but only of them as should be of the Lignage of Jada, first founder thereof, vntill such time, as a man (who should haue an hundred eies, all clearly seeing) came to besiege it. The Cittie was named Quinsy, a worde corrupted of Kynsin, or Checin, in the Lanian tongue, which signifieth a Happy Cittie, and whereof, the whole Prouince where it is seated, tooke the Name of Quinsy. There are two Castles, which command on the Sea, and are adioyning vnto the Lake before named; and there doo the Waters of the Riuer of Babala, yeelde surrender of themselves, as they make their passage ouer the Lake.

It is seated about forty five degrees on this side the Tropickes, in the sixth climate, and the tenth Paralell. This goodly Cittie containeth (as such as haue Voyaged thither say) five good Leagues or thereabout in circuit: which is verie likely to be true, by reason it is erected in the water; and the streetes are verie large, the Pallace great, and forced Garden-plots: the whole bodie being planted at ease, & so well disposed, as a man may goe thorough rough all the Cittie on Land, and in the Channels also, which are large, easie, & great, because the Barkes may the sooner passe them. Horles also may easily passe through the streets, to bring such things as are necessaries for them of the Cittie: And there is no enclosed Cittie in the whole Vniuers, either on this side, or beyond the Equator; of such wonderfull greatnesse. In regard of the goodlie Scituation, it required no long time of peopling, & frequentation of Merchants: strangers, coming from many Countries: as from the rich Bastern Indies, by the Riuer of Babala; and by Sea, the Ethiopijs, Armenians, Persians, Arabians, Egyptians, Scythians, and others. Hereupon the King failed not to graunt good store of immunities, to draw inhabitants thither: which sorting to his expectation; hee builded a verie beautiful Pallace, that standeth yet intirely whole.

Now it came to passe five hundred yeares after, that there reigned a King, very rich, named Fasfur; by whom, the Kingdomes were in the great Prouince of Maugy, which is said to be one of the verie greatest in the world; and by whom, the Lands and Seigneuries were so well fortified, as they were thought to be invincible. By means whereof, none durst assaile or meddle with them; and this was the cause, that both the King and his people left off, and suffered the exercise of Armes to grow quite out of vse. For euerie Cittie was circled and engirt with great and deepe ditches (brim-full of Water) as also with huge walles, verie strongly flanked with goodlie Towers & vnder-props. And in those times, he had (at the least) the number of one thousand and five hundred; but now they can reckon no more then eleuen hundred; and yet hee had no Horles for warre, or anie other seruice; and this assurance occasioned, that the King made no vse of time; but continually tooke his delight & pleasure. He had ordinarily in his Court a thousand Gentlemen, beside his traine of Seruants and Officers, which was great and honourable. Neuerthelesse, hee held Iustice in highest esteeme, affecting peace and tranquillity, and he was verie mercifull. No man durst offend, or do wrong to his Neighbor, but he was sure of severe punishment. In breefe, his Kingdom was of such freedom, and afsurance, that (many times) Trade-men left their shops wide open in the Night, yet none durst be so bolde, as enter into them.

Strangers and Trauailers passing thorough the Countrey, might goe both night and day in safe securitie, without feare of any man. In like manner, the King was verie kind and charitable to the poore, and neuer suffered such as were in extreme pouerty to complaine of their want and indigence. Moreouer, euerie yeare (by diligent search) he assembled together a great number of children, exposed as Orphans, and forsaken of their Parents (whereof sometimes there were twentie thousand) and them he caused to be kept & brought vp at his own charge; beside many other Charities which would require much time to rehearse, and which is not vsed by Christian Princes elsewhere. And although he was a Pagan and Idolater; yet hee suffered Iewes and Christians (whereof some were Nestorians) to liue in all his Kingdoms; and these things were in the yeare of Grace, 1268.

Cublay, King of the Tartars, was then accounted one of the greatest Princes in the world; for he had (as some haue left in writings) thirty or forty great Kingdomes. Such as made any doubt hereof, let them read M. Paulus, who was (at that time) in those parts, a verie true Author; and they shall find much more then I can heere speake of. His Captaines gaue him to vnderstand, that they could not find any more lands to conquer: for the Sea, and verie huge deserts had set a period at their Conquests, only this Kingdom of Maugy excepted, which continued on soine lands of the great Chan Cublay. Now, albeit Fasfur was a friend, and had giuen no occasion of making warre vpon him, only because he was almost as powerfull as the said Cublay, yet Cublay was now aduised to contend for superiouritie; and to make his great neighbor tributary vnto him. So minding to vse his men of war, he found them at variance among themselves, and that a great business was first to be ended, touching his two nephewes, whereof I haue formerly spoken. Hereupon, Nestorian a neerer Kinsman to Cublay, was chosen for this expedition; albeit hee was not then in the Court; but the Commissioners being directed to his abiding, the king had newes sent him, that

This would do well in all parts of the world.

The extraction of Basam Chinfa, a valuable Balsam.

The education of Basam.

The conquests of Basam Chinfa.

Basam entered into Maugy, and summoned the King and ducers Cities.

he died two dayes before of a strange sickness. Wherefore, the charge of this businesse, was transferred to Basam Chinfa, the Sonne of a publicke poore Woman, not auouched by anie Father, and he was borne with many spots on his bodie; verie neere resembling the eyes of a man; whereby hee had the surname given him of Basam Chinfa, which signifieth in their Language, the sight of an hundred eyes.

This poore Boy was brought vp by his Mother, so well as her pouerty would permit, not hauing any man that would auouch her to be his wife. As he grew in stature, he addicted his minde to follow one of the Emperors Armies, being at first but a Lackey or Drudge, that carried a Soldiers furniture after him. Afterward, hauing attained to more yeares and strength, he was entertained as a Soldier, becoming first a Corporall: next Ensigne, Lieutenant, Captaine, or Chiefe, then a Colonnell: at length, being knowne a man of vnderstanding, valiant, and fortunate, he had the charge of an Army, which hee guided so successfully, that he annexed to the Crowne of Cublay, Emperour of Tartaria, and his Maister, ten great Prouinces or Kingdomes, to wit; Athena, Caratena, Bengala, Cangua, Amu, Tholomana, Gnigru, Ciranfu, Ciangli, and Tadisu: and he neuer attempted any matter, but he brought it to full effect, except the conquest of Piamfu, whereof I am to speake elsewhere.

Basam entered with a great Armie into the Prouince of Maugy, and summoned the King to render himselfe tributary, or else he would warre vpon him; for and in the name of his Prince Cublay; but the King made answer, that he had no such intention. Wherefore, at his first arrival, he besiedged the Citie of Coniangangy, and summoned the Citizens thereof to yeelde themselves: as also, to take an Oath of fidelity and obedience to the Emperor Cublay, which they likewise refused to do. By means whereof, hauing heard their answer, he raised his siege, and departed thence, without offering them anie other harme or molestation. Afterward, hee did as much to the next Citie, which also made the like refusal.

Pasing on, he summoned four or five other Cities; all which refused yeilding:

but coming to the sixt, he assailed it in great furie, and took it by assault: which being done, he returned backe vpon the other Cities, which he toke and tinned, so that in very short time, he subdued & tooke twelue Cities. For, he had in his Army verie braue and valiant men, all pickt or choise Soldiers, bold and courageous. And the Great Cham, sent him another Armie, as a fresh supply of as great power as the first, which gaue great terror to them of Maugy, causing them to wax desperate, and their hearts to faile them. And King Esfur himselfe, hauing had such deare experience of the courage and valour of the Tartars, and perceiving how they proceeded on still in their vndanted fury, became so much amazed, that he betooke himselfe to sea, with so many people as hee could muster together, withdrawing into an impregnable Island, hauing with him about a thousand ships; and leauing the guard of the Citie of Quinsay, to the disposition of his wife, there to haue her best support & defence.

In this extremity the Queen contained very manly courage: and carried her selfe so proudly, as nothing wanted whatsoeuer, that was iudged necessary for ayd and defence of the Citie. For shee had fiftie thousand men of warre; both Inhabitants and strangers, and twelue or fiftene thousand Diuers, men that could abide long time vnder water, and pierce the bottomes of the enemies ships to sink them in the Riuer. The Citie was well furnished with Victuals; and all needfull Munition, to endure a long siege, impeaching (euerie way) the entrance into the Haven, by the Sea. Neuertheless, the Queene and the chiefe Commanders were possessed with ouer-great superstition, till they heard, that he who maintained the siege, was named Basam Chinfa, that is (as we haue formerly said) the sight of an hundred eyes. This made both her and them to tremble with feare, remembering both the Father and son: and also, because it was registred in the books, which were kept in the publick treasure, that neuer should the Citie be surprized, but by a man that had an hundred eyes; and therefore they refused to yeelde it, though it seemed a matter wholly impossible, yea quite against nature, that a man should haue an hundred eyes. As they were vpon the point of surrendering the the Citie by compulsion; the Christians, who had liued in all quietnesse in those Countries; by the means of their Bishop Gaspur, declared in the full Senate, where the Queen also was present: that no regard was to be made of such Prognostickes, as proceeded from lying Mathematicians, and Generalliaques, to whom if the Mans Name appeared for to haue the sight of an hundred eyes; yet notwithstanding, the man himselfe had onely but two, as other men haue, and these were but the illusions of Sathan; the Father of lying, hereupon, some in the Senate-house alleged many Histories, which happened in their time; to shew how vaine these fruitiuous predictions were. Neuertheless, the Cowardise of diuers, that neuer vnderstood the nature of warre, or what honour attended on bold hardiment, they being of the greatest in authority, and relying on these foolish superstitions; concluded to surrender the Citie. Wherefore, hauing made (by consent of the Queene) an honest capitulation: they suffered the Enemy to enter; that kept faith exactly with them. Whereat Basam was not a little amazed, for hee imagined his strength neuer able to surprize it. Cublay being aduertised thereof, caused generall processions to be made, and sollemne sacrifices performed to the Sun; mocking at the superstition of the Quinsayans, and admiring the vnmatchable fortune attending on Basam. As for the Queene, shee retired her selfe to the Court of the great Cham, who received and vsed her very honourably: and concerning the King of Maugy her Husband, he continued his abode in the Island, where he ended his daies.

At that instant also, the nine Kingdomes contained in that Prouince, yeilded themselves: except the Citie of Stanfu, which out-held the Tartars Army three whole yeares. And it had neuer bene taken, but that M. Paulus, and his Father and Vnckle (by permission of the Tartarian Emperour) made Engines of Wood, which hurled great Stones into the Citie, and did such harme to the so long besiedged; as they were constrained to yeelde themselves. Thus you may perceiue, that superstition is the cause of much euill; for doubtlesse, if the Queene and the besiedged had still kept Quinsay, and the other Cities: an hundred yeares labour could not haue conquered the Kingdomes of Maugy.

And therefore I would entreat the gentle Readers, not to conceiue anisse of me, for not following the writing of M. Paulus, in his description of Quinsay, for hee saith: That there is in the midst thereof a lake, which containeth ten miles in circuit; and that the Citie is 34 miles in compass; and hath fise hundred thousand Houses in it. I rather thought fit, to follow a hatel finde written in a Dialogue, made by Garcia Oriu, a Portugall Philisitan, who saith: That it is not about thirty fise yeares since he wrote, that it contained not about foure or fues leagues in compass; being seated wholly in a Lake, and hath not about threecore thousand Houses in it. I know not whether it be diminished, since the said Penetian came thence: It valued in reuenues, fiftene Millions, and six hundred thousand Crowns, to the King yearly, in regard of his right (by way of leuie) vpon merchandises; and yet not counting the Toulle laid on Salt, and this was but the ninth part of the great Prouince of Maugy. At this day, as I heard by a Iesuite of Chalors in Champaigne, named Gabris, who told me, that he remained there about two yeares: and he saith, that the valuation is much more now at this instant.

Augustus Cesar made better vse of his superstition, then the men of Quinsay, or their Queene did; for a little before the last bataille, which hee had against his Competitor Anthony: as he went from his Land Army, to that on the Sea, hee met a Suter or Victualer to the Campe, driving an Ass laden before him, of whom he demanded, how hee was called: the Suter made answer; that his owne name was Eutichus, and his Asses Name Nichita: which two Greeke Names signified nothing else, but Fortunate victorie. Hereupon, the said Cesar, preiaged by this encounter, that he should be victorious ouer Anthony, who contended for the Empire of the World; and that the Gods had designed it vnto him. On this affluence, he forth-with gaue battell by Sea to Pompey, quite contrary, through a great distrust, that he could never saue himselfe; nor finde any ayde or assured retreat, after he lost the battaile at Pharsalia against Julius Cesar; grounded his folly on this occasion. In his flight, passing by the Isle of Cyprus, to the end hee might breath a while; with-drew into Egypt. And being entertained (by the Gouverneur) into the City of Paphos, where his lodging was prepared in a Pallace, builded in a very pleasant plot vpon the Sea, he desired to know who builded it, and how it was named. Answer was returned, that the place was called Cacobasilaea, which is as much to say, as Bad Harbour. In regard of which name, it appearing to him to be an euill presage: hee would not enter into it, but passed on farther, and tooke Shipping very suddenly. Being verilie perished, that this accident to him at this Pallace, did presage; that he should soone enough meete with a bad lodging to last all his life time. Being landed in Egypt, to deriue some succour from the King, whose Father he had reuered in his Kingdome: he caused him to be trayterously slaine, as thinking to doe a great fauour to victorious Julius Cesar.

Sylla, by not being superstitious, won the battaile.

But Sylla did better, who perceiving his Army ready for to giue battaile to the power of Mithridates, King of Pontus; yet all being out of heart, as holding that the day would be lost, because both the Priests and Soothsayers had obserued, that the like day had been alwaies vnfortunate to the Romaines. For it was registred in their Calendar, that (as on the very same day) three hundred and fixe Noble Gentlemen, all of the Fabij, were slaine in the Vwarre, by secret Ambushes of the Veientines, who had long time warred against the, hard by * Cremera; and many worthy Capitaines beside, had receiued great mischances on the same day. But Sylla, who was no way superstitious, encouraged his Army, saying, Let vs show our selues so valiant this day, that although it hath bene unfortunate heretofore: yet it may proue happy to vs. So, suddenly giuing battaile, they won the day. Some other would not haue done it, but rather would haue giuen credit to the dissemblings of Wizzards and Sacrificers. But to punish such men, for weakening the courage of Souliours prepared to fight: some of them haue bene put into the front of the battaile, where they haue bene slaine, and very few others. In breefe, superstition neuer caused any goodnesse; but hath procured many great losses.

CHAP. III.

Of the Order and Knight-hood of the Templers; and how long it continued.

IN the yeare of our Lord, one thousand, ninety six, some Christian Princes (of diuers Nations) made a Congregation, by the counsel of an Hermit named Peter, a man of honest and holy life. It was then determined, to goe for the Conquest of the Holy Land, which was in the power of prophane Infidels, who had kept it foure hundred and ninety years. Among the chiefe in this action, was Godfrey of Buillon, Duke of Lorraine, the most apparant of them all, and he that carried the greatest merit. It pleased God, that after many battailes, which lasted for the space of three yeares: the City of Ierusalem, and many other Cities in Syria and Iudea were conquered, beside diuers other neighbouring Prouinces. Afterward, all the Christian Princes hauing regard to the high deserts of Godfrey; elected him King of Ierusalem: and Arnulphus, Arch-bishop of Pisa, was likewise created Patriarch, by Pope Calixtus the second.

Godfrey of Buillon remaining King of Ierusalem, there also continued in his company, many great and worthy Christians, who daily made warre vpon the Infidels, as well round about Ierusalem, as in other neighbouring Countries. Which being vnderstood by diuers faithfull Christians in the westerne parts, and on what termes the affaires stood stood beyond the Seas: great numbers of people went continually thither, some (in meere zeale) to assist Gods seruice, and regaine the vsurped Landes; and others on voyages, to visite the Holy Sepulcher. Now, about a yeare after his Coronation, Godfrey of Buillon dyed, and his Brother, named Baldwin (a man equall enemy way to the others merits) was crowned King in his stead. During whose raigne, among many other that resorted daily thither: were nine Gentlemen, intimate friends and great companions, of whom we finde the names but of two; who (it may be) were the chiefeest, to wit: Hugues de Paganis, and Gaudre de Saint Adelman. These men being come to Ierusalem, and hauing well contemplated the Countrey, and all the neighbouring places: they found, that at the Port of Iapha, and other places of their passage, there were many busie spies vpon the waies, that daily both robbed and kild Pilgrimes and Passengers. In regard whereof, after good and mature deliberation, they concluded, with the helpe of many more, (for it is to be presumed, that they leagued themselves with other people of the same mind) to make a vow, for doing some seruice acceptable to God, and to employ their whole life time, in making the waies secure & passable, or else to loose their liues in the enterprise, while the other Christians were busied in other places, fighting with the Infidels. Persecuting in this religious purpose; they tooke (as an assigned place for their retreat) a Church, called, The Fishy Temple, by permission of the Abbot there abiding; and in that respect, they were cald Templers, a name which alwaies after remained to them.

When the King and the Patriarch had intelligence thereof, and perceived their paines to bee holy and commendable: they administrated all things necessary vnto them, so that they liued (after this manner) in the Temple, both very religiously and chastly, and (which is more) their number multiplied, and increased day by day. Notwithstanding, albeit there were now a great number of them; yet had they neither habite, nor any rules designed them; but liued together in common; obser-uing their vow, and so they continued for the space of nine yeares. During which time, for the great seruice they did to Christendome; their credite and renowne highly encreased, beside the meanes of so worthy an example. By reason of their encrease in number, Pope Honorius the second, at the request of Stephen, Patriarch of Ierusalem; deuised a rule and manner of life for them; appointing, that they should be clothed in white. Afterward, Pope Eugenius the third, added a Badge, or Armoury of a red Crosse; to be worn on their breasts; which they promised by a sollemne vow to obserue for ever, according as other religious Knights did. And therefore they were honored, to haue it brought them by the hand of Saint Bernard, a reuerend and holy Doctour, whom they elected as chiefe and first Maister of their Order, according as other religious Knights had the like obseruation.

In short time after, such was the multiplication of their Order, and honour of their deedes in Armes; as not only they kept the wayes of the holie voyage, safe from Theues and Murderers: but also (both by Sea and Land) they made great incursions and strong warres vpon the Infidels. So that their fame and worth spreading it selfe throughout Christendome, the Kings and Princes (in many partes) ordained and allowed them great Rents and Reuenues; which they imploied in those warres, like true Knights, attending on the seruice of Iesus Christ. And by incessible time, growing on in strength and ability of wealth: in all Countreies and Prouinces, they had abiding in the chiefeest Cities and strongest places; but most especially in the Holy Land, where ordinarily the great Maister of the Order made his aboad, with the greater number of them, keeping an Army continually there, as also in other places, where most necessity required: It happened afterward, that for the sins of men; discord moued among the Christians, and the great negligence in Princes; not only the City of Ierusalem, but other places also formerly conquered (as we haue before declared) were regained by the Infidels; thence yeares after the conquest made by God-more humane and pious toward it, then the Father himselfe.

Well then, to conclude this point. I say of Aristotle, as Augustine Cesar said of King Hiero (when he understood, that among the Innocents which he had caused to be killed, after the birth of our Saviour, one of his owne Sons was slain) It is better, quoth he, to be Herods Pigge, then his Sonne. And this he said, in regard that Pigges were not killed in Judea, because the Jewes did not eate anie Swines Flesh. And euen so I say, it were better to bee a Beast in Aristotles Commonwealth, then a man, for Beastes should bee assuredly cared and provided for by their Dammes: whereas the Children of men, should bee in danger to be forsaken both of Father and Mother, and so perir.

And heere I cannot forbear to say somewhat, of another Constitution of his, which I knowe not, whether it were more absurd or ridiculous. We made mention a little before, of a notable Law of his, forbidding in his Commonwealth, the vse of lasciuious Pictures & Images; least young men, and especiall children, might be corrupted in manners by sight of them. Neuertheless, he excepteth in the same Law, the Images and Pictures of certaine Gods: in whom (saith he) Casome alloweth Lasciuiousnesse. Meaning no doubt, the painted and graued Stories of the Adulteries of Iupiter, Mars, and Venus, and other Gods and Goddes.

Lasciuious pictures and Images of Gods, absurdly allowed by Aristotle.

If Gods do as much, men presume to follow.

ting as they did, that they were true Gods?

For, how could any man bee persuaded, that Adulterie defiled punishment, or was not a great, yea, a Divine Vertue, seeing Mars taken tardy with Pheno, or Jupiter stealing away Europa, in the shape of a Bull; or violating Leda, in the forme of a Swanne; or entering into the house of Danae (by the Louer) in a Golden Showre? Would not anie man that were Religiously deuoted vnto these Gods, bee animated by sight of them to do the like? Yea, and Children learning their Religion, and not only hearing, but also seeing euery where, by Pictures and Images; that such actes were committed by their Gods, could they imagine, that the same were euill, and not to be imitated?

This is verie well declared by Zachan, of his owne experience, who, in his Dialogues, maketh Menippus say thus: When I was yet but a Boy, and heard out of Homer and Hesiod, of the Adulteries, Fornications, Rapes, and seditions of the Gods, Truly I thought, that these things were very excellent, and began euen then, to be greatly affected towards them. For I could not imagine that the Goddes themselves would euer haue committed Adultery, if they had not esteemed the same to be lawfull and good. The like also signifyeth Chares in Terence, who beholding a Table, wherein was painted how Iupiter deceived Danae, when he came in at the top of the house, saith; that hee was greatly encouraged to deuoure a young Maid, by the example of so great a God. At quem Deum? (saith he) Qui templa casti summa sonitu concutit. Ego hominibus hoc non facerem? Ego vero illud ita feci & libens: But what God was this? Euen hee, which shakes the highest Temples of the Heavens with Thunder. And therefore, might not I, that am but a poore wretch, doe the like? Yea truly, I did it, and that with all my heart.

These are the effects, that the sight of such Lasciuious Pictures of the Goddes, must needs worke in their minds which beholde them; and are withall, Religiously affected towards them. And therefore, Aristotle permitting these, and forbidding all other, to preuent thereby the wonderful corruption of youth, may verie fity be compared vnto one, that should should make a Law to prohibite the burning of houses, except it were with some artificiall wilde fire; that could not bee extinguished. For such may be said to be the fire of Concupiscence, kindled in the minds of men or Children, by Religious acts or representations, which maketh such impressions, as neuer after can be rased out againe, so long as affection to the same Religion remaineth. Which maketh me therefore to conclude, that Aristotle failed and erred no lesse, or rather more absurdly, then the other Law-makers, whose errors hee censured and controlled.

Heereby two things are inferred, and do appeare evidently. The one, the weakness of mans wit, when it is not supported and directed by the grace of GOD. And the insufficiencie of humane lawes, through the weakness of the Law-Makers, who intending (manie times) to make good and wholesome Lawes, for benefit of the Commonwealth, doo ordaine things very inconuenient and preiudiciall thereto: which Cicero obscureth in some of the Wisest men of his time. I can tell you (saith hee) of Marcus Cotta, whose Law concerning priuate indgements, was abrogated by his own Brother the same yeare that it was made. And the Lawes of Licina and Mutia, made by two most wise Consules, were in the indgements of all men not onely vnprofitable, but also, pernitious to the Commonwealth. As also the Lawes called Liuius, were abrogated by the Senate in an instant. And in like manner, I holde the Lawes Seiz and Apuliz to be nothing worth. Thus saith Cicero.

The like whereof might be exemplified in euery Commonwealth, but this shal suffice at this time, concerning Law-makers. Now let vs consider Law in it selfe, what it is; to what end it is ordained; and what it can perform in a Commonwealth, for the perfection & establishment thereof.

CHAP. V.

What Law is: To what end it was ordained, And what it can perform in a Commonwealth.

Plato, speaking generally of all Law, as well written as vnwritten, defineth it to be, A reasonable, leading and directing men to their due end, for a publicke good, ordaining Penalties for them that transgresse, and Rewards for them that obey. And Cicero more briefly thus: Law is (saith hee) the highest or chiefest reason grased in nature, commanding those things which are to be done, and forbidding the contrary. And againe, Law is the force of Nature; the vnderstanding and reason of a Wiseman; the rule of right and wrong. And speaking more particularly of written Law, hee saith; It is the reason & vnderstanding of a Wiseman, who vnderstandeth in writing what he thinketh good by way either of commandement, or of Prohibitions. Lastly, the Civilians, most briefly and properly defineth it thus: Lex est sanctio iustitia, iubens honesta, prohibens contraria. Law is a holy decree, that is to say, a Decree which ought not to be broken, commanding good and holy things; and forbidding the contrary.

This Law, Plato calleth, The soule, that giueth forme and life to the Commonwealth, and the Anchor that staith and assurth it. And Cicero sayth; That neither any house, nor Citie, nor Nation, nor yet humane kinde, can stand & without Law. Neuertheless, how excellent or defective foreriter is for a Commonwealth, yet it is to be vnderstood, that all Lawes whatsoever (which are meere humane) are Defective and insufficient; for the perfect Government of a State. For where as humane Lawes consisteth cyther in Written Statutes or Decrees, or in the Commandements and Ordinances of a wife Magistrate, (which Magistrate, Cicero therefore calleth, A Speaking Lawe; as he also calleth the Lawe, A dumb Ma- gistrate) yet it is evident, that neyther of both apart, nor yet both concurring, can suffice.

For the first, whereas written Lawes are univiersall, and concerne the action of men, which are infinite and periculer, it is not possible, that any Law-Maker should extend his Lawes so farre, that they may sufficiently provide for all cases that may occure; but that hee must leave place for the determination and judgement of men, according to equity.

As not onely Arifotle, but also the Civilians themselves, doe teach, and experience is daily seene thereof. In the necessity of interpretation and mitigation of Lawes, in Dispensations, and in Appellations from Law to Conscience, whereby the imperfection of all written Lawes, sufficiently appeareth. And as for the ordinapness of wise Magistrates, it is manifest (by that which I have sayde before, concerning the errors of wise Governours and Law-makers) that the weaknesse and blindness of mans wit, and the corruption of his Nature, is such; that hee can neither see so clearly in all cases, nor yet be so void of affection and passion, that he can be able to determine, decree, and iudge according to equity. In which respect, Arifotle disputeth, Whether it were better, That a Commonwealth should be governed by good Lawes, or by the wil of the best man? And he preferreth the Government of Lawes, before the other, saying; The Law is (as it were) a pure and cleare understanding: whereas the understanding of the best man, is tainted with sensual appetite, whereby it may be corrupted.

And therefore, where the Law governeth, there God governeth: but where man governeth, be he never so wise and vertuous, there a cruell Beast (to witte; Concupiscence and Passion) entureth into the government with him, and manie times obscureth his understanding. For which cause, the Magistrate ought in all cases, wherein the meaning of the Law is cleare: to iudge and determine according to the prescript thereof, as the Civill Law it selfe ordaineth. And Cicero saith: As the Magistrate governeth the people, so shoulde the Law govern the Magistrate. Whereupon I inferre, that seeing no Law-maker can so sufficientlie provide for the government, and direct ruling of a Commonwealth, by the Letter of the Law; but he must leave infinite cases, yea, and the interpretation of the Lawe themselves, to the determination and judgement of men, who are also (on their part) defectiue, to wit; subject vnto passion and error: It followeth then, that neither the Law without the Magistrate, nor the Magistrate without the Law, nor yet both concurring, can suffice for the perfect government of a Commonwealth, but should bee to supply the defectes of each other. And therefore I conclude, that there is no sufficient and assured meanes, to establish any State by humane Lawes.

This will be more evident, if wee consider, what are the especiall ends whereto Lawes were ordained, and what they can performe. Two things are principally intended by them. The one, the administration of Iustice, by the decission of causes, controversies, and suites, betwixt partie and partie. The other, is the reformation of manners, and repression of vice, for that it is pernicious to a Commonwealth. Of the first I have already spoken sufficientlie, as well in the weaknesse of the Law-maker and Magistrate, as imperfection of the Law, in the determination of causes. And therefore, I will a little further enlarge my selfe, concerning the latter; which is, suppression of Vice, and reformation of manners: and I will declare, that humane Lawes cannot sufficientlie performe, either the one or other.

If Lawes were able to reforme mens manners, or to repress vice, they must do it, either by Precept, or by Prohibition, or by Permission, or by Rewarding, or by Punishing, for in these five things, consisteth all the force of humane Lawes, as the Lawiers do testify of themselves. For the two first, to wit; Precept & Prohibition, they are altogether vnable and insufficient, to bring the corrupt nature of man to any perfection or vertue. For, what other help have we thereby, but only the knowledge of our duty? which knowledge alone, as Arifotle saith, Helpeh little or nothing to vertue, the praise and commendation wherof, consisteth in action and operation. Because it nothing availeth, though wee know neuer so much, if we do not put our knowledge in practise. And as little it profiteth a sickeman, to know what meat is good for him: when hee hath such a loathing vnto it, that hee cannot eat it. Euen so, the the corrupt nature of man hath little help or remedy by the knowledge of his duty: when vertue is so loathsome vnto him, that he cannot brooke it. For, as Seneca saith. Nihil proderit dare precepta, nisi prius amoveris obstantia preceptis. It is to little purpose to give precepts, except thou first remove the obstacles of them. And therefore the Poet saide truly

Si possem, sanior essem; Sed trahit inuisum, nona vis, aliudq; cupido, Mens alius suadet, video meliora, proboq; Deteriora sequor.

That is to say; I would bee better, if I could; but a new and strange force draweth me againe my will. Sensefulness perwades me one thing, and reason another. I see and approve the better, but I follow the worse.

Also, the Apostle speaking in the person of our corrupt nature, testifieth the same, saying. Scio quia non habito in me, &c. I know that there dwelleth no goodness in me, that is to say, in my flesh: For I have a good will or desire, but I cannot performe it. For I doe not the good which I desire to doe; but I do the evil which I would not do. Thus saith the Apostle. Whereupon it followeth, that precept and prohibition of the Law (whereby wee have the only knowledge of good and euill) little availeth vs for the attayning of vertue; except the infirmity and corruption of Nature, be cured by some other meanes. For Animus (saith Seneca) ut ad precepta posset ire, solvendus est. The Soule must be loosed from the bonds that tie and entangle it, or otherwise, it cannot follow the good precepts that are given.

But what if the prohibition of euill doe hurt also, if it be not otherwise holpen? The Apostle proueth this clearely. Peccatum (saith he) non cognoui, &c. I knew not sinne, but by the Law, for I know not concupiscence, but because the Law said: Thou shalt not lust. And sinne, by occasion of the Commandement, hath wrought all concupiscence in me. And how true this is, common experience may teach vs, seeing nothing is more proper and peculiar to the mallice of mans Nature; then desire to doe that which is forbidden, and commonly for no other reason, but because it is forbidden. Which the Poet signifieth elegantly, saying; Cui peccare licet, peccat minus; ipsa potestas Semina peccitula languidiora facit. &c. Nistimur inuicti semper, cupimusq; negasie interdictis imminet ager aquis. (Sat.

He which hath leave to sinne, sinnes lesse: for the libertie to sinne, weakeneth the very roots and seeds of sinne. We abate sinne to doe that which is forbidden vs, like to the sick man, who his sties most after forbidden water.

And another Poet saith, to the same purpose. Gens humana ruit per vetulum nefas, Mankind runneth head-long to sinne, when it is forbidden him: For euen as a torrent or Land-floody running a violent and precipitous course, and meeting with any stop by the way, becomes the more furious, and with redoubled force makes it selfe passage, bearing downe all before it; Euen so, mans corrupt Nature, being carryed head-long with vnbriided desires, and finding it selfe repressed or hindered, by any Law or Commandement; breaketh down the banks or bounds of dutie with redoubled fury, in such fort, that it committeth double offence, to wit; ife doth not only the desired euill, but breaketh the Law also. As the Apostle insinuateth, saying; Lex iram operatur, &c. The Law worketh or causeth wrath; for where there is no Law, there is no breach of Law. Whereupon Saint Augustine saith; The letter of the Law killeth, for it makes a man rather know euill, then eschew it; and by that meanes, rather encreaseth then diminisheth sinne: because mans concupiscence or unlawfull desire, is accompanied also with breach of the Law. Whereby it appeareth, that the Law in commanding or forbidding, helpeth not sufficientlie the reformation of mans corrupt nature.

But can Permission, or countenance with euill (which is another point of the Law) worke any greater effect? Who seeth not, that it dooth nothing else, but bewray the imbecillitie and imperfection of the Law? Because it is forced to permit that, which it gladdly would; and should remedy, but cannot. And therefore I will proceede, to treat of Reward and Punishment, wherein, as Solomon was wont to say, principally consisteth the government of a Commonwealth. And Isterius saith; Legis pramio aut pax, ut a moderato humana. Mans life is wholly governed by reward or punishment of the Law.

Now then, for as much as these two have all their operation, about the effects of Vertue or Vice, that is to say, about good or bad actions (which are onely rewarded and punished by Law) and not about the rootes and causes thereof, to wit, the good or bad habits or affections of the mind, from whence doe spring all good and euill actions: It is manifest, that though they may bee Motiues to good; yet they cannot bee effectual and sufficient meanes to work it. For, so long as the cause remaineth, so long will the effects follow thereof, at one time or other. We see that trees are yearly lopped, and Vines cropped; yet while the rootes remaine sound, they bud afresh, and bring forth new Boughes, Leaues, and Fruits. Euen so, although euill and sinfull Acts be punished in wicked men, yet if the causes from whence they proceede (to wit, inordinate affections and passions) be not taken away, they produce the very same effects sooner or later, openly or secretly. For, what commonly followeth on the punishment of a vicious Act, when the habit of the Vice remaineth: but that the offender sinneth more warlike another time? And how often do men offend the lawes, without punishment, yea, without any feare or danger thereof? That Man (saith Cicero) who feares nothing but a Iudge and a Witnesse: what will he not do in the dark? Or when he finds a weak and rich man alone, of whom he may safely haue the spoile?

How many waies the penalties of Politicall Lawes may be escaped.

Furthermore, how many waies may the penaltie of the Law be auoyded? Some escape it by their power, in which respect, Anacharsis compared Lawes to the Spiders Web; which takes onely the little Flies, while the great ones breake thorough it. Some againe auoyde it by corruption, either of the Iudge, Witnesse, or Iurie. And some by fauour or friendship. Others by negligence of Officers, which doe not execute the Lawes: And some by the Princes pardon. But what shall we say of such, who offend the Law, nor onely without punishment; but also with reward? To the ende, that this may be better appeare, and that wee may see

Plutar. in Solon

(withall) what force Law may haue, for suppressing the mallice of mans nature; let vs consider the power of a contrarie Law, which encountreth euery Common-wealth, and impugneth Politicall Law, to wit, the Law of the Flesh, whereof the Apostle saith. Video aliam legem, &c. I see another Law in my body, repugnant to the Law of my minde.

And for as much, as this Law hath also her Precepts, Prohibitions, Rewards, and Punishments: Let vs put it in a Ballance with the Ciuill and Politicall Law, weighing the one with the other, that we may see, whether will be liket to ouer come, in a man deuoyd of Gods grace, & consequently in Common-wealths, that relye onely vpon humane policie and power.

It is therefore to be considered, that the Carnall Law, flowing from the very bottome of mans corrupt Nature, is so much stronger, and more forcible, then the other, to moue and draw him: by how much it is more internal and familiar with him, and the end or scope thereof more agreeable, and consonant to his corrupt humour, will, and affection. For Politicall Law tendeth onely to Bonum verum, and Bonum commune. A true good, and the common good, consisting in solide & perfect vertue: whereas the Carnall Law tendeth to Bonum apparen, and Bonum priuatum; An apparent and priuate good, consisting onely in a Mans owne profit, pleasure, and delectation, whereto euery one is (of his owne corrupt nature) enclined.

The like also may be said, of the Statutes and Decrees both of the one and other, that is to say, their Precepts and Prohibitions: consisting in Commandements Negative and Affirmatiue. Wherein the Carnall Law hath also the like aduantage, in respect of the greater facilitie of the precepts thereof, and difficulty of the things it forbiddeth. For, whereas the Ciuill and Politicall Law commandeth vs, to loue our Neighbours as our selues, and to pretere the publique good before our priuate; to be temperate and continent; not to Steale; not to deceiue; not to commit Fornication or Adultery: The Law of the Flesh, being opposit in all, commandeth the contrary; as to loue our selues better then our Neighbours; to prefer Eat, drinke, and be merry, for after death there is no pleasure.*

The Statutes of the Carnall Law, the Holy Ghost layeth downe notably, in the Booke of Wisdome, speaking of wicked men, in these wordes. Diserant impij, &c. The wicked said. Let vs enjoy the goods that we haue, and use the Creature in this time of our youth, without delay. Let vs fill our felues with Wine and Oynment, and let vs not lose the flower of the time, &c. Let vs leaue euery where the signes of our mirth, for this is our part, and this is our lot. Let vs oppress the poore witt Man, and let vs not spare the Widow, nor haue respect to the hoary Haire of any. And let our strength be the Law of inuictee. These are the Statutes of the Flesh, which how much more consonant and agreeable they are to mans corrupt Nature, and how much more easie to be performed, then the statutes and decrees of Politicall Law, which commaunds and forbids the contrary; I neede not to declare.

But who knoweth not, that to learn Vice, a man hath no neede of any great wit, or of a Councellour, or of compulsion? who is so simple, that he hath not wit enough to be wicked? Whereas, to be vertuous, we neede not onely wit and capacity, Maisters & Teachers: but also Lawes, stripes, Prisons, Gates and Gibbets. And yet, as Seneca saith; We may thinke we profit well, if we be none of the worst. So that, he which is dyther left to his own corrupt Nature, or hath no other then humane help: is drowned in vice and sinne, before hee come within a kenning of vertues port. We are (saith Seneca) taken vpon by the way, wee labour to come to Vertue, being already engaged and intercepted by vice. And no maruaile, seeing men voyde of Grace, (for such I speake of) haue neither sufficient Armes to defend themselves, nor refuge where to saue themselves. For reason, which is their onely Weapon, not being strengthened by Grace, is so weak and brittle, that it breaketh at the first blow. And Morall Vertue (where Mans prompt selfe and forcewille to keene euill.

Seneca in Epist. 75.

Seneca vbi su. pta.

Reason the onely weapon, being thus strengthened by grace.

inconsisteth all their hope and refuge) is so hard to be attained: that a man receiue many deadly wounds of his Enemy, before he can arrive where it is. Besides, his danger is the greater, because his Warre is so domestical and intestine; that hee is not feareful from harme himselfe. For, he is to fight, not onely with the World and the Deuill: but also with his owne passions and affections, in so much, that his greatest feare may be least: he himselfe betray himselfe, and tender himselfe Prisoner to his Enemy.

Furthermore, wee see that our proclivity to Vice, and auersion from Vertue, is such, that as it is sufficient to flesh a Dogge onely once vpon a Sheepe, to make him a Sheepe-wurrier as long as he liues: Euen so, one onely tast of vice is enough, to make a man vicious euer after. Whereas contrariwise, many acts are required; to the attaining the habite of any one vertue, and so timely is mans friendship with sensuality, the Mother of Vice; and so late his knowledge and vse of reason, which leadeeth to vertue: that he hath gone halfe the way to Vice, before hee know where Vertue dwells.

By meanes whereof, hee commonlie groweth to bee vicious very earlie; to wit, in his Childe-hood, and verduous very late, if euer he prooue verduous at all. For the way to vertue is long, and full of difficulties; but the way to all kinde of vice, is easie, and, as Salomon saith; Complanata lapidibus, Attila plaine with stones, euen, and well paved; short, and gone in a trice. Hesiodus saith, Haud procul illa habitans, breuis est via que fit diuitum. Vice dwelleth not farre from vs, the way is short, and all in a descent. Where vpon the Poet saith; Facilis descensus Averno; The descent to Hell is very easie. Finally, of these two waies our Saujour saith. Latus porta & spatiosa via est, &c. The way is broad and spacious that leadeeth to perdition, and many enter in thereat: but est Gate is strait, and the way is narrow, which leadeeth to life, and few will finde it. Thus we see, what great aduantage the Law of the flesh hath, of the Politicall Law, in respect of the facilitie that men finde, to fulfill the precepts thereof, which (in some) are nothing else but to be vicious.

Mans Onely selfe, and his owne passions, are his onely Enemies.

Vice is verily easie to learned, but vertue very hardly.

It is but one tast of vice, that maketh a man vicious euer after.

Many acts are required, to the attaining the habite of any one vertue, and so timely is mans friendship with sensuality, the Mother of Vice; and so late his knowledge and vse of reason, which leadeeth to vertue: that he hath gone halfe the way to Vice, before hee know where Vertue dwells.

Men learne halfe the way to vice, before they know vertues dwelling.

The way to all kinde of vice, is easie, and, as Salomon saith; Complanata lapidibus, Attila plaine with stones, euen, and well paved; short, and gone in a trice.

But wanteth in any thing, whereas with Politicall Lawe is furnished: Hath not them in as high a degree, and able to hold equall competence? Hath not this Carnall Law (thinke you) her Advocates, Orators, Philosophers, & Teachers to publish and proclaim it to please, to teach it? What saye to all the Sect of Epicurus? Whose Doctrine consisted principally in the Precepts of this Law, and impugning (as much as he durst) the Civill and Politicall Lawe. In which respect, all Epicurians were banished out of many good Common-wealthes of Greece, as Plutarch testifieth, and that worthily. For Epicurus having made a demand, in certaine questions - which hee wrote, whether a wife man would not doe against the Politicall Law, if he might be sure to escape unpunished: answered freely thereto himselfe, Yes truly. And writing to Tidmeus, one of his Schollers, he admonished him seriously; not to subject himselfe to the Lawes and opinions of Men, whensoever he might hope to avoid the penalty of the lawes. And Metrodorus, a Disciple and familiar friend of his, writing to his Brother: forbade him to go to the warres, or endanger himselfe for the good of all Greece, advising him, rather to drinke good Wine at home, and entreate himselfe well, that his body might receive all pleasure and contentment. Concluding, that the chiefe and souveraign good, consisteth in the belly, and in the pleasures thereof. This is the Philosophy that belongeth to the Law of the flesh, and experience sheweth, what number of professors there are thereof in every Common-wealth. Quorum Deus venter est, as the Apostle saith; Whose bellies are their Gods. Whose endeavors tend to nothing but to their private pleasure & commodity. Who employ their wits, studies, and pens, to nothing so much, as to publish and promulgate the Carnall Law, in amorous and lascivious Books, wanton Poems, and scurrilous banquy Ballads, which abound every where, to the corruption of youth, and consequently, to the prejudice of the Commonweale, & to the great shame of Magistrates, that see and suffer it. Moreover, to the end we may see, that this Carnall Law will yeild in nothing to the Politicall; hath it not also Common-wealths wherein it governeth, and apudence and policy appropriate unto it? Yea, politicke Princes and Magistrates that practise it, and politick writers that teach and maintaine it? Look upon all tyrannicall States, where all is ruled according to the precepts of this Law: doe Magistrates and Governours practise any other policy, but Prudentiam carnis; as the Apostle calleth it; The Prudence and wisdom of the flesh? And Machiavell, whose workes are so highly esteemed of many men at this day, doth he teach any other government; then that which proceedeth from the principles of this law; to wit, from selfe love, and particular interest? Yet this were not so much to be wondered; at if it had not also a Religion conforme to it selfe, with Doctors and Divines, to Preach and defend it. For as Politicall Law, having the help and assistance of true Religion, is more perfect, and worketh far greater effects in the Common-wealth, for the establishment and conservation thereof: So also hath the Carnall Law, being masked with the Vizard of some Religion, eyther true or false, is of farre greater force, to overthrow or destroy any Common-wealth. And therefore it seeketh alwaies, to have eyther the appearance and shew of true Religion, (in which respect, Machiavell teacheth his Tyrant to be an Hippocrite) or else it serveth it selfe, with some new fangled and false Religion: which the Apostle signifieth; when amongst Opera carnis, The workes of the flesh, he numbrellth Sects of Heresies.

But perhaps you will say, that the other Law (in rewarding and punishing) surmounteth this, and represseth it in such sort, that it can have no force in any well governed Commonwealth. Let vs then examine this a little, and we shall finde: that the Politicall Law hath no oddes of this in that point, for as well rewards and punishments also, as well as the other. The rewards which this Law proposeth, are diuers; for it promisseth (for some things) the pleasure & delight which is taken in the action, with the which, the party thinketh himselfe so well satisfied: that he is contented (many times) to bestow his Money, yea, to venter his life to obtaine it.

The Carnall Law hath Common-wealths where in it governeth.

Rom. 8, 6.

Machiavell's Principe.

The Carnall Law hath Religion and dogmatics and Preachers.

Gal. 5, 20.

The rewards which the Law of the flesh proposeth.

The two laws compared together.

The reward for vertue very uncertain.

The rewards of vice are certaine, for the most part.

Good men dy many times, yet neuer repressed.

The ministers of vice are not excused to honour.

Sometimes againe, it proposeth some commoditie or benefit, which may accompany or follow the fact. And lastly, it findeth means (otherwhiles) to rob vertue of her reward, and apply it to it selfe: in so much, that there is no remuneration promised by the Politicall Law, whereof the Carnall may not sometimes give hope, to such as follow it. As I will make euiden, by comparison of the one with the other: whereby it shall appeare, that the Carnall Law hath every where the advantage.

Therefore (I say) that the rewards proposed for Vertue by the Politicall Law, are uncertaine, in respect of the other, for neither is there any at all assigned for very many good actes, neyther are all those rewards promised, performed. Whereas on the contrary, the rewards of Vice, are commonly more certaine, for eyther they goe before the act (as it falleth out in bribes, and many other cases of unlawfull gaine, where the reward is paid before hand) or else they accompany the fact (as in all cases of intemperance and incontinency, wherein only pleasure is sought, or in cosenages and deceipts, which bring present gaine) or else they follow upon the deede, as when some unlawfull act is done, upon promise of future pay. So that, for Vice the reward is alwaies eyther assured, or (at least) hoped for and expected; which is no smal Motiue to induce men thereto. But for vertue, neither is there any reward to be had many times, nor yet hope of any by politicall Law, as we see by experience in very many Men, who live laudably in the Common-wealth all their lives: and yet are so farre from having any remuneration, or from expecting any, that they thinke themselves happy, in that they can escape the penalties of the Law.

But let vs proceede a little further. Is there any reward for vertue, so assured by Politicall Law, that Vice cannot, yea, doth not abtaine it daily? Hath it not honour (many times) for reward, as well as Vertue? Who sooner riseth to the highest offices, and credit in some Courts: then the Ministers of the Princes pleasures, or Instruments of his wickednesse? As Scianus, vnder the Emperour Tiberius. Two Slaues, called Narcissus and Pallas, vnder Claudius Tigellinus, vnder Nero, Perennius, Cleander, Regillus, Julianus, and other Slaues, vnder Commodus. All which men, governed both the Emperours, and the Empire: to whom I might adde diuers other, if I thought it convenient. For, whether wee looke to former times, or to the present: we shall finde eyther where, as many advanced by euill means, as by good. For no man is so wicked: but if he haue Money, he may hope for any prement whatsoeuer.

Curia pauperibus clausa est, dat census honoris amicitias, pauper vbiq; iacet. (res,

The Court (saith the Poet) is shut up to poore men: but wealth giueth honours, wealth giueth friendship, and the poore Man lyeth euery where in the dust.

And if we consider also, how Princes doe commonly bestow their rewards: wee shall see that merit is least respected. Which Philip de Comines (sheweth by a pleasant example, of Lewes the eleauenth, King of France, and Charles Duke of Burgundy. Who, after the battaile (which was fought betwixt them at Montleheri in France) being determined to reward and punish such, as had defered well or ill in their Armies, and finding, that diuers ranne away on both sides, while the battell was doubtfull (some on the one side an hundred Miles Eastward, and others on the other side, as many Westward) the King of France tooke from one of his Subiects, all his Offices and dignities for running away and gaue it to another that ranne ten miles further then he. The Duke of Bourgundie deputed also one of his, of all his goods and authority, for the like cause, & within a while after, gaue him more then euer hee had before. Whereby (saith Comines) it appeareth, that Princes bestow their rewards and fauours, not like Angels, but like Men, as they are.

Seeing then, that Vice hath not onely perticullar rewards, either of gaine or commoditie, or of pleasure at least, (which contenteth some more then Gold) but also hope of the rewards due to vertue it selfe, eyther by the Princes error or infirmite, or by his fauour, or by

by purchase, or by accident and chance, (whereby many wicked men are also advanced.) What advantage can the Politicall Law haue of the other, by proposing reward, though it be neuer so great? Doe we not see Crownes and Superaignties (wherein most men place the greatest felicity of this life) procured by murders, machiues, and most wicked meanes? And doth Machiuel propose any lesse reward to his Prince (for extreame wickednesse) then assurance in Soueraignty? So that the most wicked man that is, hauing hope to get or conferre a Crowne, (or rather, Soueraigne State) by some murder or mischief: what greater, or fo great a reward, could he expect for all the vertue in the world, by obeying Politicall laws? Did not very many (in old time) get diuine honours, though they were most wicked men: as Iupiter, Venus, Bacchus, Hercules, Tiberius Caesar, and diuers Emperours as bad as he? And so it would fall out, if Christian Religion had not expelled Idolatry out of the world. Whereby we see, Politicall Lawes, without the helpe of Gods Grace and Religion (for I consider them here) cannot assigne fo great a reward for vertue: but that the wickedst man in the world may hope also to haue it, though he follow and obey the lusts of the flesh.

Wicked men
sometimes get rackes and ropes in stead
of dignities.

But a man may say, that many wicked men, which promise themselves great gaine or advancement, by some wicked act: get nothing in the end, but rackes and ropes in recompence thereof. This I grant, but then let vs also consider on the other side, how many notable Men, cyther loose their liues in actions, for which they should be rewarded, or in stead of the reward which they deserue, get nothing but ignominy, banishment, hatred of their Princes or people, death, and vter ruine? As Marcus Coriolanus, Furius Camillus, Scipio, Cicero, Themistocles, Aristides, Phocion, Dion the Sicilian, and infinite others. Some of which men, were deprived of their Dignities, others banished their Countries, and others shamefully put to death by publicke authoritie; after they had done great seruices to their Common-weales and States, wherein they liued. And did not Lewes the eleauenth, King of France, discouer a great secret, concerning the humors of Princes, in rewarding seruices past, when he said; Il perd souvent d'auoir trop bien seruiz: Il ouertthroweth Men many times: so haue done too good seruice? Signifying, that Princes are more willing to haue others beholding to them; then to bee themselves beholding to any. And some, as well Princes as others, are of such Nature, that when they see their obligation so great to any man, as they thinke that they cannot commodiously reward him, according to his satisfaction and merit: they hold him then but for an eye-fore, and seek to rid him one way or other. Therefore, how vncertaine and casual is the reward of vertue by Politicall Lawes, seeing the distribution thereof is in the hands of such: as for some particular respect, or interest of their owne, may not onely forbear to reward, but also (some-times) vnder and destroy those, that haue best deserued of them and the Common-wealth? Thus much of Reward.

Now, to speake of Punishment, wherein consisteth the greatest force of any Politicall Law, for the repression of mans mallice: let vs see, what are the penalties or punishments, where-with the Law of the flesh terrifieth men, to diuert them from vertue, and to draw them to vice. For, although it cannot (of it selfe) inflict any punishment vpon the true louers of vertue, who tread downe and triumph ouer all power of the flesh, and Lawes thereof: yet it setteth vp certaine Scarre-Crowes, to fright such simple Soules as it deceiue, proposing vnto them farre greater difficulties, labour, and paine, then there is (indeed) in the practise and exercise of vertue. Which difficultie, they hold for no other then continuall affliction, and (as it were) a penalty or punishment, inflicted vpon such as labour to be vertuous. By meanes where-of, they contemne the penalties of Politicall Lawes, esteeming them, not onely more easie to bee auoyded, but also more tollerable to bee borne, then the other. Nay, more easie to be auoyded, for that, neither there is a penalty imposed for eury offence, neither are those that be ordained, alwaies executed vpon offenders. For, as I haue noted before, they at many times, escaped, y-ther by power, or by fauour, or by corruption of Officers, or by their negligence, or by their Princes pardo, whereas the paines that worldly men conceiue to accompany vertue, seeme to them inevitable, except vertue it selfe be auoyded: whereof, no man can arrive, but by the strait, narrow, and painefull way, which I haue before described.

And againe, the penalties of Politicall Lawes, doe seeme to them more tollerable then the other, because al penal mulcts, consist either in payment of Mony, or in Infamy, or in corporall or Capitall punishment. If in Mony they feare it not much; for they are content to buy their fatisfying thereof: and many we see doe voluntarily begger themselves, to obtaine their pleasures. If the penalties consist in Infamy; what care they for it, who hold sinne for no shame, but as an honour? And (as the Philos faith) Gloriantur in malitia: they glory in wickednesse. Et letantur (saith Salomon) cum male fecerint, & exultant rebus pessimis, quoniam via peruersa; quum crescant infames sunt. Who reioyce when they haue done amisse, and exalt in the worst things. Whose waies are peruerse, whose steps are infamous. If the punishment be Corporall, or Capitall, they esteeme the practise of vertue more painefull. For, what affliction, Prison, restraint of liberty, torment or death, can seeme so grievous to a Man giuen ouer to lust and pleasure, as to afflict himselfe by restraint of his owne will? To conquer and subdue his owne vnbridled affections? To chastise his body, that it may be made obedient to the Spirit? To mortifie, and crucifie himselfe? To dye to his Lust and Concupiscence? Yea, and to bee (as it were) his owne Butcher and Hang-man? To execute all this vpon himselfe, not for once or twice, or for a day or two, or for now and then: but daily, continually, and without intermission: for otherwise, true vertue can neither be attained, nor conserued. Can any thing (I say) seeme more irkefome, or any punishment more corporall, or capitall, or sensuall & fleshy men, destitute of grace?

Qui non percipiunt ea quae sunt spiritus dei: Who haue no feeling or apprehension of matters be-onging to the spirit of God? Corporall torments they think (with Epiphanius) the greater they are, the sooner they dispatch a Man out of paine, & the lesse they be, the more tollerable they are, and death they hold for an end of misery. But the labours and paines, which they imagine to be in continuall exercise of vertue: they take for a continuall and neuer dying torment, & for an everlasting death. So that, very many are so disgusted, with the onely receipt & apprehension thereof: that they will not take so much as a taste of vertue to auoid any penalty of Law, whatsoeuer it be: as we see daily in many Malefactors, that are inuincible. And againe, diuers that haue already made some entrance, into the course and way of vertues, are thereby so wearied wishin a while; that they vntoylely despaire, euer to arrive at any perfection therein; such men (I mean) as haue no light or help of Gods grace. Inasmuch, that one Sextus, a Gentleman Romane, of whom Plutarch writeth, hauing giuen himselfe to the study of Philosophy, and the practise of morall vertue, was within a while so discouraged: that his friends had much ado to keepe him from drowning himselfe. Asmeius Probus testifieth, that the Son of the famous Dion of Seilie, being restrained by his Father, from the licentious life which hee had led (for some long time) in his Fathers banishment: did desperately cast himselfe from the top of the house, and brake his necke.

But put the case, that Subiects might be made vertuous, by the feare of punishment: what remedy is there for the Prince, when he is of a bad and malignant Nature? True lie none, for he feareth no penalty of the Law, being himselfe about the Law: and as for good counsell, if any man dare giue it, hee dare contemne it. What good did the good counsell and precepts, of the Diuine Plato, and of famous Dion, to the two Tyrants of Sicily, the Father & the Son, called Dionysius? In requital of their good enstruitions, was not Plato sold for a Slave, and Dion banished out of Sicilie? Marcius Aurelius and his Son Commodus

The Princes life is a great example to the Common wealth.

Plinius lib. 4. Epil.

No sufficient means in Politicall Law, to make the Prince and Common-wealth truly vertuous.

All the premisses examined over in due order for a Conclusion.

Emperour Marcius Aurelius (called the Philosopher) gave to his Sonne Commodus ? Succeeding him in the Empire, was not he far more detestable and harmful for his vice, then his Father was renowned & beloved for vertue ? If then there be no sufficient means, by lawes, education, counsell, or exhortation, to reforme the vicious and corrupt Nature of a wicked Prince : who seeth not, that (by consequence) there is no assured means, to make the Common-wealth vertuous ? For though it be neuer so well ordered and disposed in the body : yet it may receive such corruption from the head, that it may perish thereby. For, as Plinius saith ; Euen as in Mens bodies, so in Common-wealths, the disease is most grievous and dangerous, which proceedeth from the head. And we commonlie see, that the manners of the people, are conforme to the manners of the Prince. Now then to conclude. What sufficient means there is in Politicall Law, to suppress the Law of the Flesh, and to make the Prince and people truly vertuous ? Is it precepts or Prohibitions ? Nothing lesse. For, if they consist but in wordes ; they are easily contemned. And (as I haue said before) Prohibition doth encrease the disease, that is to say, the offence and sin, rather then remedie it. And as for permission of euill, it doth but bewray the weaknesse of the Politicall Law, and shew the force of carnall Law : which the other is faine to permit, because it cannot redresse it. What then ? Is it punishment or reward ? Neither of both. For, as I haue signified, either the offences are so secret, that they are not subiect to punishment : or the Law is deluded, and the penaltie many waies auoyded. Or if not, yet in respect of the paines, that wicked men imagine to be in the exercise of vertue, they are little feared. And as for reward, what reward (ordained by Law) can so satisfie a sensual man, as pleasure ? Which he holdeth for his Soueraigne and chiefe good, and for the onely felicity of his life ? In so much, that I haue heard some men, most wickedly protest and sweare, that if it were not for the pleasures of the flesh ; their liues would be loathsome and hatefull vnto them. Therefore Lisurgus (with great reason) depaired, to make either the King, or the Subjects in his Common-wealth, vertuous by the force of Lawes. For which cause, he ordained (as Aristotle saith) that the Kinges of Lacedaemonia should not be perpetuall, but gouerne for a time : least some euill King, if his government were for rearme of life, might destroy the Common-wealth.

CHAP. VI.

Of Sleepe and Rest ; And what manner of seating, or lying in our Beds, ought to be observed in our sleeping, as well for civility as for health.

BY good reason did Galen say ; That sleepe is the repose of the whole body, and principally of the animal faculties, and without sleepe, a Man could not subsist : therefore there are certaine rules to be observed in sleeping, as necessary as in eating and drinking. For it is not enough, that a man sleepe seauen or eight houres in a night ; rise early in the morning ; shun sleepe after dinner, vpon an indigested stomack, &c. But he is to vnderstand withall, what comperment or behaviour is conuenient for him in sleepe. Beasts and other animals, do heerein lend vs some instruction, for they do not fall downe backward, when they prepare to rest ; but couch downe vpon one of their sides, and (almost ordinarily) on the right side, and according to Nature, neuer faile therein. Neuertheless, albeit that men are endued with reason, yet very hardly shall three men bee found, lying in on Bed, or in one company, that do take their rest after one and the same manner. For one will haue his head raised high, another low. One lyeth to sleepe on the right side, and others on the left very ordinarily. Some on their bellies, or on their backs. In regard whereof, many people (thorow want of due obseruation) doe fall into grievous diseases, which prone (oftentimes) incurable, or are found fitted in their sleeping, which falleth out too ordinary.

health, should sleepe on his right side, during the time of his first sleepe to the end, that the meates may descend into the bottom of the stomack : because it is fleshy, and lesse full of membranes then the vpper part ; and so, by consequence, more hot and proper for concoction. Afterward, for his second sleepe, hauing continued some foure houres, or thereabout, on the right side : he may turne on the left, to the end, that the liuer may the better extend it selfe, and rest vpon the stomacke. In doing thus, digestion is made perfect ; because the Liuer is hotter then the belly, and embracing all, serueth as if it were a warmth of fire. But if a man be constrained to keep his bed long, at one time & other, he must obserue turnings, one while on the one side, and then on the other.

Off sleeping on the belly, what inconueniences are caused thereby.

Off sleeping on the backe and reines.

Off sleeping on the sides.

The bodies figure in a healthfull mans sleeping sleepe soundlie. And being laid too low, it procureth broken and painefull sleepes, and engendereth offendue dreames.

To sleepe with wide open eyes, indurates (all along) the Tunicles or conuering skines of them, and so by consequence, begetteth a short or nere hand sight, because that the visuall Spirit cannot penetrate crosse-wiſe. It may also happen, that some thing falling strangely into them, may greatly harne and perill the sight. And in any sharpe or extraordinary disease, to sleepe with the eyes open, it is an assured signe of death : except the party haue been long inuired thereto, or haue had some great fluxe of the belly ; or taken some violent purgation ; or else hath endured long watchings.

To sleepe with the mouth open, is very contrarie and incommodious to the health of a man, because hee draweth abundantly to him (by the vocall Artery) all the ayre that it meeteth withall : which commonly (in the night time) is very impure and troubled. By means whereof, the Conduits whereby a man respireth, being over-moyned : either it maketh the voyce hoarse, or dull and feeble. Whereas, if a man sleepe with his mouth closed ; then the exterior ayre (by little and little, and not in any excessive quantitie) entereth at both the passages of the Nostrils, and so goeth on to the Lights, where it moderateth the heate of the heart. Which is the cause, that they which sleepe with their Lipps fast shut ; doe feele themselves the lesse disturbed. For they that sleepe open throated, by reason of the breath, which entereth and issueth forth abundantly : the tongue and rooſe of the mouth becommeth very much dried, which makes them, both in the night time, and in the morning, to finde themselves much altered.

In like manner, when the breath is some way kept and retained, concoction is made the more strongly & soundly : euen as meat is the better boyled in a couered pot. There may happen many other inconueniences beside, for in sleeping open throated ; a Feather may fall, and passe into the body, which will cause a continuall Cough ; by reason that neuer, or very hardly, it can be auoyded, and ſo grow to a deadly Phriſicke. A Serpent Stellio, Spider, or ſome ſuch venomous Creature, may alſo get his paſſage, without all meanes of recovery, as I haue knowne too often.

As concerning the Armes, if they be held croſſe-wiſe, like the ſigne of the Croſſe, or elſe haſte courbed, and the hands reſting vpon the little belly; it is very healthfull. But one thing (kinde Reader) take aſa warning, that it is a very euill cuſtome, to talke in the night time, and a notorious ineuility. For ſuch as are vſed to prattle at their wakings, doe very hardly fall to ſleepe againe. And ſo conſequently, ſuch wakings doe cauſe Crudities in them: becauſe their ſleepe haue not bin ſufficient, to boyle the meates receiued into the ſtomacke. Another reaſon is, that it impeacheth and interrupteth the reſt of others, who (perhaps) take little delight in talking at ſuch vnſit houres: but when once they haue made cuſtome of it, they keepe it as an eſpeciall habite.

Some, in their ſleepe, are ſubiect to ſnore or ſnort, eſpecially fat and round bellied people. It is a thing very odious and offenſiue, to lie by ſuch a body, or in the Chamber where ſuch a one reſteth. A man were almoſt as good, to lodge in a ſtye among the Swine, as neere or with ſuch perſons, eſpecially, ſuch as delight in liuing ciuilly and honeſtly. Therefore I will ſet downe a prettie receipt, which a Portugall Apothecarie (but yet a ſen by his Religion) taught me againſt this vndecey, and the receipt is thus. He that is ſubiect to this infirmity, halfe an houre before he goeth to reſt, let him eate a little Conſerue of an Hearbe called Perſil d'Alme, Aſſe-Perſelie, or Wilde Chernill. It is an Hearbe very ſufficiently knowne, and the Conſerue muſt be made of the root thereof. I haue made good experience of it many times. Or elſe let him gargariſe a pretty deale of good Vineger, made ſomewhat warme, a quarter of an houre before he lyeth downe. This laſt remedy was praſticed by a Courtier (in the time of King Charles the ninth) with very happy ſucceſſe: for, if he had ſnored neuer ſo little (as he was much ſubiect thereto) hee had loſt the gracious fauours of a Gentlewoman, who admitted him to her owne Lodging, her Husband being abſent.

Therefore I would gladlie perſwade Fathers and Mothers; yea, Schoole-maſters and others, who haue the charge of youth and young Children, to conſtrain and accuſtome them in their tender yeares, to honeſt, decent, and wholeſome lodging in their Beds: For, beſide the comlineſſe and ciuility, it is no meane propagation of their health. And let me tell ye more, thorough ſuch vndeceit behauiour in bed; I haue knowne many vnhappy quarrels and debates, ſometimes betwixt the Husband and Wife.

Concerning the conſtancy, of ſome Lacedemonian, Romaine, and French women:
At the deſce of their Children, hurts, and nurſing of them.

That Commonwealthe may tearm it ſelfe happy, when the Weomen are not onely chaſt: but likewiſe endued with manly Spirits, full of conſtancy (commonly) are Heroicall Children bred and borne. Which Argument giueh me leaue, to ſpeake of ſome Women among the Lacedemonians; then the Romaines; and laſtly the French: but firſt we will begin with the moſt generous Lacedemonians.

Lacedemon, Sparta, and Laconia, were all but one, to wit, a people and Countrey ſituated in Peloponneſus, a Region of Greece, where Lycurgus had not onely bene King, but alſo was their Law-Maker. He left them many good lawes and Morall precepts, which while both the Men and Weomen knew how to keepe; they continued Lords of themſelues, liuing in full enfranchiſement and libertie. But ſo ſoone as they wandered and ſwerued, from thoſe good manners which the ſaid Lycurgus had taught them: they became forthwith Seruants and Slaues vnto others. During ſuch time, as they were obſeruers of his Morall precepts; it happened, that the Athenians made Warre, in hope to ſubdue them: but as they were farre inferior to them in their forces, ſo were they as ſtoutly and valiantly reſiſted.

Among the women of Sparta, there was one, that had but one only Sonne, who was grieuouſly wounded in the foote, and greatly complained, of the ykelome paines which thereby he endured: but his Mother ſaide vnto him,

My Sonne, if thou didſt ſee vertue before thine eyes; not onely would this anguiſh bee forgotten: but (in reuenge thereof) thou wouldſt ſee thy ſelfe valiant. But the Mothers of our Countreys, doe cuſtomarily augment the grieuances of their Children, by teares and cōckering, too frequent among them. Whereas this worthy Mother, did breath her Spirit into his Heart, to teach him, how hee ſhould ſuffer harries manfully, and not to complaine, like a cowardly woman.

Another Lacedemonian Woman likewiſe, hauing tidings brought her, that one of her Sonnes was ſlaine in the battaile, ſaid: Why, he was one of my Sonnes too: reioycing in the generoſitie of her Son, and neuer mourning for his death. Contrariwiſe, another woman, hearing that her Sonne fled away cowardly; quoth ſhe, He neuer was any Son of mine. Intimating thereby, that ſuch Sonnes deſerued no acknowledgement, who de-generated from the vertue of their Anceſtors.

I cannot forget another Lacedemonian Woman, who had five Sonnes, and all of them loſt their liues, fighting valiantly for the freedom of their Countrey. She, going into the Subburbs of the City, to know the iſſue of the battaile, meeting with a Vant-cirrier, demanded how all matters went? And he told hir the farall hap of her five Sonnes. Wicked Slave quoth (he) this is no anſwere to my demand. I pray thee to tell mee, in what e-ſtate ſtandeth the affaires of the Commonwealthe? Hee told her; that the victorie went with the Lacedemonians. Why now (quoth ſhe) thou art an honeſt man, and I beare my Childrens death patiently. Was not this a Woman full of honour, and endued with an incomparable Spirit, to prefer the welfare of the Commonwealthe, before ſo many liues of her deareſt ſonnes?

Others alſe adgeeth another, who was a noble Romaine Lady, no leſſe to be eſteemed then the Lacedemonian woman. She beholding her Sonne, named Spurillus Caluſtius, that could goe no other wiſe, but euē as Beaſtes doe, on all ſoure, through the greateſt wounds he had receiued in the warres; fighting for his Countreys liberty, and perſeuiuing him to bee aſhamed, becauſe one had ſcorned him for going in that manner; ſhe ſaid vnto him. Thou ſhouldeſt bee the more ſtout; and proud of thy wound, that made thee go in this crooked manner: when grieue at that poore ſpirit, that dare not ſhow his face where thou haſt bene.

But let me telle ye, that neither Lacedemon nor Rome, contained all the generous Women: for in our Native Countrey of France, there haue bin very many, and yet are at this preſent, of whom I will for breuities ſake, alledge but two. The firſt ſhall bee Madame Margaret de Sauoye, Wiſe to the decaſed Anne de Montmorency, Conſtable of France, who had five Children, all worthily educated, and euermore moſt lovingly affected vnto the Crowne of France, as beeing very remarkable for their fidelitie, as alſo well provided of honourable eſtates. When newes was brought her, that one of her Sonnes was dead, named Mombrun, whom the moſt dearely affected about all the reſt, and was ſlaine in the battaile at Dreux, fought againſt the French Proteſtants, in the yeare 1562. and alſo that her Husband (being wounded) was there ſurprized: She ſaid, Bleſſed be God, as well for the bad as the good, and gaue him hartie thanks, not onely becauſe her Sonne was ſlaine; but that her Husband remained wounded, and a Priſoner, for the ſeruiſe of his King, &c.

Madame de Saint Blancar, Wiſe to the late magnanimous Marſchall de Birón, was viſited by a Lady of great Birth, who brought with her very goodlie workes of Silke, which thee and her Daughters had wrought in Samplers.

Madame Marshall made her answer, That she could not devise any better works exercises, wherein to enshrine her Sons and Daughters; then in the fear of God, and good manners; whereby their hearts would become magnanimous, to do service for their King, according as their Father had formerly done. And indeed, all the Male children issuing of her, were very brave minded and valiant men. As for her Daughters, over and beside their happiness, to marrie with wise and worthy Knights: so were they well educated in household discipline, by their excellent breeding, and famous houses of generous nourishing. Let then great Ladies of blood, and others of meaner birth, bee advertised by this discourse, that if it happen, that their Husbands and Children dye, or become maimed in their Kings service, or for the good of the Commonwealth: they would not bee so weak hearted, as to lament, grieve, or beate their heads against walles, because such behaviour is not seeme, but in Women of ignoble and slender worth. But fixing rather before their eyes, the generous Spirits of these Lacomian, Romaine, and French Ladies, formerly exemplified; to account themselves happy, whensoever the like disasters shall happen to them. Considering withall, that they whom they esteeme to be dead, do live, and they shall see them again at the day of resurrection, accompanied with much glory and honor.

To Job, all his goods and wealth were redoubled, onely his Children excepted, for he begat but such a number, and in the like number he had them againe. Yet herein the promise of God was as well accomplished, as in his other goods: for he knew that they were not dead, but should be raised againe, and re-knowne of their Father and Mother. It may be presumed, that such women as are so full of sorrow and vexations do not beleue any resurrection. Other- wise they would embrace aduise and en- struction, to teach their Sons & daugh- ters all such exercises, as might redound to the benefit of the Common-wealth. As their Sons to have learning, to ma- nage Armes and Horses, with all ver- tues becoming man-hood. Their Daughter to feare God, and learne wo- mens hufwifery: not idle Samplery, or Silken follies, which (else-where) is the exercise of Eunuches & Slaues. I would with me to hold as firme a purpose, as did Madame Katherine du Salaing, Wife to the late Meſſire Geffrey de Sail- let, a brave and hardy Knight in his life time. She sending her Sonnes (in their very young yeares) to Paris for enſtruc- tion, was aduised by some familiar Friend, to keepe them (as yet) at home, because they were but young and tender. She made answer, That her Children resembled vessels wholly new, wherein if good liquor were put as the first, they would ſavour thereof so long as Nature lasted. In like manner, if Children embrace good doctrine in their young age, they will relish alwaies after thereof, even to old age. Which they cannot doe, being kept vnder the Mothers Wing, as wee teame it, where neither are like Mai- sters, or commodious meanes, as is in such places, where all vertues are taught, to such as will seeke for them. For this good Lady added, That she desired rather to be without Children, then that they should be not virtuous. And indeed, such did her Sons proue to be, and good Seruitours to their King, notwithstanding all the partialities in France.

which delighteth and nourisheth it selfe by calumny and lying: whereby people of honest conuersation, do continually receiue most greivous wounds; by giuing ouer light beleefe, to such, as haue a felicity in lying. And therefore, Diogenes the Cynick being demanded, what bite of any Beast was most hurtfull and dangerous, answered: Amongst furious and wilde beasts, none like the Detractor, and among tame or gentle, only the Sower and Flatterer. Vpon the same words, Themistocles the Theban, said: There is no greater paine or miserie in the worlde, then to know and beholde the honor of an honest and good man, to be in the mercy of a venomous tongue, there to be outraged by detraacting speeches.

Full wel we know, that virtuous fame and good renoune, is more precious then any treasure whatsoever. No lesse shame and wrong is done to a man, in taking away his honest name and good esteeme, then as if hee were robbed and depouled of all his substance. But about all other, Detraction and calumny yeeldeth most pernicious effects, when Princes do willingly lend care to deprauers; by whom, euen themselves doe become at length corrupted. For the enuius detractor, dealeth like a bad Painter, who when he hath made a mishapen Cocke, commandeth his Boy, to drue all Natu- rall Cockes farre enough off from his foule handy-worke. So hee, from such as he would command or gouerne, hee strives to keepe off al honest minded men, for hee cannot worke his intent openlie, because hee stands in feare of their Ver- tue whom he hateth in his heart. Hee maketh a shew of honouring, admiring, and affectionate embracing: but vnder- hand, and behinde his backe, hee casteth forth and soweth all seditious slanders. But if his claudeſtine, and secret-wounding reports of the absent, do not quick- ly beget the yssue of his intent: hee hath yet alwaies readye in his memory, that which in elder times was obſcured by Medius.

This Medius of whom we are to speak was as the Maister, or chiefe of all the troope of flatterers, that hovered about the mightie Alexander, euen more bandy- ing against well disposed people in his Court. Hee gaue instruction, that no one should bee so bolde, as to backbite openly, or else the power of calumnie too apparently, but rather in such sort (quoth he) that about the parties bitten doe resouer his harme, yes that the gripes or scratches may remaine incurable. Euen so, by such scarpes and gripes of lies and false accusa- tions, or to call them better (according to Plutarch) by such Cankers and Gange- res, many great persons haue suffered themselves to be corrupted and retained still in their memory, detestable yntruth, deliuered of virtuous men; to their inno- cent ouerthrowe, and their owne great dishonor.

All the enmities and quarrelles, as well among great as meane persons, whence haue ensued so manie laughers, as day- ly are behelde with great greefe: neuer had any other ground or Originall, but onely detraacting the honour or repute of absent people. Now, albeit this Vice in generally, is most infamous, and about all other, vnſightly and il-ſeeming in per- sons of honor; yet, of both the sexes, I hold it to be more incivill and disgracefull to a man, then to a woman. Howbeit, I know, that there are manie people; that are of contrary opinion vnto my present purpose of speech. My first reason is, that among all the Nations of the world, there is a natural Law, obseruing it selfe; whereby a dissolute life is not held as any Vice, defect; or infamie in men: but in women it is an opprobrie, & so extreme a shame, that ſhe of whom an euill report hath once passed (be it true or false in the imposition) she standeth for euer blamed or branded. Therefore, a well aduised man, wil neuer touch the honor of wo- men.

There is likewise another reason, to wit; That Women being imperfect creatures, and of little or no dignitie at al, in respect of men, it were verie requi- site, that (seeing of themselves they are not capable, to performe any virtuous action) some bridle or restriction were imposed on them, by shame and feare of infamy, that any good qualitie (though it were perforce) might be planted in them. And it seemeth, that continency was thought more necessarie for them; then any other, for the better certitude of their Children. Now, because this hath bene enforced, euen by all ingenu- ous subtilities, Arts, and possible meanes or wayes, to make Ladies become contin- ent;

Women allowed to commit all errors, their chastitie referred.

An advertisement to Ladies, and also other women.

An act of piety to defend a woman's honor.

A History alleged by Valentinus Baruchius of Toledo, concerning the false accusation of a Dutchess of Savoy.

10 tinent; yea, it hath appeald, and (as it were) consented thereto by themselves, that in all other things they are of no validity, but continually they doe the contrary to all that they ought to do. Wherefore, seeing it is lawfull for them, to commit all other errors without blame; let them neuer bee taken with those imperfections that they have done, they being all permitted to them, which (in this respect) most not be iudged in convenient, or carelessly regarded by them; provided, that their Chastitie be preferred.

And yet for all this, I doe not inferre that it is lawfull for women to depraue or mispeake by any means: for as I have saide, it is one of the very greatest imperfections, and draweth vnto it more contempt and disgrace, then any other vice whatsoever. But I would aduise honourable and worthy women, if at anie time it happen, that a Woman haue spoken reproachfully of them, or such as do appertaine vnto them, to tolerate & make no account thereof, for the reasons forementioned. But on the contrarie; it is a worke of piety, to offend their quarrel, if any do presume to defend their honor. And so much the rather, because it was neuer knowne, that euery any Knight, who undertooke the Combat, to support the honor of a woman, was at anie time vanquished.

Wee haue some prooffe thereof, by a History, which Valentinus Baruchius, a Native of Toledo in Spain, hath sette downe in a great Latine Tome, most exactly written, and in verie elegant phrase, the briebe whereof, is thus: A Daughter to the King of England, being married to a Duke of Savoy, & Prince of Piedmont; by not yielding to the immodest requests of the Count of Pantaler (whome the Duke her husband, had left Regent and Lieutenant of all his Lands in his absence while he was busied in the wars of France, because hee was there Constable) falsely imposed on her the crime of Adulterie, which he saide she had committed with his Nephew. And being to combat against all such, as would gainefay the truth of his deposition, he presented himselfe in the Lists.

10 In the end, as a matter proceeding from Diuine inspiration, a Knight of the Noble house of Mendoza, who although he was farre inferior in bodily strength, not only in regard of a former long sickness, but also by so long a way of trauel, which had so tired himselfe and his horses; yet he accepted the cause and Combat, to maintaine the honor of that vertuous Princessse; He foiled him in fight, and made him confesse his damnable imposture. After which, partly by some grievous wounds received, but more by mere spight and hatefull malice, he died within few daies. And yet the said Count was one of the most valiant and strongest Knights (of his time) in Al Lombardy.

20 In France, about the space of threescore yeares since, the combat was threatened by King Frances, first of that name, to two French Knights, the one named La Chastaigneraye, and the other Jarnac. It was a great quartrell to bee decided, because the Lord de la Chastaigneraye, had offended the honor of a Ladie, that appertained in blood to the Lord de Jarnac. These two Knights, fighting in the single Duello, and according to the Kinges judgement, the whole Court, and all the spectators, it appeared that La Chastaigneraye, would haue the vpper hande, as hauing made good prooffe of his person, in diuers battailes, and single combates: yet notwithstanding, Jarnac slew La Chastaigneraye; and, as manie people were perswaded in Conscience, by the iust judgement of God, for hauing defamed so worthy a Ladie. If it might be permitted, I could alledge infinite other Histories, tending to this purpose: but feare of offending, is my onely hinderance. And therefore, I will conclude with the Proverbe, more then true: That neuer were Women deprauid, but by a Knave or a Coward.

How Pythagoras founde out (verie ingeniously) the iust measure and proportion of the bodie of great Hercules.

10 I T is verie memorable, & therefore not to bee let passe in silence, the ingenious inuention found out in a subtile and curious maner, concerning the true shape and measure of Hercules his body. When it was knowne, that the place where the Olympian Games were solemnized (from five yeares to five yeares) in Achaya, neere Elis, & before the Temple of Iupiter Olympus, had been measured by Hercules, who hadde there made a Stadium, containing six hundred and five and twentie foote, by the measure of his owne foote. Vnderstanding also, that the other Stadiums, which his successors afterward ordained throughout all Greece, did hold the like length of sixe hundred and five and twentie foote, it appeared yet neuertheless, that they were much shorter, then that of Hercules. For Pythagoras knew easily by this proportion, how much the foote of Hercules contained in greatnesse, from the ordinarie feete of other men. And hauing thus vnderstoode, the size or measure of his foote, hee comprehended thereby: that the whole bodie of Hercules, must needs be (according to that proportion) much greater then the bodies of all other men, in regard that his Stadium surpassed al the rest.

CHAP. X.

How the Iewes did continually, and from time to time, giue Law and Religion to such as were their Conquerours and Commanders.

10 Seneca fell into great admiration, so did diuers others, how it shold come to passe, that the vanquished Iewes, disperfed and scattered vnto the foure Corners of the world, should administer Law and Religion to their vanquishers. For, as concerning their subiectiō, they are a people that haue bene troden vnder foote by the Egyptians, Assyrians, Persians, Grecians, Romans, Turkes, &c. and how many Masters fouetier they hadde, yet they neuer changed or altered their Law. Amongst other people, in matter of their Law and Faith, hath bene found some fennible constancie: but that the subdued, transported, vilified, made slaues, led in triumph thorow Empires; that such men, I say, should not only subdue the hearts of their Triumphers to God, but (in a manner of speaking) traîne their Gods also themselves, in triumph after them, is verie admirable. That the Conquerour could not giue Law to the conquered, but that the vanquished hath done it to the victor; the subiect vnto the Prince; the Captiue to the Maister; and the condemned vnto the Iudge; Who would beleene this, I pray yee, except he saw it? And hauing scene it, how can he say otherwise, but that GOD onlie did it?

20 But if Seneca could hear me peaceably, I woulde deliuer him from this astonishment and admiration, so strangely conceited, as thus. Those Gods which the Iewes had caused to be left to the people (commonly called inuolable and immortall) consisted of dumbe and insensible Statues, disguised like men, Beastes, and Fishes; and some of them, resembled hideous Monsters. So that infamous Demons, possessed themselves of these Statues and Symulacres, and in them required red worse matters of men, then did the most detestable Tyrants that euer were. As, that a man should geld himself, lame himselfe, kill himselfe, yea, and that men should Sacrifice Women, Virgins, and Children to them.

But when the people heard speech of one only true God, the Creator of heaven and earth; and that he would be served in heart and spirit: these wordes, although they came forth of a poor slaues mouth, made Captiues of the men them selues that heard them, and subdued their Gods. What then shall we say of the Iewes transmigrations, and fitting from place to place: but that they were as so many Colonies and Preachers, to proclaim the true GOD, and euen as so many armies, to extirpate Idollies?

That it could be no otherwise, Daniel and his affociats, being as the rest) transported into Assyria, he shewed vnto the King, that the Idoll Bell (which hee caused to be worshipped, and had daily delivered him such quantities of bread made of the finest Flower, a great number of Sheepe and fatted Cattle, and fix * Amphores of Wine) was no true God, though he himselfe worshipped him, and went euery day to adore him, as believing that he deuoured all that meate and wine. He made it apparant to him, that it was but a mere manifest deceit, performed by his Priests & Sacrificers, who with their Wiues and Children, came in the night time, and ate vp all the Viands set before the Idoll, for which they were deservedly punished.

After he had thus shewne to the Assyrian King, the vanitie of the Idoll Bell, the King tooke him, and shewd him a mighty great Dragon, which the Babylonians, and himselfe, as well as the rest, worshipped beside the saide Idoll Bell. The King saide to Daniel, Thou wilt not say that this is of Brass, like the other, this cannot be denied to be a God. Daniel hauing obtained leave to kill the Dragon, without the help either of sword or staffe, with pitch, fat, and haire (which he boyled altogether) made rounde balles thereof, and threw them into the Draggons throat, which made him burst in sunder. And then said Daniel, Behold what ye haue worshipped. But for these thinges, the people threw Daniel into a denne of hungry Lions, of which Beasts hee was not deuour-red, although he had nothing giuen him to eate, in the space of seauen dayes before. At the end of which time, the King finding Daniel yet liuing amongst the Lyons caused him to be taken forth, and forsaking all Idolatrie, worshipped the true GOD, the God of the Iewes. Were not these worthy slaues, that conquered this great King, and thus triumphed?

Who gaue intelligence to Cyrus, King of Persia, concerning the true God, the God of the Israelites and Iewes, and to cause him send home the captiued Iewish people, giuing them meane to repayre the Temple, ruined by the Assyrians, commanding them also, to pray to God for his prosperity; but euen the same Slaues of the Iewes? May we not likewise say as much, of Alexander the Great? He was brought to worship the true God, throwing and prostrating himself before Jadus the High-priest, who came before him with all the people of Ierusalem, hauing their heads and feete bare, to implore his mercie, and not to bee put to death by him, because they gaue him no aide with men and victualles, when he besieged Tyre. Notwithstanding, these conquered and halfe-dead Iewes, by their humble maner of behauiour, but Gods grace more especially working, caused that great and inuincible Monarch, to fall on his Knees before their chiefe Priest; and not onely so, but to embrace them with amitie, and graunt them manie gracious priuiledges. And to their Neighbors the Samaritans, who obserued not the same Religion, he gaue inhibition and countermand, of enioying the same immunities. And himselfe would confesse, that the Iewish Law was good, but the Grecians Law was of no worth.

Did they not impose the selfsame Law on the Egyptians, who likewise led them into Captiuitie? Wee may read in the Greeke Histories, that after the death of Alexander, many of his Kindred, & some of his aduanced fauourites, possessed themselves (as best they could) on diuers portions of his Monarchy. And among the rest, Ptolomy seized on Egypt, and on many other adiacent Prouinces. And purposing to do as muchon Iudea, he was impeached by the Iewish people, who would acknowledge no other superiour, but their High-priest and Sacrificer.

Where-

The Iewes led Captiues into Egypt.

Whereupon, Ptolomy entred into Palestine, made there great deuastation and spoile, beating down diuers strong forts, and led away many thousands of them, as captiues into Egypt, where they were ill entreated; and employed in the basest & vilest slauieries. All which notwithstanding, poore foules, they ceased not to cry and call to the Egyptians, that their Religion was false, and that they had manie monstrous Gods: As Onions, a Cow, a Crocodile, and others.

In the end, their declarations were so manifest, and their cries so violent on their Idolatries, that the verie wisest men of the Countrey, with their King philadelphus (one of the successors to the former King, who led the poore Iewes awaie as Captiues) lent eare vnto them, and found all true, which the miserable and distressed Iewes had preached to them.

In regard whereof, the King wold needs make more ample enquiry, concerning their Law and Religion. He caused all the Books of the Old Testament to be translated out of Hebrew into the Greeke tongue, by seauenty Interpreters of the Iewes (most learned in the said tongues) seperately, so that they could not confer one with another, to know whether they agreed in their traduction of the Booke of the Old Testament, or no. When he had found a mutuall concordance in the severall translations, and had read, and read againe the saide Booke; hee acknowledged, that his Captiues the Iewes had saide nothing but the truth; and that there was but one God, the GOD of the Israelites, and the Iepes. Wherefore, he afterwards embraced the feare of God in his heart, reformed his life, and set at liberty all the Captiue Iewes, throughout his Land. Thus you may see, how the vanquished gaue Law and Religion to the victor.

When that the Egyptians had suffered the Iewes to liue in peace, the Syrians within a while after, conceived hatred against the Iewes, and perceiving Ciuill diffentions to be among them, they also warred on them. Antiochus their King (by the meanes of Traitors) was brought into Ierusalem, where hee placed Idols in the Temple, ravaged all Iudea, and ledde away a great number of Captiues, according as Zonarus declareth. Yet the poore captiued Iewes shewed vnto the Syrians, that they had done verie euill, in polluting the Temple of the true GOD, for which they should be seuerely punished. As afterwards it came to passe, for the saide King Antiochus was conquered by the Romans, and paid tribute to them. Then could the Syrians and their King, remember the predictions of their poore captiues, whom they did gladly set at libertie, and entreated, that they would pray to God for them, being afterwards in the Romans safeguard.

It were a matter impossible for me, to set downe all the Kingdomes, where the Iewes haue beene kept Captiues; & persecuted: and yet neuertheless, still acknowledged, that they worshipped the only true God, and brought diuers kings and people to discernie their Lawe: And some verie speculatiue Diuines haue bin perswaded, that these Captiuities of the Iewes had not beene permitted by God, but onely to the end, that they should beare testimonie in all the quarters of the earth: that the Histories of the Olde Testament were true, and that the God of the Iewes, was the only true God. Therefore, it was no such matter of wonder, as Seneca made it, that euermore the Iewes gaue Law to the Conquerours, and such as kept them in captiuitie. For the law of the Gentiles, was nothing else but vanitie and lies: but that of the Iewes, was grounded on the knowledge of the true God.

CHAP. XI.

Of Sorrow or Mourning for the dead. How it hath beene obserued, and yet is to this day, in manie Prouinces and Countreies of the world.

O moume and sorrow for Parents, Kindred, & Friends deceased, is not any matter of Nouelty, but most ancient. For it is found, that seauen score and ten years after the flood, and threecore years after the death of Noah, and in the year of the world, two thousand sixtie, according to the calculation lation of Carion, and of other Chroniclers, that Abraham mourned and for-rowed for his wife Sara, the space of thirtie days. I thinke, that the Iewes afterward continued (and yet do to this day) the custome of mourning, for no more then 30 dayes. But Christians, belonging to the Church of God, vsied mourning a whole yeare, to wit: clothed in blacke for the most part: but Women, were clothed partly in white, and partly in blacke; efpecially in some Countreys, which was done according to the diuersity of Nati- ons. But the ancient Romaines, before they were Christians, mourned 9. mo-neths onely. Heere we are to know, that if a Christian man or woman, in those parts, wearing mourning, came to agree againe in a second marriage, during the yeare appointed for mourning, the Ma- trimony was stayed, but thence-forward, hee nor shee were bound to weare any more mourning.

The people of the Greece Church, mourned a whole yeare, like to them of the Lixing and Romaine, and neuer made any motion of a second marriage, during the limited yeares space: but did much more, for euery day of that yeare, at a certaine appointed houre; all the people of the house, vsied lamentations, and very greeuous cries, for the party deceased.
But at the renewing of the day, they left off their mourning habits, and Funerall forrowings. In the times of Terence and Plautus, Commicall Poets, the like was practised.

They that inhabit the great Isle of Tap- paria, and (wel-neere) thorow all the Pro- vinces, which are called Malabaria, after that the dead mans bodie is publickely throwne into a fire, and one of his liuing wiues therewith, the nearest in Kindred to the deceased party, weareth a garment of Violet colour, and neuer putteth it off for a whole yeares space, eating also but one meale a day during that yeare.

They that are of the Mahometan Re- ligion, dwelling in the lesser Asia, Europe, and Affrica, do mourne no longer for a ny man or woman deceased, but onely eight dayes; & that it is the limited time for mourning. Their Garments are of coarse wollen cloth, dyed of colour (called among them, Chenine or Felte) and whereof coverings are made for horses.
But such as will not weare them of this fashion, do carry a white Linnen Cloth, hanging down from the Turbant so low as the Girdle, and so go on with Teares and cries to the graue.

If the deceased Turk be a man of quality, and had Dogges and Horses, before he bee brought forth of his dwelling to buriall, they rub their noses with some sharpe graine of hearbe, to vryge teares out of their eyes, that they may appeare to mourne for their deceased Maister, & they are made to follow the bodye to the Graue, which commonly is without the Cittie, and so they continue on the mourning for eight dayes. Al which notwithstanding once euery day (during this short time of sorrow, at a certaine limited hour in the day time, all the Kindred and friends do meet at the graue, to pray to God for the dead mans soule. The eight dayes being ouer-passed, all mourning is laide aside, and then they make a Feast: which being likewise ended, the suruiuer may then seeke after a seconde match.

Some do Write, that the Parents or Kindred of the dead, during the space of a whole yeare, do giue order to certaine men, called Saintons, to read euery daie in the Alchoran ouer the Graue, for the saluation of the deceased parties soule. In like maner, that some women very much deuoted to the Mahometan Religion, do leauie diuers Legacies, to such as vie the was, during the space of a year after their husbands death, to bring them home the heades of Christians, to offer vpon their graued. And commonly, they allow a Sultain of Gold, to bee giuen for euery head: but he must produce good witnes and testimony, and it must bee soundly verified, that it is a Christians head. Most vniuall they do but bring the skin or form of the face, but sildome the whole head.
And this is the mourning of the Turkes.

It was my chance to find another mourning, of much longer continuance, then those formerly recited; which is vsied in a great Province, named Cormos, subiect to the Persian and professing the Maho- metan Religion. This Province lyeth in so hot a country, that the inhabitants are wholly blacke. Neuertheless, the Lande is rich, abounding in Horses, gold, Silver, and Precious stones, of inestimable value for many rare and beautifull embellishings. Notwithstanding, the aire is meruitherefore (very often) it causeth their eth well enough how to appropriate to himselfe (by way of Eschetage) what goods soeuer doe belong to strangers, being no Natiues of the Country. And therefore when any one there dyeth, the wife of the dead man doth weare mourning the space of foure yeares, and neuer marrieth againe during that time.

But all that long and irksom limitation, the hath certaine sequestred houres daily, to kneel in her Chamber, accompanied with some of her neereft kinred & friends; to make moanes, lamentations and funerall complaints, for the losse of her deceased Husband. As concerning the Men of this Country, and so of Tur- ky, I cannot giue ye any assurance, of their mourning for the death of their Wiues; because their King despeneth with them, for the marrying of manie wiues. But the women of this Province of Cormos, are much to be commended for their chastity, beyond many of them remaining among vs, who rarely will tary a yeares space of mourning.

CHAP. XII.

Of diuers Paganes, that tooke the matter very offense, and a great dishonour to themselves: that any one should misprize, or contemne their Religion.

Asianus reporteth, that neere the City of * Manti- nes in Aradia, there was a Temple consecrated to Neptune, the entrance whereof was interdicted to men: and yet notwithstanding, it had no other guard or defence, but certaine little woollen cords, placed before the Gate, which caused such dreadfull fears, as the place thereby was accounted very reuerent. It chanced, that Epythes, Son to Hippotes, King of Aradia, a man slenderly affected to Religion, without any re-uerence or respect, did cut the faide cords, and as he would haue entred into the Temple: the Waters of the Sea gushed forth abundantly vpon him, and wholly blinded him; so that hauing lost his eyes in this manner, he presently died. The auncient fame and report was, that the Waters were noted and obserued to reft in that Temple: And it was reputed to bee the greater Miracle, because the Sea was three miles, or thereabout, distant from that place.

In the City of Cabiria in Becia, within a mile of Thebes, there stood a Temple dedicated to Ceres, and entrance thereinto was granted to none; but only the Cabirians. It so fell out, that Ad- dominus, one of the Captaines to Xerxes, entring; hereinto with his Souldiers, to rob and bereaue it of the Treasures;
both he & all the rest of his Army, were (in an instant) surprized with such a sudden fury, that casting themselves down headlong into very deep ditchess, and from the tops of Rocks and Mountains, they all dyed most miserably. The like happened to the Souldiers of great A- lexander, who hauing taken Thebes by power, they would likewise enter into the said temple; but being smitten with lightning from heauen, they ended their liues cruelly, which proued a mightie terror to the Nation of that age. Phie- gyas, King of the Oreghemians, or (according to Virgil) of the * Lapithes, hauing done infinite dammages in Greece, surprizing many Townes and Cities became (in the end) so ouer-weening & foolish bold, that he lacked the Temple of Apollo in Delphos, and slew Philonas, who brought a power of people to re-lieue the Temple. But it came to passe, that within no long while after, all the Country of the Phlegians was vterlic ruinated, by a violent earthquake, and flaming Arrows shot from Heauen, which killed most of the people, & they few that remained, died of the plague.
Vpon which sacriledge, and contempt of the Gods, Virgil saith, that their king Phlegyas is grieuouly punished in Hell.

King Cambyfes his vnhallowed intent against the

The Sybarites, people of a city in great Greece, (so called, by reason of a Riuer which passeth there along, named Sybaris) being desirous to vnderstand the future felicity of themselves and their City: sent to consult with the Oracle of Delphos, to be resolved in the matter. Where to Apollo in his Pythium gave them this answer. Your Land shall run to perdition, & your felicity shall haue end; when you begin to make more account of men, then of the Goddesses. The Ambassadors haue heard this answer, made report thereof to the Sybarites: who took good courage to them, perswading themselves assuredly, that such disaster should neuer happen to them, and therefore their felicity would be eternal. But within some pretty while after, it happened, that a Maister beating his Slaue nere to the Temple: the Slaue fled from him, & knowing that the temple afforded refuge, ran therinto, and mounting vp to the Altar, embraced the Image. His Lord pursued him, & hauing forcibly recovered him from the Statue, without any reuerence of the place, began againe to giue him many Bastonades. The seruant fled to him oncemore, ran to saue himselfe at the Tombe of his Lords deceased Father: but then, in meer paternall duty, hee left punnishing any more, and pardoned the fault which hee had committed. All this being noted by Amiris, one of them that had bin Ambassador to Delphos, hee cald to remembrance the former words of the Oracle, and declared to some other of his Friends, that the time for accomplishment of Apollos answer, was euen now come. But they giuing no credit to his words; imagined that hee was become foolish. VVhich when hee perceived, he took hold of their supposition, and (soone after) counterfeited as if he were growne somewhat distracted in his senses. So that, making publicke sale of all his goods, and getting a large summe of Money together: he departed suddenly thence, & went to dwell in Morea, expecting continually the fate of his Country. It returned, that within no long time after, the Citty of the Sybarites (by what accident I know not) was rased, rent, and torne, and vntirely made a heap of stones.

Cambyfes, the Son of Cyrus, sent fiftie thousand men to destroy the Temple of Iupiter Hammon; but by a sudden furious tempest, they were all quite ouerwhelmed with heaps of sand, before they could get thither, and so perished most wretchedly, without executing their pernicious designe. All they which were with Quintus Cepio, at the robbery of the Gold out of the Temples of Tholose in France, to the quantity of one hundred & ten thousand markes of Gold, and 500. Millions of markes in Silver: dyed every Man of them (with all their kindred and Families) within that yeares compasse, and not a boue one of them, did carry so much as one piece thereof home to his own house. Strabo hath left it written, that this Treasure of Tholose, was a part of the Delphian riches. For Brennus, Captaine of the Gauls, being assailed by the Teltesages, had ransacked Delphos: according as we find it recorded by Iulius the Historian. As then these Teltesages made their retreat to Tholose, which was their ancient Country: the plague began to affaile them, and neuer ceased, vntill such time, (as answer came from the Diuines) that they had drowned all the Gold and Silver (gotten by sacrilege) in the bottome of the Thoulouzan Lake. Out of which place it was (long time after) won and gotten, by Q. Cepio & his followers, who carried it thence to their owne deare detriment. The Romains hauing surprized Carthage, certaine of them despoyled the Statue of Apollo, of a costly robe of Gold worne about him: but the hands of him that committed this sacrilege, were found cut off, and fastned to the same garment. And Brennus, captaine of the forenamed Gauls, entred forcibly into the Temple of Apollo at Delphos: and hauing committed it to publike spoile, was so furiously possessed, that hee slue himselfe with his own hands.

Of the Seiane Horfe. And of the admirable Statue of a Horfe, erected in Alitina, a Citty in the Country of Olympia.

Caius Bassus, in his Commentaries, and Iulius Modestinus, in his second Booke of confused Questions (agreeing with that which Anulus Gellius reporteth with that which Attick nights) do relate a memorable History, concerning the Seiane horfe, & in this manner. Caius Bassus in Comment. lib. 3. Cap. 10. Iul. Modest. in Quest. lib. 2. Cap. 1. Aut. Gellius in Noct. Attic.

there was a horfe bred, reported to be of the race of those Horfes, belonging vnto Diomedes the Thracian, which horfe Hercules brought with him into Greece, after he had slain the said Diomedes. This horfe was of a Bay colour, and of vnusall greatness; his Maine yellowish and long; his Nostrils very wide and open; his eyes great; his legges well formed; his breast goodly, and his taile long: in briefe, hee was perfectly faire, well limbd, stout, and full of courage for the wars. In the time of his beeing but a Colte, great rumour ran abroad of him, in Asia, India, Thebes, Pentapolis, and all ouer Greece, procuring very many (from all these parts, and many more beside) to trauaile to see him; others to buy him; and diuers to draw his figure or proportion. But this goodly Beast had such an vnfortunate decline, that whosoever was his Maister, must needs perish, with his Familie, House, and Goods whatsoever. For prooue wherof, such as bought him, and mounted on his backe (which were fieworthy Knights) dyed all both miserably and infamously. The first that bought and backt him, being then little aboute two yeares old: was Cneus Seianus, a romaine Consul, and of great birth, as also verie verie wife in gouerning the Commonwealth, who being to returne out of Persia to Rome, followed the faction of Octavius Augustus; in regard wherof, sixe moneths after hee had bought the said Horfe, Marke Anthoine caused his head to be fittened off in Greece, and commanded that his body should remaine without any buriall. Now, because that Cneus Seianus was the first Buier and Maister of this Horfe, and also had (by his death) first experimented his fatal fortune: hee was therefore called the Seiane Horfe.

Afterward, a Romaine, named Cornelius Dolabella, Consul also: bought this horfe at an hundred thousand Sestertians, which amounted to the value of two thousand Duckets. But if hee had knowne, that hee bought misfortune, at so deare a rate: he neuer would haue accepted him in gift: For within lesse then a yeares space after hee had him, the vnfortunate Dolabella was massacred in Syria, in a mutiny of people that rose against him, and being thus slaine, his body (in meere despight) was dragd along the streets, Dolabella being thus dead, Cai- us Cassius, who had great command in Rome, performed many warlike exploits in Asia, and had besieged and ouercompt Dolabella in that expedition; took the horfe for his owne employment; but hee had not kept him any long while, all his troups being vanquished, and his Armie quite broken, him selfe dyed very miserably.

Thus writeth Anulus Gellius, howbeit, I haue else-where read, that at a Dinner, both hee, his Wife and Children, were poysoned, and all them dyed within an houre after. Vpon the death of Cassius, this vnhappy and disastrous Horfe hapned into the power of great Marke Anthony, who found him to laire, and well fitting his owne minde, that hee gaue in recompence to the bringer of the horfe, as much as hee would haue giuen him if hee had bought him. Marke Anthoine was vanquished by Augustus Caesar, in a battaile on the sea neere to Adium, and sauing himselfe by flight into Alexandria, (where likewise hee was engirt, with sharp besieging;) hee stabd his owne Sword into his belly, and so perished by a violent and contemptible death. When Marke Anthony was thus dead, a Knight of Asia, named Nigidius, bought the Horfe, at a reasonable price, because now hee grew to waxe older; but his successe proued as deare and fatal, as any of the former owners, and much more notorious. For within the yeares time of buying this Horfe, as he rode with him ouer the Riuer Marathon: the Horfe stumbling in the Water, could by meanes recouer himselfe, but there, both Maister and Horfe were drowned, and neuer after any tidings heard of them. This Historie made way to the ancient and well knowne Proverb, to wit; Hee had the Seiane Horfe, which continuall was spoken of him, that came to any miserable and vnfortunate end. As the like was otherwise vttered, He met with the Gold of Tholose, for the reasons remembered in the precedent Chapter.

A very admirable matter is likewise remembered, of the Statue of the Horfe of Iormius, erected in Alitina, a Citty of Olympia in Elir. There stood a horfe of Braffe, without any taile; yet appearing very goodly, and forged by the hands of Dionysius the Argine, in honor of Phormis the Arceatari, as was plainly giuen to

Of Androchia and Alcida, who were Sisters. Also of Macharia, Daughter to Hercules: Which Ladies, for the safety of their Countries, slew themselves.

*Sophy in Antig.
Pomp.*

Sophocles maketh mention, in one of his Tragedies, that at Thebes, in the temple of Diana Eulisa, were buried two Virgins; daughters to Antipemus the Thebanes Citizen; the one, being named Androchia, and the other Alcida.

It happened that Erginus, King of the Orchomenians, hauing besiedged the Citie of Thebes, with full determination to ruinate it, in reuenge of the death of his Father Clamen: the Thebanes consulted with the Oracle, concerning theyr fortune in this extremitie. Afterward, when the two fore-named young virgins had vnderstood from the Oracle, that if two such Virgins were to bee found (of Noble Family) and would bee so courageous as to kill themselves: they should thereby bee the cause of theyr Citties freedom, and ouerthrowe of the Eneinie. These two young Ladies, desiring to be that happie paire of Virgins, and preferring their Countryes deliuerance before their owne liues: killed themselves presently, and the enemy returned ashamed and foiled; whereby both honor and victorie remained to the Thebanes, to the eternall praise & memories of those two worthy Virgins.

Hercules escaping the power of Euristheus, went into Thrace, where hee remained til the time of his death. He being dead, Euristheus demanded his Children of Seix, Lord and commander of Thrace, who fearing theyr liues losse, sent them to Theseus at Athens, to whose especiall care and trust hee recommended them. When Euristheus had intelligence thereof, he proclaimed war against the Athenians: who as well for their owne safetie, as the Children of Hercules, determined constant resistance against Seix. But consulting with the Oracle, which side should be the Conquerour in this doubtfull triall, the Oracle gaue answer, that they should haue the dayes victory, provided, that one of Hercules his Children, must first die. This was no sooner heard by Macharia, Daughter to Hercules: but instantly she slew her selfe, and the Athenians were the Conquerors. Thus you may see, how the Deuill could get himself sacrifices, and make human creatures prodigall of their liues to him, in those darke dayes of ignorance, when almost the whole world beleued those deluding Oracles: wherein, for any one truth, infinite Lies, Riddles, and Ambages, were deliuered vnto the poore ouer credulous people.

CHAP. XVII.

How hurtfull a thing it is to endure fasting or hunger: And what the reason is, that aged people are more capable thereof, than youthfull bodies, yet without any preiudice. Also, whence it proceedeth, and upon what occasion, that fasting is hurtfull to chollerick persons, and profitable to the Phlegmaticke.

Phlistions doe hold opinion, that two principall inconveniences doe ensue by Hunger and Fasting: the one is, the naturall heate is thereby consumed; and the other, that the humiditie of the stomack is thereby weakened. The body that is most offended by these two harms, endureth hunger with exceeding great difficulty: but whereas these annoyances doe cause no oppression, it is suffered with the greater ease. The Infant then that encreaseth, hath his naturall heat in sufficient strength, and radicall moisture verie subtil: which resolue it selfe much more by equall proportion, in not enduring hunger then, then it can doe in any other degree of age.

Moreover the sensitiue vertue is then forcibly moued, whereby it suffereth hunger with much passion and damage, which causeth both heat & the naturall Spirit to diminish mightily, & keeping nourishment then from him: is the maine hinderance to his growth and encreasing. By which occasion we may perceiue, that an Infant or young child is more injured by hunger, then all persons else in any other age.

The young man, that hath attained to his intire and perfect encreasing, although his naturall heate bee as strong as that of the Infant: yet notwithstanding, he hath his naturall humiditie more grosse, and therefore it cannot so soone dissolve, as that in the Child. In which respect, hunger doth no way so much offend a Man of middle age, as a young chests or coffers, to yeild a pleasing sauer to Cloathes and Garments, as also to preferre them from Mothes & worms. Then, in regard that they first came out of Persia and Media: men vsed to call them Persian Apples, and Median Apples; Howbeit, Iuba, in his Histories, rearmes them Apples of Gold, or Apples of the Hesperides. In no long while alter, men began to eate of the Cedar, and thereupon appeared, that a meruailous vertue was found therein, against the venome and poyson of Serpents & Aspics. To approue the truth thereof, we finde it credibly recorded, that two men, being condemned to death in Egypt, their sentence was; that they should be exposed to Serpents, to bee deuoured by them, which kind of death had bene vsed among them from olde Antiquitie. The day being come whereon they should dye, one of them was (accidentally) visited by a friend of his in the Prison, who was champing and chewing a peece of Cedar in his mouth, and bestowed some litle part thereof on the condemned Prisoner, which hee accepted very thankfully, and byring thereon, gaue some also to his deathe companion, in meere simplicity, and without knowledge of any secret vertue therein.

They being brought to the place of death, and thrust out to the greedy Serpents; they would by no meanes come neere them, or touch them, but auoyded so farre as possibly they could from them. The Officers of Iustice being there present, began to examine, what might be the reason of this sildome scene wonder: whereupon they found, that the Cedar (eaten by both the Prisoners) was the onely cause. But in regard they intended a more ample proof thereof, on the next day following, they caused one of the condemned Men to eate of the Cedar againe, but gaue to the other his accustomed food, and bringing them both to the place of execution: all the people beheld, that the Serpent ran fiercly on him that was fasting from Cedar, tearing and renting him in infinite morsels; but left the other againe without any touch, who died also the day following by the same Serpents, according as his fellow had done before him.

younger Child or Infant. For it is vniuersally obserued, that in Adolency, Youth-hood, or when a man is neereft to his original, with so much the more paine and difficultie hee endureth hunger, because his naturall moisture is more subtile and resourable.

The old, or aged man, hath his naturall heat much abated or dected, and his humidity greatly thickned or closed together, which cannot so easily resolue it selfe. The sensitiue vertue also is highly decayed in him, and senteth nothing so perfectly, as when hee was an Infant, a Youth, or in his strength and best of yeares. And therefore, hee endureth not so much paine and damage then, as in the precedent conditions. But he who is the decrepite, or very old man, although he haue his naturall moisture much more grosse, his heate very feeble, and his sensitiue vertue farre more imperfect, then is in all the other Ages, as being Neighbour and neere to his extinction: yet for all that, how little foueuer he suffereth the accident or discommoditie of hunger, it endangereth the quite quenching of his naturall heat, whereon immediatly he dyeth. And therefore it is very needfull, that food should be as often giuen to the decrepite man, as to the young Infant, but yet diuersly. For the Infant must haue enough at every time giuen him, and but little to the decrepite man: because, if he should receiue ouer much, it would suffocate the small quantity of heate remaining in him; as we see by a slender flame, when too much Oyle is put into the Lamp.

Hunger is caused in vs, and all other Creatures else, by reason that naturall heat continually consumeth, and dryeth the humiditie of our members, which being consumed, consumeth likewise the moisture of the veines; and their consumption causeth attraction from the Liuer, and the Liuer from the stomacke. These humours thus consumed, the Soueraigne Creator hath ordained in vs, that the Splene or Milt should conuay the Melancholly humor to the stomack, which being eager and corrosiue, consumeth likewise the substantiall humiditie in the stomacke it selfe, and so inciteth a desire of foode, from whence ensueth the occasion of Hunger. Which is very hurtfull to Chollerick bodies, because whensoever they suffer hunger, their chollerick seedeth into the stomacke, and will not let them eate; but are possessed with fumes and vapours while choller so mounteth, which afterward (when they doe eate) corrupteth and putrifeth the meates receiued. But in Phlegmatick complexions, there is humidity enough in the stomacke, and in all the members. And therefore it is profitable for them to endure hunger, for by their sufferance thereof, their bad and ill-affected humours are consumed away by choller.

CHAP. XVIII.

¶ That there is not any thing in the World, which is more hurtfull to man, or procureth him more losse and danger, then the Tongue: with many notable Examples to that effect.

Nachar is the Philosopher, being one daie conversing with his Schollers, concerning the tongue, spake thus vnto them. Not without great Art and Mytery (say my Schollers) did Nature bestow on vs two Feet, two Legges, two Armes, two Hands, two Eyes, two Eares, and no more but one tongue. As signifying thereby, that either to see, or heare, are offices which we can doe as often as we please: but to speake well, wisely, and modestly, is more then we can easily asaine vnto. He said moreouer. For no other occasion hath Nature left our face vncouered, our eyes, eares, hands, feete, and all the rest of our body, except the tongue: which she impaled with leaues, and walled about with teeth, and afterwards defended it with lippes: but onely to let vs vnderstand, that (in this present life) there is nothing that defendeth a stronger guard, then the vnbrield tongue. We haue no part belonging to our body, which Nature hath so surely Rampiared vp, as the tongue. Before it is placed a Bulwarke of teeth, to the end, that it should be obedient bedient to reason, which restraines it, (as with a strong bridle) within: but if it will not be kept backe, her intemperance may be iudly punished, with a bloody gripe betwene the teeth.

The same Philosopher banqueting one day with Solon, was esteemed to be wife, because being a-sleepe afterward, hee was noted by one or two: to hold his right hand on his mouth, and the lefse upon his naturall partes of secrecie, as thereby declaring, that the tongue had neede of a much stronger Bridle, then the other partes of Nature. For the tongue containeth in it both good and euill; And Solomon saith: Both life and death is in the power of the Tongue. If we use the tongue well (saith Erasmus) it is as a Horne of plenty or abundance: but if it want a Governour, there is nothing more offensive. The Philosopher Pittacus saide. The Tongue resembleth to the world, the forme of a Lances point, but is much more dangerous: for the Lances woundeth the Fleish onely, but the Tongue striketh quite thorough the Heart.

Affranus, another Philosopher, was one day demanded, wherefore he spent the most part of his time, in walking among the Mountaines, hazzarding his life euery houre, where so many wilde Beastes might suddenicly deuour him? Hee presentlie replied. Beastes haue no other weapons but their teeth, where-with to teare me: but Men cease not daily to commit outrage with their members, and to defame with their malicious Tongues.

*Plutar*ch, in his Booke of Banishment, declareth, that such Men as had bad and wicked tongues should be banished and confined for halfe a yeare, into some distant seuerate place; without power of speaking to any one whatsoeuer. And many times it happened, that some of them chose rather three yeares slavery in the Gallies, then to be so bard of speaking for halfe a yeare.

Demosthenes, a Man of great authoritie, and preuailance in speaking, was much feared throughout all Greece, and therefore talked at his owne pleasure. In regard whereof, all the chiefe of the Athenians met together on a day, and are meet appointed place, concluding to bestow a large recompence, and liberall Wages also on him best, and calling him in among them, to let him vnderstand their bounty and beneuolence: (in name of the rest) spake thus vnto him. Demosthenes, we doe not bestow this great gift, either because thou hast spoken, or that thou shouldst speak: but onely to the end, that thou shouldst hold thy peace.

Marke Anthony caused the Father of Eloquence to be slaine, vpon no other occasion: but because hee had spoken too aduantageously on his behalfe. Which was manifestly declared by Fulvia, Wife to Marke Anthony, when shee procured *Cicero*s Tongue to bee put out, for his false speaking, and pierced it thorough (in many places) with Needles. Salust, the Romaine Oratour, was verie odious vnto Strangers, and seuerely pursued by his owne Companions: because he neuer tooke Penne in his hand to Write, but it was against some especiall persons neither would he open his mouth, but it was to depraue some others. The Lydians had an inuiolable Law, to punish Detractions with death, but Homicides and Men-killers, they condemned them to labour in their Gallies. So that among those barbarous people, for one Man to depraue or defame another: it was reputed a far greater offence, then if he had slaine him.

As King Darius far one day at Dinner in his Tent; such as hee pleased to accept in companie at his owne Table, beganne to moue some Military Argument, concerning the warlike affaires of Alexander the Great. In which discourse, a Captaine, named Mygdonius, (one very highly fauoured of Darius) deliuered some reproachfull speeches of Alexander, whereupon Darius suddenicly saide. Hold thy Tongue. Mygdonius, and know, that I brought thee not with mee to this Warre, to depraue Alexander with thy Tongue; but onely to conquer him in Armes, if thou canst. By which example, we may perceiue, how detestable and odious the Vice of Detraction is: because it is apparent; that euen Enemies themselves or choise saucies of sundry tastes, things in those dayes neuer heard or thought on; their Feasts & Banquets being much more modest then ours now are. In those elder dayes, thorough al the cities in Greece, on certaine dayes of the yeare;

they were wont to make Banquets, common for who soeuer pleased to come to them. For maintenance whereof, eu-ery Citizen gaue the tenth part of all his fruites, which were gathered duely at the Cities entrance, by some of the society thereto deputed. The care and charge of the whole Banquet: was referred to a worthy Lady, who had (vnder her) three or foure women of more inferiour degre, beside two seruants, that fed the Fire with wood. In the house appointed for the Feast, first of all were prepared two Tables for the Citizens, and two other, onely for strangers. The assistants were all serued with equall allowance: but younger people had lesse flesh meates afforded them, then the elder. At each Table there was appointed a Vessell full of Wine, well qualified with water, whereof they dranke in common, and after they had indifferently eaten, they had other wine brought them, of better qualitie then the first: whereof the grauer sort dranke so much as they pleased, but the younger: in more moderate manner.

The Noble Lady, who helde the supreme authority of the Feast, accompanied with some other Ladyes; brought the most delicious meates to them, that in times of warre or peace, had done any famous and remarkable deede, as being those that best deserved honour. When this Dinner, or Supper (as it fell out to be) was ended, they would sit still, consulting first together on publique affairs and afterward on matters appertaining to the warres, with repetition of their names and seruices, that had best deferued of the Common-wealth; profited their Country; benee beneficiall to the Temples, and household Gods of euery Familie; and were dread-lesse of death in all good actions. These wanted not also thereby to a more humane, ciuill
and pleasing kinde of life. Suetonius Tranquillus declareth, that the Emperor occasions.

The Lacedemonians, at their marriage Feasts, would permit no more but nine persons to dine together, which they did as in reuerence to the nine Muses. And this was conditioned also, that if any man talked at the Table, no wine should be giuen him, to drinke; so that if a man desired to drinke, hee must be sure to holde his peace. This law would serue to good purpose in these dayes, because both in our marriage Feasts and other Banquets, nothing is more usually heard then noyse, rumour and babling, and they are best esteemed, that can maintaine the longest prattling. The Naxosites in the Hallowed Feasts, which they celebrated in honour of their Father Dionysus, or Bacchus, in the prytaneum, were all clothed in white Albes, then called Prittanem Gownes, and when they had heard the voice of the publique Cryer, they would al fall down on their knees to the ground, and hauing saide certaine private prayers, seate themselves at the Table, euery one receiving two measures of wine; the Priests of Apollo Pithegus, and of Bacchus
only excepted, who were allowed a double portion, as well of wine, as of all other things beside. Afterward the vse was, that euery one should haue a fayre large slice of very pure bread giuen him, and thereon a piece of conser Bread, with a morrell of Swines Flesh on it, beside a Cake of Barly Bread fryed, or else so much Meale fryed, or a misset of Pottage made of Hearbes, according to the season of the yeare, two Egges, a cantle of Cheese, dried Figs, and a Cake crowned with a Garland. If any one (in these sacrifices) provided any other meates then those above rehearsed, he was to be ammored with a pecuniarie fine.

The vse of making Feastes and Banquets (as Aristotle wisely) was inuented by Nalus, a very auncient King of Italy, who kept company with grosse and boorish people, feeding among them, obliging them (by that meanes) to yeld him the more obedience, and he drawing the
also thereby to a more humane, ciuill

yet they might so much honor one another, as to send part of his Viands to the others Table, but not to perake in eating thereof. But being demanded, what was his reason for making this Law, he answered, The occasion that moued me to forbid Playes and Feasting, was for nothing else: but because in those places, Men cannot obtaine from blaspheming the Gods, and (as Feasts) one Neighbour defameth or backbiteth another. Cicero writeth, that Cato the Censor, being at the point of death, deliuered these wordes. Among other things done by me, not as became a good Romaine Citizen, but rather like a presumptuous and barbarous Man; was this: I being once entreated by a friend of mine, that I would come and dine with him: I suffered my selfe to be over-ruled, and went vnto him, which I ought not to haue done. For to speake uprightly, no generall and vertuous man, should goe to eate in the House of any Friend, or other: because, hee thereby looseth his owne liberty, and hazardeth his reputation and grauity in extraordinary perill. A certaine man demanded of Eschines the Oratour, what hee should doe, to be esteemed a good and honest man? To whom he thus answered, If thou wouldest bee a perfect honest Grecian, thou must goe to the Temples willingly, and to warre vpon necessity: but to Feasts or Banquets, neither on thine owne free will, or any importunitie; An answer well deseruing eternal memory.

Pericles, a man of great account among the Athenians, did so highly detest the custome of Feasts and Bankets, and the prouision appointed for them: as hee did neuer dine or sup with any Friend of his, but onely Eurytolemus, on the day of his Nuptials. And yet he was a man of great honor, very liberall, and maintained many people with his goods. Nor doe I (for all this) whollye condemne Feasts and Banquets: provided, that modestie bee obserued in them. For I hold it very vicious and vniuersally, to shun honest conuersation, and ciuill resort to feede together: as is obserued in Societies and Companies, as well Religious, as others, in their Refectories or dining Haules, as we vse to tearme them. For, not onely Nature, but amity also necessarily requirereth; that we should support this Custome of Banquets, which the Latines Neuertheless, I much mislike, and iudge it worthy of great reprehension; to super-exceede both in pompe and superfluitie in our Feastes, with such diversity of meates, as (many times) prouokes to a mans vndoing. For nothing makes vs so much like vnto brute beasts; as gluttonous gurmardise, and study wholly applied for the belly.

CHAP. XX.

Of many Men, that by their Prodigalitie and lauish kinde of life, made expence of all their faculties in very short time.

He most Prodigall Man of Auncient times, was Epicurides the Athenian, surnamed the Little Man; who in fixe daies, consumed all his wealthy Patrimony. Paschivrus king of Crete, after he had spent all that hee had, and could make beside: at length sold his Kingdome, and liued afterward priuately, in the City of Amathunta, where he dyed miserably. Ethiops, the Corinthian, sold to Archias, all his lands and inheritance, both what hee had in present possession, and was to enioy by his Birth-right: onely to maintaine his excessive drinking. Cleops, King of Aegypt, having laide out vspeakable expences, for the building of a mightie huge Pyramides, was brought to such extreme necessity; that for his owne meere maintenance, he was enforced to expose his Daughters virginity to public sale, to make Money of her lasciuious and dishonest pleasures.

Marcus Tigellus was so prodigall in expences, that all his Flatterers, Pickethankes, Players, Pypers, and loose Companions, who deriued exceeding benefit daily from him: bemoaned his death, & wept bitterly for him. Of him, Horace maketh mention, saying,

The prodigality and voluptuous life of Pericles, of Callias, the Sonne of Hippomachus, and of Nicias, brought them to extreame poverty, and when Money failed them: they all three, (each after other) receiued Hemlock for their drink at their last banquet, and so ended their daies. Of Callias, Athenus maketh mention, and Aristophanes, in his Comedie of Preachers, and Lyfius writeth, that his Father Hippomachus was the very richest man in all Greece. Demades the Oratour, had gathered such a masse of Riches, as himselfe confessed, that hee felt not the want of any thing: neuertheless, in the end (horow his intemperance and dissolution) he so wasted and consumed all his wealth, that he was banished from the City, because hee had bene seauen times accused, for not payment of such fines, wherein the men of Athens had condemned him. And Antipater the Poet of Sidon mocking him, said: He had nothing but his tongue and belly left him, for hee had wasted and offered up all to his owne sensuality, &c. Cresippus, Son to Chabrias, was so Prodigal, that after hee had lauishly consumed all his goods, he sold the very stones of his Fathers Tomb, in the building whereof, the Athenians disbursed a thousand Draclmaes. Cornelius Lentulus, surnamed Sura, a man of Noble race, but of very bad gouernment, spent ouer-vainely, and foolishly (beside his owne possessions) a great sum of Money belonging to the Common-wealth, when he was Quaestor.

G. Caesar * Caligula surpassed all Prodigals, in inuentions of profuse expence and dissolutions. He inuented a new kinde of Bath, and diuers sortes (neuer before seene) of Viands and Banquets: for hee would bathe himselfe in curious sweet waters, and cause Pearles of inestimable value to be dissolved with Vineger, and fet before them that hee feasted, hauing his Breads and Meates all gilded ouer. Moreover, he commanded light Gallies or Foists to be made (which were called Liburnian Foists) of Cedar wood, hauing all their poopes couered ouer with precious stones. Hee had large and goodly stoues or Hot-houses, with rare perfumed chambers in them, where he would sit and banquet in the night season: but in the day time, hee had variety of costly Arbors, Bowers, and Vines, abounding in the plenty of their fruits, wherein he would sit with his Consorts of Musitions, sweetly singing among them. And when hee pleased to take the open ayre, it was on the Sea-shore of Campania, which was reputed (though being in Italy) to be the most pleasant and fertile ground in the whole World. As for his buildings and Houses of pleasure, abroad in the spacious fields, in groues, Woods, and other delightful places: they exceeded all compasse of reason; for hee coueted nothing more, then to effect such things as appeared to be impossible. In briefe, in lesse space then a yeare, he consumed immense riches, with the twenty seauen thousand times * H. S. being an hundred thousand small Scutellariae, which Tiberius had left him, amounting to threecore and seauen Millions, and fifty thousand Crownes, allowing fortie fixe Sols to the crowne. But when Money began to fayle him, and he waxed needy: he then gaue his mind to leuying of ioules, and excessive tributes yea, hee exercised rapines by diuers meanes, beside calumnies and confiscations of his subiects goods.

The Emperour Nero, his Nephew, was not a iot inferiour to him in Prodigality, for hee obserued no order or measure in spending and giuing: accounting them to be wretches and avaritious villaines, that kept any written Register of their expences. But contrariwise, he esteemed them to be honorable and magnanimous, that could soonest runne thorough their whole estate in spending. He gaue to Tyrdates (as a daily allowance) eight hundred thousand Nummaes, valuing twenty thousand Crownes of our Coyne, a matter almost incredible. He made a present of two goodly Pallaces; the one to Meneceates, a Player on the Harpe; and the other to Spectulius, the Myrmillon Fencer or Sword-Player. He would neuer ride abroad, or on any Iourney, without a thousand Chariots, at the least. His Mules were shod with Silver,

Such a law would now doe well, to curbeth the Prodigals of this times.

Silver, and all his Mulets Saddles and furnitures, were of Cloth of * Canusum, a Towne in Apulia. Moreover, he neuer would weare any Garment twice.

Iosephus, in his History of the Jewes warres, maketh mention of the prodigality of the Emperour Vitelius; who helde the Empire no longer then eight months and five dayes. If his life had bene of any longer continuance (saith Iosephus) believe, thus the whole Empire could not have sufficed his excess and prodigality. This Vitelius was so dissolute and prodigall, that he would have foure feuerall meales each day allowed him, which he thus deuicd, into Breake-fast, Dinner, Supper, and Collation. At such time as he came to Rome, his Brother made him a Supper, whereas he was serued with two thousand daintie and rare Fishes, and feauen thousand as delicate Fowles and Birdes. Which pompe he exceeded in another Feast, of more excessiue and sumptuous cost, which he made at the dedication of the ground plot, that (for the admirable greatnes thereof) hee called the Shield of Mithras.

A Prodigall (saith Vipian, in the first law ff. de cura. furio) is he that hath no time or end of his spending: but scattereth and consumeth his goods beyond sense or reason, and is reuerend in Greeke ἀσώτος; because that hee loseth himselfe, and wasteth his patrimony. Our graue and worthy fore-fathers, did establish Lawes against spend-thriftes and prodigalles. Solon, the famous Grecian, ordaind, that they should be made infamous. The Arcopagites and criminall Iudges of Athenes, appeald prodigall persons in iudgment, and being proued and conuincd for such offenders, were punished accordingly.

The Ancients, called the ten men, prohibited by their lawes, that prodigals should haue the government of their owne goods, but all such authorities were taken from them: and a Guardian or Overseer was appointed the by the Iudge, as is to be seene in the law Iulianus. ff. de cura. furio. Therefore they could not sell or alienate (by any valuable meanes) their Lands or goods, neither make any transport of them: moreover, they were disabled by the Law, of making any wils or Testaments, as appeareth plainly in the Law. Is cui bonis. F. de verb. oblig.

Whereupon, they were compared by the Iuriconsultes, to madde men; scilicet. quod furiosum exitum parat prodigalitas.

And as for the paine and punishment due to wast-full spend-thrifts, the Grecians had a law, whereby it was especially ordaind, that whosoever consumed his patrimony laushfully, he might not be permitted Buriall in the Graue of his Father, but abroad, among such as were strangers and vnknowne. The Law of the twelve Tables, interdited all prodigall persons, from any administration of their owne goods; and in the end, all the Lenders (by commaund of the Iudges) might let them haue no more monies, on pawns or otherwise: but Surauayers or Comptroullers were set over them, according to the example and order for mad men or Lunaticks, and all manning of their owne affaires, was also prohibited them in this forme or manner.

Quando bonitas paterna anitque nequicia disperdit, libere que tuos ad egestatem perducis, sob eam rem tibi care commercioque interdic. In this very manner, Q. Pompeius, Pretor, perceiving that Q. Fabius, (Sonne to Q. Fabius the Great, surnamed Allobrogicus, because he conquered the * Allobroges, and Bituricus, Captaine and Duke, or King (as some write) of the * Auerni) was extraordinarily dissolute and prodigall in his expences: depriued him of his Fathers Lands and goods. For euery one pittied, and much lamented, to see so much Gold and Silver wasted in lewdnesse and luxurie; which rather should haue supported the splendour and Nobilitie, of so glorious a race and Family, as were the Fabij.

Dion writeth, that the Emperour Dionysius did set a Tutor, ouer a certaine Senator, who was void of all good gouernement: to order him, as if he had bene his pupil. Iouianus Pontanus, in his Booke of Bounty or Liberality, maketh a question, to wit: which of the two, either the prodigall person, or the auaritious, is worst and most pernicious? Whereunto, himselfe maketh answer thus. This doubt (saith he) is very easily decided. For first of all, the prodigall person is beneficiall and profitable to many, on whom he bestoweth his goodnes bountifully: whereas the couetous Miser is not commodious to him selfe, but maketh

He will not cate halfe so much, as is needfull for the meere maintenance of his owne life: which makes him looke with a wanne, pale, and meager complexion. In the second place, the Prodigall giueth liberally, and gushes passe from him with a free, generous, and good heart: especially, when he exceedeth not the bounds of reason, and his gifts are giuen to some honest and commendable purpose. But the couetous mans gifts are quite contrary, with a gripe and pinching heart, and a villaines disposition. Moreover, as the greedy wretch encreaseth his store day by day; even so doth the Prodigall change his naturall inclination and manner of life, as well by course of time, as age drawing on him: which at length teacheth him know, that he must needs become poore, and fall into want. Whereby many times it comes to passe, that his manners grow to better reformation then before, and yeares diminishing his laushnesse, by little and little he recouereth health and strength againe. Whereas (on the contrary) Auarice is an euilllasting and incurable disease. By which reasons it appeareth, that couetous and auaritious Misers, are of a more vile, base, and abiect condition; then those that be prodigall.*

CHAP. XXI.

The Magnificent Triumpe of Antigonus Epiphanes, made in despite of the Confull Paulus Emilius his Triumpe, for his victory obtained against the Macedonians.

Polipus in the 14. Booke of his Histories, calleth him Primus, that is to say, made, or victorious.

Antigonus, King of Syria, surnamed Epiphanes, that is to say, Famous or illustrious, hauing heard recitall deliuered of the magnificent Triumpe, made by the Confull Paulus Emilius, for the victory which he won against the Macedonians, when Perseus their King was taken Prisoner: he conceiued such enuy and disdain thereat, that in meere vanity and arrogancy hee resolued to make another Triumpe, that should farre excell and goe beyond the Confuls. Vpon this occasion, hee made it publicke knowne throughout his Kingdome, that on such a day, as he purposely appointed, he would be in person at Daphnia, a City of Asia, where wonderfull sports and delights were to be performed. Which caused, that not only the people of Greece, but infinite numbers also (from other Regions) repayed thither; and the order of the royall intended spectacle began in this manner.

First of all, as the formost leaders to the famous troupes following, marched five thousand young men, supposed to be the very Gallantest Spirits in all Greece, they being armed according to the Romaine manner. After them followed as many of Mysia, armed as the Custome of their owne Countrey required: being pursued by three thousand Thracians, and five thousand Gala-tians, and they were seconded with many other, who, because they carried certaine Bucklers or Targets of Silver, were fir-named * Argyraphides. Next to these, marched twenty five ranks of Gladiatores, Sworders, or Fencers, and subsequently a thousand knights, whose Horses were all barbed and caparazoned with Gold and Silver, and each of them a Garland of Gold on his head. After them followed another thousand Knights, who were tearmed Fellowes, or Companions; and with them another company, that were called Friends to the King: who likewise had a thousand Noblemen following them, and a thousand other braue Knights, called the Kings Band. In the next place, marched fiftene hundred Knights, armed all with Armour, ouer which Armour, each man did weare a military Rob or Mantle, embroydered all with Gold & Silver, and enriched with many costly Figures of Beastes. Then followed an hundred Chariots, each one drawne by sixe Horses, and forty other Chariots, each drawne by foure Horses.

One wonderfull sumptuous Chariot, drawn by ten Elephants, followed next, being pursued by sixe and thirty other Elephants; beside eight hundred gallant Youths, wearing Garlands or Crowns of Golde on their heads, embellished with many precious stones, and then followed a thousand fat Oxen, and 800.

CHAP. XXII.

That Gold and Siluer were not in any frequent vse, among our reuerent Ancestours: And as what time they began to be employed more largely. Also, what deuises were found out by Timotheus the Athenian, and Condalus, Captaine to Mausolus, for the gaining of Money.

HE vse of those Mettals, called Golde and Siluer, which were found in Thrace, neere to the Riuer * Pangaeus; was very rare and strange among our fore-fathers. For the Lacedemonians, being desirous to guild the Image or Statue of Apollo Amycleus: made diligent search thorow all Greece, and yet could not finde any Gold: And therefore they were constrained, to send and buy some of Croesus, King of Lydia. Hiero, the Tyrant of Syracusa, hauing likewise vowed to dedicate a Table of Gold, to Apollo Delphicus, caused search to be made throughout Greece and Italie, without finding any: nor euer had done, but of * Architelus the Corinthian, who (by little and little) in a long space had got it together. The people of * phocis, hauing afterward sacked the Temple of De phos, and Alexander carrying thence the prey or booty into Asia: the vse of Gold began so fast to encrease, that diuers Vesselles were made thereof, euen from such as they washed their handes in, to them that they vsed in the Kitchen. The first stamp that euer was beaten vpon Gold Coine, was at Rome, in the Temple of Seipus the Africaine.

The Athenians making long warres against the people of * Olynthus; Money beganne to faile very greatly in the Armie; which the Souldiours perceiving, and with what difficultie it was to be expected from Athens: they entered into a mutinie or tumult, for appeasing whereof, Timotheus, there Captaine, bethought himselfe of a new and sudden deuised meanes. Hauing first covenanted and agreed with such Merchants, chants, as were (in this case) to fit and furnish him, vpon this faithfull promise, of exchange and repaiment when time better serued: he caused Money of Copper to be made, wherewith he paid his Souldiours. And within no long while after, when Money of Siluer was sent from Athens; he not onely satisfieth the Marchants & Victualers liberally: but also receiued in all the Copper Coyne againe, and gaue due restitution for it in Siluer.

Aristotle writeth in his Polliciques, that Condalus, Captaine to Mausolus, King of Caria, being in Lycia (a Prouince of the Lesser Asia, situate betwene Pamphylia and Caria) with an Armie, and want of Money growing great among them: hee inuented a meanes, though some what ridiculous, yet well answering to his owne expectation. He knew very perfectly, that the people of Lycia tooke delight (about all things else) to wear their lockes of Haire very long: Whereupon, he called diuers of the chiefeest persons of that Prouince to him, and saide vnto them, after this manner. That much against his mind, and to his no little greefe, he was constrained to acquaint them with a Commission, which hee had (that instant) receiued from his King, and which hee likewise knew, could not chuse but be greatly offensive to them. For King Mausolus (quoth hee) commaundeth, that all the Lycians must be presently shauen, and all their goodlie long Lockes be powled from their Heades, to be sent vnto him into Caria: because hee will haue a new and strange kinde of Apparell made of them, in honour of the King of Persia.

Condalus continuing on his speech, pretending much compassion towards them in this case; further added. That if they would follow his counsell, he would finde out a meanes, whereby, not onely their faire Haire should be saved; but the Kinges intent should also be answered, without cutting them off in any such manner. Whereunto the Lycians answered, that they would gladly follow his direction in all things; provided, that their Lockes of Haire might be kept from defacing. Condalus then aduised them, to prepare Money among them (appointing a round and indifferent summe, which they might gather by the poule, eyther more or lesse, according as their Lockes were in fashion) and then to send that Money into Greece, where plenty of such haire he would easily help them to, and afterward send it to King Mausolus, and cause it to be receiued, as if it were their owne. The Lycians, with all possible hast that might be vsed, leuyed such a Masse of Money together; as (without any great difficultie) would haue bought them goodly Perriwigs; yea, if they had beene all of Gold. Which summe of Money they deliuered to Condalus, who, feigning as if he sent it into Greece; discharged all his Souldiours wants there-with; and yet no way displeased the people.

Folly accomteth nothing deare, so it selfe be satisfied.

CHAP. XXIII.

What a commendable thing it is, euermore to speake the truth: And what a detestable vice lying is, with many examples concerning each Argument.

Phemides the Philosopher was asked by the Rhodians, what thing that Vertue was, which Men call Truth: whereunto hee answered, Truth is that thing, wherof (more then al other) the Gods doe make profession; and the vertue thereof beateh the Heauens; illuminateth the Earth; maintaineth Justice; governeth the Common-wealth; and cannot endure any wicked thing neere it, but maketh all doubtfull matters to bee cleare and apparant.

The Corinthians also demanded of Chilo the Philosopher, what this Truth was? And he replied. It is an assured Gage, which neuer diminisheth it selfe: A Buckler or Shielde, that neuer can be pierced thorough: A time, whiche neuer is troubled in it selfe: An Armie, neuer daunted or dismayed: A Flower, that neuer fadeth.

The Emperour Anguſtus, in the Triumphe which he made of *Marke Antho-

Rome a Prielt of Egypt, aged three-ſcore yeares, who in all the daies of his life, had neuer told any lye . In regard whereof, the Senate preſently ordained, that he ſhould be made free, and created Great Prielt : Alſo, that a Statue ſhould be erected for him, and placed among thoſe of the moſt renowned me of all the Ancients . Spartianus relateth an example much diſſembleable from this laſt, and faith . In the time of the Emperor Claudius, there died a Man in Rome, named Pamphilus, who (as it was moſt evidently juſtified) never told any matter of truth in all his life time ; but evermore had his chiefe delight in lying, which cauſed the Emperour to giue command, that no Graue ſhould be granted to his body : but his goods were confiscated, his Houſe ruined, and his Wiſe and Children baniſhed out of Rome, to the end, that no memorie might remain in the Commonwealth, of ſuch a venomous Beaſt . At the time when theſe two notable effects hapned, the Romaines were Mortall enemies to the Egyptians, whereby may worthilie be obſerved, how wonderful the power of truth is : in regard that the Romaines would advance a Statue, in the honour of their enemy, onely becauſe he was a Man of truth, and deſprie their Citizen ſon of a Sepulcher, becauſe he was ſuch a notorious Lyeer . It is no way to be doubted, but that a true man may freely walke, and practiſe in all places, without feare of being accuſed by any perſon . He may alſo (in ſafety & dreadleſſe) reprehend any Lyeer, and ſpeake boldly in face of all the world, going alwaies with an erected and dauntleſſe countenance . But the Lyeer is fled of all Men, like to a noyſome peſtilence, and ſo long as hee liueth ; yea, after death likewiſe, he is infamous to all Poſterity .

His reward and wages, is, that if hee change to ſpeake truth, no man will beleeue him : For, by being ſo knowne a Lyeer, truth (in his mouth) ſtandeth alwaies ſuſpected .

future knowledge) by them, are left as Legacies to vmoſt poſteritie . They ſhew and reſentent vnto the eye, matters once done, euen as if they were in continual action, and as full of life in the inſtant, as in the precedent : which neuer could haue beene done, if Letters hadde never beene deuiled . For neither Plato, Aristotle, nor a great number of other wiſe Philoſophers, had carried ſuch reputation with vs, as now they doe ; but onely by their ſacred meanes . For con-cluſion then, we may very well ſay ; that the onely beſt and greateſt thing (among all humane inventions) was that of Letters . Whoſeuer is doubtfull, or ma-keth any queſtion in this caſe, let him but reade and conſider what is left written to vs, whereby he ſhall perceiue : that all thoſe famous memories and antiquities, had beene vterly loſt, and no record remained of them, but onely by Letters .

Seeing then, that they are the cauſe offo great a happineſſe, & reaſon (in meere Juſtice) requirerh, that we ſhould know, to whom wee are beholding, for them .
And yet I finde it to bee a matter of no meane difficultie, becauſe opinions are ſo varions and doubtfull in this caſe . The Gentiles doe much diſagreed heerein with our Chriſtians, and Chriſtians alſo haue not well conſidered together . Pliny ſetteth downe many opinions, and then addeth his owne (which (in my iudgement) cometh much neerer to truth, then the other . Firſt of all he ſaith, that Letters were found out by the Aſſyrians in Aſſyria ; but others doe affirme, that Mercury founde them firſt in Egypt . Some (be-ſide) are of the minde, that the Pelagians brought them into Italy ; or eſſe that they were carried into Greece by the Phanians, with Cadmus, who was their Captaine, who had no more of them then, but ſixteen in number : but in the warre of Troy, Palamedes added foure more vnto them . After Plinius report of all theſe, and ſome opinions beſide, he concludeth according to his owne iudgement : That Letters were eternall, which is as much to ſay, that they had beene from the beginning of the world .

Now, concerning the bringing of Letters into Greece by the Phanians, Herodotus and diuers others doe affirme it . The Egyptians alſo doe make their vaunt, that the invention of Artes and Letters came firſt from them . Diode-rus Siculus is of the minde, that Mercury founde them out in Egypt . Howbeit, the ſame Diodeorus ſaith in his 4. Booke, that ſome are of opinion, that the Ethiopians had Letters firſt of all ; and that the Egyptians receiued their firſt vie of Letters from them . Vpon this Argument, there are diuers other ; as well Iewes as Chriſtians, who doe plainly auouch, that Moyſes was the firſt finder out off Letters in the world : for he was much more ancient, then any letters or writings among the Gentiles, becauſe the ſame Cadmus (of whom we haue formerly ſpoken, and that he ſhould bring Letters into Greece) liued in the time of Othemiell, Duke and Capitaine of Iſrael, and raigned forty ſeaſen yeares, after that the written lawes were giuen to Moyſes, as is evidently prooued .

They that are of this opinion (among whom were Eupolemus and Arabanus, Ethiopian Hiſtorians) doe maintaine, that the Egyptians learned Letters of Moyſes, and that they gaue them firſt to the people of Phenia, from whence (afterward) Cadmus tranſported them into Greece .
The fore-named Arabanus iuſtifieth that the man, named Mercurius or Mercury (whom alſo doe affirme to haue taught Letters in Egypt) was Moyſes, who called Mercurius by the Egyptians . Philoſophers doe much diſagreed heerein, mak-eth Letters to be more ancient for the faith, that they were found out by Abraham . But the truth is, that they were invented by Adam, or (at leaſt) by his Sonne, or Sonnes Sonnes, in the firſt age of the world, and before the Flood .
Then were they conſecrated to Noah and his Succeſſors, euen to the coming of Abraham, and ſo afterward to Moyſes .
And this is the iudgement and opinion of S. Auguſtine . Moreouer, this is yet further verified, by the authoritie of Joſephus .

from Adam and his

Noah.

We finde also, that Saint Iude the Apostle, alleadged in one of his Epistles, the Booke of Enoch, which was before the Flood. So then, it is not to be doubted, but that Adam and his Sonnes (who were all so wise, and had intelligence in so many things) were the only first Inuenter of Letters. And that Noah also, who was both lettered and learned, preferred them with him in the Arke. Howbeit, that afterward, in the confusion of Tongues, which happened at the building of the Tower of Babel: it might come to passe, that the greater part of the World lost the knowledge of those Letters, which remained onely in the Family of Heber, of whom (afterward) the Hebrues descended, who, as we haue already said, lost not their first Language. Saint Augustine auoucheth as much, in his booke before alleadged; the like doth Eusebius also, in his first Booke of the Euangelicall preparation, and the greater part of the learned men of our times.

Wherefore Philo, and such beside him, as supposed, that Moses was the Inuenter of Letters, were greatly de-ceined in their owne imaginings: because it is a matter most notorious, that the Bookes and Histories written by Moses, were not the first before all other; nor before the Philosophy and Wisdom of the Greekes, as Saint Augustine proueth sufficiently in the saide Booke; and Josephus also, against Apion the famous Grammariar of Egypt; and likewise Eusebius and Iustine Martire. He and they should haue concluded then, that Letters were before the time of Moses; because we finde it written, that Moses learned in Egypt, all the Arts and Sciences of the Egyptians; which he could not haue done, except there had bene Letters before.
And yet we know moreover, that there were Hieroglyphicall Figures, whereby (as we formerly proued in the first Booke) they had vnderstanding of one another's mind.

We will therefore set downe our resolue, that Letters were from the dayes of Adam, and afterward, that Abraham had knowledge of them in Syria;
and thence it ensued, that Plinie varied in so many opinions before related.
It shall be needlesse therefore, to make any further curious search; as touching the Original and causes of Characters and Letters: because they may be made according to any mans mind or will; euen as now-a-days wee see, that Ci-phers, Figures, or what else, are formed; after the fancy of the Writer or Deuiler, and sometimes signes or shapes in stead of Letters.

So saith Saint Hierome, in his Prologue before the Booke of the Lawes, and that when *Esdra*s, the great Scribe and Doctour of the Law, re-wrote and restored them againe: hee found new Characters or formes of Letters, whereof the Jewes did make vse to the time of Saint Hierome, euen as yet they doe to these dayes of ours. And those Hebrue Letters or Characters, haue a secret propriety; not incident to the Letters of any other Nation: for the voyce, sound, or name of each one of them, yieldeth a signification of some thing else beside.

The first Letter, which is termed Aleph, doth signify Discipline. The second, named Beth, signifyeth a House.
Gymell, which is another Letter, relateth replenishing or abundance. And Dalath, Tables or Bookes. All the rest of the Letters, doe interpret some one thing or other, which I forbear to

CHAP. XXV.

How our Ancients wrote, and whereon, before the inuention of Paper, and with what Instrument. How Paper and Parchment were first found out, and by whom.

E haue spoken briefly in the precedent Chapter, concerning the inuention of Letters: it now remaineth, that we should say somewhat, of the matter whereon our fore-fathers vsed to write. Now, albeit wee cannot exactly set downe, what it was that our first Fathers (in the first Age, and before the Flood) did write vpon, as being a case very doubt-full; to wit, whether then they had the vse of Letters, although we haue made proofe thereof by the authority of Iosephus, assisted by some other reasons beside; yet it evidently appears (according to the general iudgement of Vvriters) that such as wrote in those elder times, had not, neither knew what Paper was;
but onely did write on Leauces of the Palme or Date Tree, from whence followed the common word (yet vsed) the Leauces or Leafes of Bookes. Afterward they wrote vpon other Leauces of Trees, but principally such as came easiest from each Tree: as the Birch, the Platane, the Ash, and the Elme. From these Trees they tooke the inner-most Rinde, which groweth betwene the Wood and the thicke blacke Barke, and these soft skinned being subtille smoothed and plained: of them they formed the Leauces of their Bookes, ioyning them artificially one within another, that they might the more firmly hold together. And because (in those reuer-end daies) the Latines termed those inner-most Rindes of Trees, by the Name of Libri: it thence ensued, that they gaue the Title of Liber to one of their Bookes, though afterward they refused all further vse of those meanes.

Within some while after, they found out another helpe for Writing, which was vpon Plates of Lead, ingeniously made thin and pliant: whereof, some Men (that were more curious and (speculatiue) made likewise Collonibes or Pillars, as well as Bookes, whereon they registred all publique actions:

Those Ancient Fathers, found out yet another manner of Writing, which was on Linnen Cloath, smoothed and polished with a certain kind of colour.
But heere we are to obserue, that they vsed not then to write with Penne's, but with a little Cane or Reede; which yet is called by vs (as then) in Latine Ca-lamus, and wherewith some doe still vse to write.

Afterward, another kinde of Paper was deuised to write vpon. which they made of diuers little Shrubs of Trees, cald by them Papiri: by reason of another addition thereto, to wit; of a certaine kind of Rushes, growing ordinarily in the Moores and Marishes of A-lyps, and the name of this Rush in Latine, is called Papyrus. Plinie saith, that there is yet growing in Syria, neere to the Ri-uer Euphrates, certaine Papers or Rushes, that haue sundry little Leauces, Rindes, or Skinned, growing naturally betwene the Pith and Barke: which being cunningly drawne out with the point of a needle, and intermedd with a kinde of Glue, made of Meale (verie finely seared or boulded) and tempered with boyling Water and Vineger; Paper is made thereof, apt and very good to write vpon. But that skinned which is neerest to the Pith, maketh the best and smoothest Paper: whereby we may gather, that according to the sorts and differences; so are the Papers diuersly named. And in regard that this Reede, Rush, or little Shrub, was named Papyrus; the Name of Paper hath so continued, and was likewise impoted on those kinde of Paper, which were (since then) made of Shreds, rags, and smallest peeces of Linnen Cloath, past all kind of seruice, and fit for no other vse.

Marcellus Varro saith, that the first In-uention of making Leauces of Paper, either of Shrubs, Rushes, or otherwise:
was found out in the time of Alexander the Great, and at such time also, as the Cittie of Alexandria was first founded.

much more auncient, by those Bookes which Cicero Terentius found, by digging in one of his Inheritances, which Bookes had formerly belonged to Numa Pompilius, King of Rome, and had bene hidden in a Temple, where himselfe was buried, and the leaues of those Bookes were made of the said Ruffes or shrubbes. It is held for a certainty, that Numa lived long time before Alexander. And yet Titus Livius reporteth otherwise of this Tombe; affirming, that two such Tombs were found by L. Patilius, Laetantius and Plutarch doe herein agree with Titus Livius: and yet notwithstanding, the intention of Pliny is most approved.

Now concerning the word Carta, or Charta, some doe holde, that this name came of a City, situated neere to Tyre, which was called Charta, or Cartha; whence Dido (altring the name) called it afterward Carthage. I read also, that those reuerend men of former times, did write on waxed Table-leaues, made thin smooth and slippery: they likewise formed their letters, with sharpe pointed Bodkins or Pinctions, which they teamed Table-Pinnes, but others called the Stiles, whereof, he that (by experneffe) wrote most perfect, was said to haue a good stile in writing, deriuing the worde from the instrument, and not by the integritie in Art or method.

Moreover, it is to be noated, that before such Paper (as we vse to write on) was inuented: an auncient custome was obserued, (without seeing any other help or meanes) to write onely vpon Parchment, which they made of Sheeps Skins, whereof Herodotus maketh relation. The inuention thereof is attributed (by Marcius Varro) to the people that inhabited the Country of Pergamus, or Pergama, who had (at that time) Eumenius to be their King; where-vpon (in Latine) it bare the name of Pergamentum, which we do commonly call Parchment. And whereas in Latine also, it was called Membrana: yet it appeareth to take name of the Inuenter. Notwithstanding, in my iudgment, such skinnes were written on long before the time assigned by Varro; mentioned (after him) in like manner by Pliny: because Iosephus writeth, that the Bookes of the Hebreues (which were long before the dayes of Eumenius) and many other Bookes beside, were written on such Skinnes.

In like manner, when he declareth, that Eleazer, Prince of the Priests, sent the Bookes of the sacred Scriptures to Prolemaus Philadelphus, with the seauenty two Interpreters, that they might be translated out of the Hebrew tongue into Greeke, he saith; King Prolemaus was amazed, and wondred very much, at the ingenious coniunction of those Skinnes of Parchment. Whereby may be obserued, that the lines written on Parchment, were much more easily performed, and of longer continuance, then on any other Skinnes or Leaues whatsoever, although they were of greater antiquity. In regard whereof, vse of Parchment neuer failed, neither euer will, especially for serious seruices: albeit, the Paper which is now in vse among vs, perhaps is easier and cheaper to be had, and may better fit the passage of infinite Letters, which ordinarily are entered vpon all occasions, and necessitie of haste.

Hauiug thus farre proceeded in discourse, concerning the first inuention of Letters, Paper, Parchment and writing: I me thinkes, I should very much forget my selfe, if the famous Art of Printing should passe vnspoken of, whereby so many Bookes are Imprinted, with no meane expedition, and which I doe ingeniously confesse, to be the best inuention in the world. By one Authour, the deuiler therof is said to be an Allemaigne or Germaine, of the City of Mentz, named Iohn Faustus, (although Po'odore Virgil doe call him Peter) yet others teame him Iohn Cuthemberg, confessing him also to be a Germaine, and a Knight, and that the first impression of any Booke, was in the year of our Lord, 1453.

About which time also, or soone after (as Volateranus affirmeth) this worthy Science was brought into Italy by two Brethren, named Conrades, printing first in Rome, and in the house of the Maximes: where, the first Booke that euer was printed, was S. Angustine de Cinitate Dei, & next, the diuine Institutions of Laetantius Firmianus. Exemplaries of them were not long since (and I thinke yet are) in the Library of the most reuerend Bishop of Sarno, the Lord Imoconio Comes, a Spaniard, a man of singular learning, being Auditor of Roma, Regent of the Penitentiarie, and Referendarie of both the Signatures. After that, Nicholas Gersone, being a Frenchman, honoured Venice therewith, in the time of Duke Augustine Barbarigo. And, as an inuention of such merit could not be concealed, so succeeded it to many Countries, and by diuers worthy men, who beside their Art of Printing; were learned and iudicious Correcters of errors and falsifications, easily ouer-slipped by vnskillful worke-men. Among these men of noat, are especially commended, Aldus Manutius at Venice, who made a fresh restoring of the Latine tongue: Francus Priscianus, at Rome: Baldus Colinetus, Erobenius and Oporinus, at Basle: Sebastian Gryphus at Lyons: Robert Stephanus at Paris and Antwerpe; and William Caxton at London in England, besides many more, whose names I omit, for breuitie.

By these famous helpees, and furtherers of Learning, a number of Bookes: hidden, obscured and vtterly lost (as it were) receiued fresh life and light again; to the no meane enfructiue and benefit of many men, whose learning hath made it selfe manifest (only by the meanes of Printing) throughout all Christendome, yea, and else-where: whereas, before so sacred an assistant was inuented, much greater paine and labour was employed; whereof the fruit could neuer be so general, or any such perfection appeare in Learning. And, if we doe graunt, that this deuise was not the chiefe and principall cause: yet assuredly (I am of the mind) it was the very greatest and most absolute; because, with much lesse paine and labour, Bookes (full of imperfections) haue bene found to be corrected, and purged from those maculations, blots, and blemishes, which ordinarie doe attend on writing. Again, if written corrected Copies had past from some one or two: yet they were so rare to come by, and not to be perused by many earnest and desirous minde; that it hindered much forward endeavour, which this vniuersality hath liberally friended. But, to speake truly, since immeasurable Licence tooke hold of Imprinting Bookes, especially of Fables and fruitlesse labours; it hath bene iudged by some (yet none of meanest wisdome) that Printing might well haue bene spared from so general knowledge, or neuer bene used at all; rather then such idle toys should passe the Presse, to the perurication and imppoysoning of diuers good minds, especially the younger sort, who rather affect such vaine deuises, then studies much more commendable, and fitting for them.

But leaving further speech of Printing; Hand-writing must not bee condemned, hauiug (in these dayes) attained to more intire perfection, then euer was knowne in former times. Whereof Quintilian hath giuen good rules, well deserving oblation; likewise the learned Erasmus, in his Booke of good and true pronounciation. And herein Erasmus must be my directour, because he saith: Blinde men haue bene instructed in good writing. For they had Tables made of Porphirie, Bone, or of some Mettall, wherein were insculpted the letters of A. B. C. D. E. &c. Then the blinde partie tooke some sharpe pointed Instrument in his hand (made apt and able to vse impression; with ease and facilitie) and his hand being guided by the instructers: vse and practise framed a shape of each Letter in the blinde mans minde, according to the remembrance of true forme and fashion, whereof customarie acquaintance (by heed and attention) gaue an Image, and of euery Letter really in his memory, which afterward he could (with ease) forme vpon the Table, or any thing else of respect, whereto his minde stood most affected. VVherin might appeare some defect or impediment, but yet it would be well made, and indifferently leageable. After which often experimented proof, he may write vpon Paper, in true order and Method: or any else, that (blind-folded) shall make vse therof, concerning any matter that best fitteth his fantasie.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the first Libraries in the world: As also, what Pictures and Portraitsures of memorable men, were obsequiously preferred in them.

T is not to be doubted, but that the first Bookes and Libraries that euer were in the world, must needs bee among the Hebrue people.

For, as it is certaine, that Letters were by them first knowne, and vse made of them: so is it likewise to be presumed, that they were not neglect or carelesse in keeping them, or whatsoever they committed to writing. This is iustified by the authority of Iosephus, before alleadged, as also, by that which we read in the holy Scriptures. Isidorus relateth, that after the Chadaans had burned the Library of the Hebrewes, with all the Bookes of the Lawes: the Hebrewes being gon backe againe to Ierusalem, the Prophet Ezdras (being thereto lightened by the blessed Spirit) repaired that losse, by writing those Bookes ouer againe, reducing them into the number of two and twenty Bookes, according to the number of the Alphabet letters. Whereby may be gathered, that after Moyse had written: the Hebrewes had a Library, wherein they preferred the Bookes of the Law, as well those which we haue of the old Testament, as the rest, whereof we haue already made mention. Among which, was the Booke of Enoch, alleadged by Saint Iude the Apostle in his Epistle, spoken of also before: And the Booke of the warres of the Lord, whereof memory is made in the twenty one Chapter of Numbers: And the Booke of the iust seruants of the Lord, alleadged in the first Booke of the Kings: and the Booke of Samuell, recorded in the last Chapter of the first Booke of Paralipomenon: And the Booke of Nathan the Prophet, with many other beside, which appeared to haue bin burned and lost. Therefore we may plainly perceiue, that the Iewes had Libraries, and that those which appertained to the Gentiles, were both after the other, and of later time.

All the Grecians doe declare, that hee who first made any publique Library, was named Pisistratus, a Tyrant ouer the Athenians: but afterward, it was greatly increased by those people. In following time, when Xerxes came to Athen, he carried thence all those Bookes, and transported them into Persia: but a long while after, the King Selucus (called Nicator) bought them, and caused them to be carried backe to Athen againe. This affirmation proceedeth from Aulus Gellius and Isidorus; adding moreover, that this Library was afterward very largely increased. Notwithstanding, that Library of Alexandria in Egypt, which the King Ptolomy Philadelphus made; was (in very truth) the most excellent of all other in the world beside: because therein was the old Testament, and all the sacred writings of the fauentie two Interpreters, and a great multitude of all other bookes whatsoever. Yet Pliny auoucheth, that King Eumenes made another Library in the City of Pergama, in enuy of that which Ptolomy had founded. Aulus Gellius and Amianus Marcellinus doe say, that in the Library of Alexandria in Egypt, there were seauen hundred thousand Bookes. Seneca doth (in a manner) agree concerning the number, which although it seeme to be excessiue, yet notwithstanding, whosoever hath read of the expenses and great cost, which the Kings of Egypt haue wasted, in the making of Obeliskes, Pyramides, Temples, Houses, Shippes, and other thinges of inestimable charge (some part of which matters are spoken of by Budens, in his Annotations on the Pandectes, and Lazarus de Bass, in his Art of Navigation) this Library will not appeare impossible to their iudgement.

Bookes were brought to this Library from all the Nations of the whole world, and also in all Languages: and they that had the charge thereof, were all of them very learned men. One part was appointed for Bookes of Poetry, others also for Histories, and elsewhere for all the Sciences and faculties: but all this learning learning thus brought together, was burned by the Soldiers of Iulius Caesar, when he pursued Pompey thither, and fought against the people of Ptolomy, who was brought vnto Cleopatra. As for that other Librarie, which was made by Eumenes in Pergama: Plutarch saith in the life of Marcus Antonie, that it consisted of two hundred thousand Bookes.

The Librarie which we read of in Greece, Strabo saith, that Aristotle was the first that made a Collection of Bookes together, and framed a Library of Bookes in the City of Athen. But therein he contradicth the other Historians, who doe all maintaine, that it was Pisistratus, who liued long time before Aristotle. Therefore it is to be understood, that Strabos meaning ayimed at some one particular Man, who was neither King or Prince, as Pisistratus was: howbeit, it may be pregnantly coniectured, that Aristotle was therein much succoured and assisted by Alexander.

Later Libraries and Letters, where in the Citie of Rome, and the first that erected a publique Librarie there, was Asinius Pollio, of whom Pliny saith: That of the Spirits of Men he made a publique matter. The first man that brought thither any great quantitie of Bookes, was Paulus Emilius, when he had vanquished Perseus: And next to him, L. Lucullus, from the bootie of Pontus. Iulius Caesar also augmented and enriched the Libraries, which he committed to the charge and keeping of Marcus Varro: but all the Libraries in Rome, were afterward burnt and brought to nothing, by the frequent Warres, and often spoiles made of the Citie. And yet this great losse was repaired againe, by the Emperour Domitian, for he caused search to be made thorough all Countries, for Bookes of any Nature whatsoever; yea, he sent into Egypt, to haue the Librarie that remained there, to be transported to Rome. Whereby it verie plainly appeareth, that all King Ptolomies Bookes were not destroyed (as formerly hath bene said) because a great part of them were afterward recovered. And Paulus Orosius doth heere perswade me, when he saith; Four hundred thousand of the Bookes were burned: And by the confirmation of other Historians; we finde, that there were seauen hundred thousand in all, and three hundred thousand doe then appeare to be saved; howbeit, some would faine enforce, that they were all burned.

But returning to the Librarie of Rome againe, the same Paulus Orosius saith, that in the time of the Emperour Commodus, it was once more burned: neuertheless, Gordianus the Emperour regained a great number of Bookes, to the estimate of seauentie and two thousand Volumes. And that (which is much more notable) hee enioyed them by the last Will and Testament of Seranus Samonius, to whom they first appertained, according as Iulius Capitolinus recordeth. There were many other great and goodlie Libraries among those of elder times, as well private and meane persons, as Princes and great Lords. But the first Librarie among the Christians, was that (as Isidorus testifieth) of Pamphilus the Martire, whose life is registred by Eusebius, and that he had thirty thousand volums in his Librarie.

We read of a common Custome obserued among those graue Men, chiefly in their Libraries: where they preferred the Pictures, Portraits, and Statues, of such men as had been most excellent in Learning. Pliny also saith, that Marcus Varro (euen in his life time) so merited by his learning: that his Statue was kept in the Library of Asinius Pollio. Cicero wrote to Fabianus the Gaule, that he should buy him some Statues and Portraits, wherewith to grace and beautifie his Librarie. The younger Pliny, writing to Iulius Securus, saith; that Euergetius Senecrus (a very excellent learned man) placed in his Librarie (among other Pictures) those of Cornelius and Titus Arrius; sufficient testimony haue we of all those thinges.

Now, concerning these recited Libraries, and those of many other learned men, and of Princes also, in imitation of their example: they were all destroyed and ransaged by the Gothes, Alaines, and Pandales, vntill such time as Romus Librarie burned againe in the time of the Emperour Commodus.

Beside, such as haue beene found, were so vncorrected, corrupted and badlie written: that had it not bene for the indulgent traualle, of diuers great and worthy personages, they could hardly haue beene reduced to any order and perfection.

CHAP. XXVII.

The Interpretation of the Imperiall Titles, heretofore giuen by the Romaine Emperours, as they haue beene found registered in the Bookes De Iurispudentia, abbreviated and re-collected by commandement of the Emperour Iustinian, to wit: Of the Gothes, Allemaignes, Germaines, Alanes, Vandals, Affricanes, Gætes, Girpides, &c. and of many other Nations, appertaining to the same kinde of Argument.

Vaine Titles affected by the Romaine Emperours.

THE Romaine Emperours, in their Imperiall Titles of honour and renowne, did not onely obferue and giue vnto themselves, the Names or Appellations of those Provinces wonne by them, and reduced vnder the yoke of their Empire: but likewise of such Nations and people, as left their own Countries (in abounding multitudes) and entred on the Landes and possession of others, thence to chafe and expell the naturall Inhabitants, to plant there their owne abiding, by giuing them sundry battalles, and some way surmounting, though not wholly exterminating them. Upon which reason, Iustinian would entitle himselfe, of the Gothes, Allemaignes, Vandales, and of others. Of which Nations; I purpose to speake in some measure, what people they were, and whence they came: because (at length) they ruined the great Romaine Empire. Whereto I am the rather induced, to enstrut such as are little skilled in Histories (not onely Cosmographically, but likewise Geographically) how those people did not onely weaken and ruinate the saide Empire: but also did cast out the true and naturall Dwellers, of the verie greatest part of our Hemisphere.

Moreouer, they compelled the Emperours to graunt them places, wherein to liue (afterward) in peace and quietnesse: for these Nations were the cause, whereby many Countries changed both their manners, Language, and Religion, which matters are necessarie to be spoken off, as nerely appertaining to our argument.

We will begin then first with the Gothes, because they were the first, that forsooke their owne Native Country: which was called Gothia, or Gothland, as signifying a good Land, it being a Northerne Province of Germanie. This Land abounded in Graine, Fruites, Cattle, Woodes, Riueres, Mettalles: but especiallie in Copper, and Skinnes seruing to make Furses. At all times, and as yet (to this instant daie) is to bee discerned, the Kingdome of Sweisia, or Swenia, hath bene comprized vnder the Dominion of the Gothes. As the Country was fertile in Fruites of the Earth; euen so were the Weomen thereof likewise in Children: for, as they were strong, and of great stature, so had they vially two Children at a birth, which was the cause then, and so it yet continueth, that they had more people, then could well liue together, the Country not being sufficient to yeilde sustenance for so many. In like manner, they were very great feeders, eating much more then they that liue in the Easterne or Meridional parts.

These people of the Gothes, perceiving, and aduisedly pondering on the fore-specified reasons: leuied the more part of the youngest and strongest men of their Country, to the number of three three hundred thousand; and marryed such as were not, to ridde themselves of the charge of Daughters; as well as of Sonnes, for the Country ordinarily abounded in the Feminine, more then in the Masculine Sexe. So, being well provided of all necessaries for Warre, and leauing a chiefe Commander at home, of the Royall linage; they wandered abroad thorow the Fieldes, to winne by power, or compasse, by Loue, some new habitation wherein to liue.

Many Authours, and, among the rest, Trebellius saith, that the first rumour of this their straying, was vnder the raigne of the Emperour Flauius Claudius, about the year of our Lord Iesus Christ, two hundred seuentie two. And that they passed thorow Germany, Hungaria, Thrace, Greece, Gaule, and so farre as Italie. They lost many battalles, and wonne likewise as many, against the Romaines and other people, maintaining themselves so well: that they raigned in Italie (euen in despite of the Italians and Emperours) the space of seauentie and one yeares; as Procopius auoucheth. At length they went into Spaine, whence (afterward) they would not remouue: for the Catholique Kinges of Spaine that then raigned by succession, and raigned yet to this present, descended from the race and line of their Kinges, who were (indeed) very generous people.

Now, it is to be imagined, that in regard of such a mighty muster of men, the Country of Gothia, or Gothland, or the Neighboring Borders, remained not without Inhabitants, or the rule of Kinges: For there were euen then left behind, so many as the Land was able to nourish, who had their Kinges in authority ouer them, and strength sufficient to withstand any inuasion of the Country. As for the conquering Armies abroad, they continued in honour for a verie long time; albeit, they lost great store of men in battalles, encounters, surprisals, and passages of Riueres: for these disadvantages were still supplied, by the daily birth of Children among them, because they had their Wiues in all places among them. And perhaps some Straungers mingled among them, who wearing their habites, and learning their Language, helped still to increase the line of this people.

Such as haue bene named Ostrogothes, were a people of the same Country, of Gothia or Gottland, from a place which is called Ostrogothia, the principall Cities whereof, are Strango and Linnepa. This people made their warre apart by themselves, being separated from the Gothes, yet ranging abroad in the wide World, according as they did.

The Westrogothes (in like manner) came out of a Country called Westrogothia, among whom, the chiefe Cities, yet to this present daies, are, Strango and Verum. Wistgots, or Bisigothes, came forth of a Country named Frisi, the very principall whereof, is yet named Frisi. And was the more willing to make this description, because I haue heard of diuers (who are but slenderly experienced in Cosmography) that they do term those Ostrogothes, to be Gothes Orientall, or of the East; and the Westrogothes, Occidental Gothes, or dwelling in the West; and so contrariwise of the other. Albeit, they are all descended, and came out of the Kingdome of Gothia, or Gottland, according as Munster hath very well obserued.

The Vandals, in the erroneous judgement of Procopius, a learned Greeke Authour, are laide for to be of the verie same Nation, and that all the feuerall people of the Gothes, Vandales, Alanes, Frunnes, and diuers others, (whom I am heereafter to describe vnto you) were deriued out of one and the selfe-same Land, and are all comprehended vnder the name of Sauromates, or Sarmates, and haue no other difference, but onely by the names of their Captaines or Kinges. But I must maintaine against him, that the Land of the Vandales is distant from Gothland, about the space of two hundred leagues, and therefore they cannot be one people with the Gothes. True it is, that this Nation is Septentrional, or in the North, as the others are, and in a Maritime Country also, named yet to this day Vandalia; as I haue already ready said, yet very far off the one from the other.

This people did (almost) as much hurt to the Romaine Empire; as the Goths did: for, ioyning diuers other people with them (as the Alains, Suaues and Franconians): they trauesed the Rhine, Gauderichus being then their King, and passing among the Gauls, wasted and spoyled them very greatly. Then went they into Spain, and in despite of the Goths tooke possession of that part of the Countrey, which ioyne to the Kingdome of Granada, and is (to this day) called Andalusia, or (by corrupting the Word) Vandalusia, albeite the Spaniards mince it more nicely, and nick-name it to be Andalusia. To be briefe, they were (after much wast and spoyle) expelled forth of Spain wholly in the year four hundred thirtie one, vnder another of their Kinges, named Genfericus, and passed thence into Africa, where they reigned seauenty sixe yeares. From thence they were compelled to auoyde, in the seauenth year of the Emperour Iustinian, in Anno. Domino. 528. by the valour of one of his Captaines, named Belsarius.

The Hunnes also departed out of their Countrey, for the selfe-same cause as the Goths did, about the yeare one hundred sixtie eight, onely to seek some other Land, where they might liue after the Scythians Religion: first getting possession of Pannonia, where they alwaies so strongly kept and guarded it, that (according to their owne name) it became to be called Hungaria.

This people came from that part of Scythia, which was rearm'd * Hunos, no long distance from the River Tanaus; but it is in a miserable estate at this day, and vnder subiection of the Moscovites. Having vsurped Pannonia, they kept it manfully against the Romaines, and two hundred yeares after, Attila their King, accompanied with some people of the Allemaignes or Germanes, as Bohemians, Gepides or Gypides, Seleses, Wetlites, Thuringians, Goths, Ostrogoths, and others, making (in all) about the number of fixe hundred thousand Men: passed thorough Allemaigne, which they very much endamaged.

Then went he into France, where hee lost a battailie, in which perished a great number of his men. This battailie was given him by the Romains, Gauls, and certaine Goths allyed together, and hee lost (as some Authours doe affirme) about two hundred thousand men. At length he iournied into Italie, which he (wel-neere) yterlie ruined, and retiring afterward home into his owne Countrey of Hungaria: he dyed within some few following moneths, and on the day of his Nuptials, which was in the year of Iesus Christ, foure hundred forty three.

The Lombardes were a Northerne people, issuing out of Denmarke, as Eusebius maintaineth; and no other reason had they to leaue their Native Countrey; but onely a desire to winne some other. There happened in the time of one Seno, or Sveno (yet some tearme him Snio) a very great dearth or scarcitie of victuals in the Land, and because the people endured it verie impatientlie: was concluded by the King and his Councell (to ease the Countrey of so many men as were ready to famish) that all such persons as were vnable, eyther for Warre, or labour of the Ground; should be slaine, whether they were old or young. But this seuered Edict being reuoked, they then resolved to make a leuy of all sortes of people, that (by the helpe of Armes) might trauaile to finde out some other dwelling, so to discharge the Countreys heauy burthen.

This being put in Execution, they trauailed so farre, and carryed themselves so couragiously in trauesing diuers Landes: that they came at last into Italie, and there conquered the Countrey, which was called Liguria, making themselves absolute Maistres thereof. Now, because these people were long and taule of stature: the Italians and Ligurians tearmed them long Barbarians, which by corruption of the Word, and succession of times, made them to be called Lombardes, or Lombardes. Some are of opinion, that vnder the raigne of Valentinian the Emperour, they beganne to make themselves first knowne; which was about the year of our Saviour Iesus Christ,

The great Ioliff that Attila sustained in France.

Christ 385, and that they became Commanders in Liguria, in the year 570. Likewise, according to Petrus Diaconus, the Emperours made peace with them, in the year, seven hundred and thirtie, and euer since they haue held that Countrey, which at this day is named Lombardy.

Let it heere be further noted, that where (in any Historie) mention is made of people tearmed Dacis, or Danians; the Nation of Denmarke, is thereby vnderstood. Out of which Countrey, many great Armies haue trauailed at sundry times, and haue mightily troubled diuers Kingdomes: among which, they continued a long time in England, but were thence expelled, about the year eight hundred sixtie, as is generally granted.

The Normanes were people of Norduegia, or otherwise called Normania, a Northerne Countrey, being much addicted to crueltye and inhumanitie, because they vsed many great Piracies on the Seas. An hundred and fifty thousand Men (of this Nation) bestowed themselves in Vessels on the Sea, and tooke possession of that part of Gaul, or France, which was then named Neustria, now Normandie, and this was done in the year of Iesus Christ, fixe hundred; and others say, eight hundred eightie foure, and in the time of Charles Le Gros. But be it howsoever, they haue (since then) kept it against all encounters of the Emperours, Kings of France and England, preserving it still by the name of Normandy, and themselves reckoned to be people of vndaunted courage. There are diuers others, that doe fauour of this their first Originall, and doe yet proude vpon the Seas, committing many Thefts and Robberies.

The Nation which we call Sniffes, Suesses, or Suenes, but more vulgarly Zutizers, and are (at this day) auxiliaries vnto the French: came out of Suetia, Suenia, or Sueneland, a Northerly Region like to the other. They likewise, by reason of the dearth of foode among them: departed forth of their owne Countrey, about the yeare of Grace, eight hundred, and went so farre as the Rhine, which they would haue passed;

but were hindred by the Franconians. Thence went they to the Land of the Heluetians, who despising the Suesses, (because they were poorly and wretchedly apparelled, rude in their feeding, and not looking like Souldiours) suffered them to wander about their Countrey.

At length, perceiuing the kinde sufferance of the Heluetians: they fought to abide in a certaine Canton of their Land. Which when the Heluetians noted, they demanded of them; to what end they thus wandered about the World? They answered, That they were poore people, and sought but to weare out their liues in trauaile, by deluing or labouring in the Earth. And seeing that there was wast ground in those partes, vnlaboured, or any vic made of (it being Hills and Vallies, enuironed with diuers Lakes) they desired the Heluetians, to permit them to labour in those rough Fields, as yet not cultiue: and they should receiue the gaine and benefit thereof, onely allowing them but nourishment for their paines. This was all that they requested to pretend, iustifying their requests with many follemne Oaths and protestations. Their desire was granted, and not long after, the Countrey wherein they liued, was not onely called Suessia, in regard of the Suessians there dwelling: but likewise the Ancient Inhabitants had the same Name giuen them, and (in truth) the Countrey is very mountaine, and vnapt for riding.

Iustinian, and other Emperours, (both before and after him) entited themselves Lordes of the Allemaignes, by hauing receiued some victories against the Allemaigners. But this may not be faide (as some haue done heretofore) that those victories were obtained against the Germanes: for euen at this present daie, when that wee speake or Write of Allemaigne; therein is comprehended all the Nations, which are contained throughout Germanie, and that doe speake the language of the Teutones. But as concerning Allemaigne it selfe, and Allemaignes; the Romaines neuer vnderstood, or meant any other people, then those of Saba. And, to speake vprightly, they euer haue bene (and are) the true and Auncient Allemaignes; as Cornelius Tacitus plainly confumeth. Drusus Nero was the first, that styled himselfe Germanicus: for hauing rather angered the Germanes, then soyled them, as diuers other Emperours afterward did. Moreouer, by Germanie is to be vnderstood nine and forty great Prouinces, as well of the lower part, as of the higher part of the said Germanie, comprizing the Countries of the Switzers and Heluetians.

Ouer and beside the fore-named Titles, they vied the word Analicus, which by translation, implyeth Alaines. Many haue supposed, that these were a people of Germanie, but therein they were and are deceived: for Protonius knew them well, and placed them in a part of Scythia. Capitonus betowes them in Dacia; Marcellinus, Pliny, & Dionysius the Poet, doe graunt them a being in Sarmatia of Europe. Iosephus, in his last Booke, affirmeth their abode to be betwene the riuer Tanais, and the Palmus Maotides; and faith moreouer, that (in his time) these Alaines or Alanes, accompanied with the Hircanians; both robbed and spoyled all the Region of the Medes. As for my selfe, by that which I haue gathered, from such as haue written on the actions of the Gothes: I am perswaded, that those Alaines were their Companions, and that oftentimes (in their Warres) for their owne aduantage, they sundred themselves from them, as one while they did with the Vandales. But questionlesse, their descent was from Scythia, according to the affirmation of Ptolomey.

If we shall speake of the Gepudes, Gyrrides, or Inquides, and what people they were: there are opinions enow concerning them. Some say, that they were (at the first) of Scythia, and came thence (as the Lombards did) into Italy. But hauing made a more curious and diligent search; I find, that they were a people of Germanie, being then called Gepudy, or Sepudy, and (according to Protonius Mataneus) now at this day, Siechemburgs; who followed the Gothes, the Vandals and the Normanes also, they being erring and vagabond people. Till at length they ventred on the Seas, and went to inhabite the Isles of the Orchades, whereof Thille is the latest inhabited, as Volateranus auoucheth, and now is subiect to the Kings of Scotland.

The Geter haue bene, and are yet a warlike people, instantly much mollified by the Turkes; but they found the Romaines work enough to doe, consisting of Transiluanians, Wallachians, Moldautians, and other Countries about the River Ister, which falleth into the Ponticke Sea.

I may not be forgetful of the Bourguignons, because I my selfe defended of that Nation. Orosius holdeth, that they are deriued out of Germany; And Volateranus faith, that Iouinianus the Emperour vanquished such a people, which liued by the Riuer of Rheine. But there is nothing more certaine (according as I haue gathered by the Germanie Histories) then that they issued from some remains of the Gothes, Vandales, and Hunnes, who being altogether chafed by the Romaines; threw themselves vpon that part of Gaulle, which they stiled after their owne name, and there (perforce) enthroned themselves. For afterward, they could so well resist the Romaines, that they were constrained to yeild them tolleration, and let them liue in the saide Countrey amongst the first Inhabitants. There they builded Fortes, Villages, and Townes, which they teamed Bourgs or Bourrouges of Gothes and Hunnes. And then coniecting (corruptly) to speake it in one Word: from Bourg-Goth Hunnes, they came to be called Bourguignons, as much to say, as a warring people.

Etienne, Lieutenant to the Emperour Theodosius, gaue them a bataille in the yeare of Christ. 435. and won the day: but it cost him so deare, that he would neuer after meddle any more with them. About the yeare 430. they receiued and embraced the Christian Faith. These people grew on in great ciuility, and became as much addicted to Learning, as to Armes: For they haue a goodly vniuersity, founded by one of the Dukes of Bourgonne, wherein many Lectures are read of all the Sciences, to Schollers of all Nations, at Dols, the capitall City of that part of Bourgonne, which is vnder command of the house of Aufria, and there they hold a Parliament also. As for the other part of Bourgonne, in obedience to the crown of France: Digeon is the Metropolitane City thereof, where likewise is held another Parliament. And these two Bourgonnes are maintained in very good peace, albeit they are in obedience to diuers Princes.

The fore-named Emperours did also stile themselves by names of Franques, as hauing fought with and repulsed the Franconiens, who were risen vp in arms, and departed out of their Countrey of Germany. But so slender were their impeachings, that they invaded the Gauls, which then were Prouinces of the Romaines, notwithstanding, all the best means they could make. They were entitled Africenes likewise, for hauing obtained some Conquests in Africa: And Parthians also, for hauing wonne some victories ouer the Parthians. Stephanus ranketh them among the people of Scythia: but I neuer knew, or read, that the Romaines made the Parthians tributary, being their best Friends, for they had more victories ouer the Romans, then ouer the Romans had against them. They did not leaue their Countries, and sought after a new habitation, eyther for pouertie or necessitie: but rather to conquer Kingdomes and Prouinces; as Media, Hircania, Armenia, Caramania, and many other. The Riuer Euphrates was the limits betwene them and the Romaines: but those Romaine Emperours, vpon the declining of their Empire, were Princes full of follie and vain-glory, attributing Titles to themselves, without any matter of right or merit.

They gaue themselves also the Title of Happy and Prosperous, albeit they were (oftentimes) the most unfortunate men of other, as well in their home affaires, as the Negotiations of the Empire. For (day by day) they lost their Prouinces, which precedent Auncient Captaines (endowed with many vertues) and worthy Romaine Consuls had won, by no meane expence of paines, and effusion of their blood.

Moreouer, the most part of the Emperours, beheld their Wiues, Children, and Friends, murdered and massacred; yea, and themselves subiect to no better fortune in the end: as Iustinian, who was cast out of his Empire by Elerianus. They would likewise be called Iselytes, that is to say; Princes of glorious renowne, victorious, triumphing, and euermore Augustus, as much to say, as enlargers of the Romaine Empire: but, as I formerly said, these were but such Titles as Flatterers gaue them; for the greater number of those Emperours; after that these Titles of honour were imposed on them; could boast of no such happinesse, but rather came farre short of any such felidities.

Thus haue I briefly scened the originall of all those people, which those Emperours made vanto haue soyled and vanquished; shewbeit, though they were teamed barbarous by them, yet (by little and little) they rent and tore their Empire in pieces. At this day they are all become ciuillized, and (well-neere all) Christians: onely the Parthians excepted, who are Mahometists, pertaking in the Turkes Religion.

But hauing spoken of so many Nations, who are all said to be deriued from the Scythians: wee may not omit to say some-what of the Picts, who (by the opinion of most Writers) do beare the name of a people of Germanie, that had their Originall out of Scythia, descending of the Agathyrsi in Sarmatia, that vied to paint and couler their faces, and thereupon were named Picts. Before they entered into Brittaine, they inhabited the Isle of Orkney for a long time together, ferrying ouer into Cathness daily, multiplying so in power and number: that (getting vp further into the Land) they possessed Rosse, Murreyland, Merne and Angus, whence passing into Fife and Lothian, they droue thence the Brittain Inhabitants, who were onclie poore people, that liued by nourishing & breeding Cattle. This their entrance into Albion (for so was it then called) was in the yeare of the Worlds Creation 3633.

Cruchneus Camelonus is said to be the first King of the Picts, and that he builded a famous City on the banke of the Riuer cald Caron, appointing it to be the chiefe City of all the Pictish Kingdom. He builded also the Towne of Agmeda, afterward called Edenburgh, of Ethus, King of the Picts, and the Castle, named

CHAP. XXVIII.

What benefit Musique bringeth to a Common-wealth; And how it hath bene naturally given to all Nations in the world, and (by the iudgement of some Historians) hath cured diuers infirmities and diseases of the mind.

Ery certain it is, that some Law-makers, peculiar, troublesome, and ouer-hard in many matters, whereof Lycurgus was one: did expel Musick out of their Commonwealths, affirming, that it made people effeminate, negligent, and idle. But I am of a quite contrary minde, and dare maintaine, that such as will truly consider Musique, and what it is in it selfe: shall finde, that it can make men bold, hardy, modest, and chaste, especially being wel and vertuously vsed. Vnder this kind of Musique, I comprehend not onely that which is sung by Art and melodiously, as by the voyces of Men, Women, or Children: but also I presuppose (within the same compasse) all Instruments; as Flutes, Lutes, Viols, Drums, Trumpets, Organes, Virginals, Harpes, and others. And there is not any thing, that maketh men more ciuilly minded, or preferreth them in better concord and amitie, then Musique.

Polybius declareth, that the great Common-wealth of the * Cynetheses in Arcadia, falling from the delight they formerly had in Musique: grew soone after into seditious humors, & ciuill wars among themselves, wherein there wanted not any kind of crueltie. And when all their Neighbors round about them, were merely confounded with admiration, as wondering how these people should become so harsh, barbarous, and rude, considering that all the other people of Arabia, had by them been reduced to cunctie and humane tractability: Polybius was the first that took notice thereof, and auouched, that it onely proceeded, by leauing the vse of Musique, which (from all Antiquity) had euermore bene prized and honoured in Arcadia, more then in any other place of the World. For it was especially ordained, by the customes and decrees of the Countrey, that euery one should make vse thereof for the space of thirty yeares; yea, vpon very great paines and penalties. And this was the reason (saith Polybius) that the first Law-makers among those people, ordained and appointed continually thereof: onely to cause ciuility & humanity, in regard, that (of their owne naturall disposition) they were wilde, fierce, and barbarous, as all people inhabiting the Mountaines, and cold Countries are.

Perhaps the like iudgement might passe on the Gauls of former times, whom Julian the Emperour reamed the barbarous people of his daies: which Nation (neuertheless) became afterward so courteous and tractable, as any other people whatsoever in Europe, whereat all Straungers wondered not a little. And yet it is generally knowne, that no people did more practise Musique, or sung more sweetly, then they: nay, and that which goeth farre beyond this, they could daunce any daunce in France, were it Ionian or Lydian, that is to say: consisting of five or seauen notes or strains. Which were expressly forbidden to Youth, by Plato and Aristotle, because they had a great power and preuailance, in softning and humbling the hearts of men. They would also exercise their Children to the * Derion Musique, which was the first or chiefest note, to maintaine them in an harmonious sweetnesse, accom-

Such prohibition might better haue bene vsed in the lesser Asia, where they had no other dances, but of fine or selen straines, especially in the Countreys of Ionia and Lydia. But people inhabiting the Northern parts; cold, Mountainous, and Rocky, who are ordinarily more savage, or lesse courteous then the Inhabitants of the South; or dwelling on Plaines, neuer can be better qualified or softened, then by vsing the Ionian & Lydian harmony, which was also forbidden in the Primitive Church: and nothing was there permitted to be sung, but of the first note: which is now most of all frequented in Churches. And like as men do disarme Savage Beasts of furie & violence, to make them of a more tractable Nature: euen so, the Lydian and Ionian Musick or harmony, disarmeth the verie rudest and most barbarous Nations, of all their former savage, and cruel Natures: causing them to become melle, pliant, and affable. According as it fell out with the Gauls, who (it may be) could not haue bene tamed & made obedient vnto the ciuill Lawes and Ordinances of a Monarchy, if their former sterne Nature (which the Emperour Julian said, was so high, and vnufferable of seruitude) had not bin mollified and sweetened by Musick.

And in truth, there is nothing that more taketh away offensiuenesse, or easeth matter of great and laborious traualle (as working in the ground, Masonry, Carpentry, and exercising other Arts, painefull to the bodie) then singing doth.

In like manner, all Artezans, following any Trade or profession, doe vse to sing: as Hay-makers, Haruesters, Gardners, Deluers, Children and Women weeding grounds, doe weare awaie the irksomnesse of their labour by singing, either in heate or colde, Winds or Rain, it maketh paine the more supportable to them.

Soldiers, euen when they goe (inancie times) to be laine in a battell, will yet sing by the way: the beating of Drums, and sounding of Fifes and Trompers, giueth courage to the Soldier for his carriage in Warre, making him hardie, bold, and valiant. Noe is it to be doubted, that Nature gaue Musick and Melodie to man; but onely for his good and benefit; as young Children do apparently manifest vnto vs: for when their Suckles would haue them to sleepe, and keepe them in their Cradles: euen when they are most impatient and froward: nothing sooner asswageth and preuayleth with them; then mellodie and singing. And marke Barbarous Nations, as haue bin discovered in former Antiquity; and in our daies, in that part of the earth which is called the New-found World: Flutes haue bene found among them; Drums, Hoboyes, and other Instruments: and both priuately and publickely, as also in their Temples, singing of Psalmes hath bene obserued.

Many creatures, as diuers kinds of Birds, when they are in any cheerful disposition, will sing to solace and delight themselves: as the Nightingale, the Tarrine, the Thrush, Linnet, Blackbird, and others; among which Birds, many haue bene taught to sing by men, as dayle in most places is discerned. As concerning foure-footed Beasts, diuers of them doe take much pleasure in Musick, as namely Camels: for if such as guide and gouerne them, doe not ordinarily sing or whistle to them, they will not trauele with any spirit or cheerfulness. All such as haue bene in the East Countreys, and noted the Carauannes, which are troops of Camels laden with Merchandizes, haue affirmed as much. ment, constrained Alexander (as out-joyed with pleasure) for to depart from a banquet. Next, we may speake of Alexander, who was loath to part from his Country, and go to the siege of Troy, because he was doubtfull of the modesty of his wife Clytemnestra; and therefore, he left a Musition on the Harp with her; the sound whereof, should incite her to bashfulness and continence, so that Aegisthus could not abuse her, without killing the Musition. But in speaking of this Harp, it maketh me to remember the Royall Psalmist David, who of himselfe, was a man verie strong and seuer, yet much guided and detained by his Psalterion. Nor are we to thinke, that the hermonie of this Instrument, was common or vulgar, whereof the sacred Scripture maketh mention so many times, and which was iudged only (among al other) meete to celebrate the praises of God. It is composed of seauentie two strings, in forme triangulare, and the consonance thereof, is incomparable.

It was ordained by Moses, that God should be praised in his Temple, with voices and Instruments; and Christians (afterward) made continuance thereof by singing Psalms, both with voices and Organs, which greatly incited Deuotion in the verie dullest minds. It was an especiall note of ciuilitie among the Grecians, euen as it is to this day after any feast or Banquet, to play vpon some Musical Instrument, or to sing anie Ode melodiously. Which obseruation, reached into Italy, Germany, Spain, and France, where much more account is made of a cunning Musition that can sing well, play on Muscull Instruments, Dance, y^e lofotic trickes, yet keepe both tune and time, that the cadence of his feete may fit with the Instrument, then of any ydle, neglect or ignorant fellow.

Manie haue attributed the inuention of Musicke, and playing on the Lyre or Harpe, to Orpheus; others, to Amphion; the Grecians to Dionysius or Bacchus; but others, to the people of Areadia, because the men of that Country, were naturally addicted thereto. The Hebrewes, as Moses and Iosephus, doe say; that Isabell the Sonne of Lamech (who liued in the yeare of the worlde, 1040. manie Ages before Amphion, and al other Musitions, was the Father of all that play vpon the Harpe and Organs; and that he did first finde out the concords of Musicke; nay more, that hee carefully addicted himselfe, and played both on the Psalterion, and on the Harpe. As concerning my selfe, I will not deny, that all the fore-named men were good Musitions, but that any one man of them should bee the sole inuenter, I can verie hardly therein bee perswaded.

Rather I am of the minde, that euerie singular man, according vnto the Ages wherein they liued, made addition of their skill and knowledge; and so brought it to the perfection wherein we now find it to bee. And in these verie dayes of ours, there haue liued men so excellent and skillfull, as haue added diuers Rules, which neuer were knowne before, and brought the name of Musick to admired perfection, some inuentors whereof are knowne, but other vncertaine.

Before the Conclusion of this Chapter, I am desirous to set downe two seuerall experiences, concerning the efficacy and might of Musick: which my self saw practised vpon two Gentlewomen; one of them being de la March, neer to Garet, young, vertuous, and passable for beautie. This Gentlewoman fell into such a furie (by reason of a reporte made vnto her, of other husbands inclination, to change and nouell affection) that at euerie sudden moment of time, shee would throw her selfe headlong into the fire, or out at a Window, or into a Fish-pond; neere to her house; out of which, she had bene rescued two seuerall times; and therefore committed to more diligent keeping.

Physitions could returne no good by their paines and endeours, but a religious Capuine passing that way, and craving his Passade or Almes, at the doore of this Gentlewomans house; and hearing the strange accident befall her, gaue them aduise, that some skilfull man, well experienced in playing vpon the Lute, should vse his cunning by her, and not to part from her in some prettie length of time, because it would proue verie helpfull to her. Further hee added, that in the night time, some pleasing Ditties might well comfort with the Musicke, which accordingly was performed; and within lesse then three months space, the violent passion forsooke her; and she remaineth maineth at this time found both in mind and bodie.

I likewise knew another Gentlewoman of honor at Chen, whose name may best be knowne by du Parreau, that al her life time, did neuer vse the helpe of anie Physicke, how great or grieuous fouer her infirmities were. But in all his diseases, griefes, hurts, Childe-weaknesse, and lamenesse, shee neuer desired anie better Physition, then one that could artificially play on the Taber and Pipe, and him shee would entitle her true Physition.

This Gentlewoman being well entred into Age, it happened, that an extreme paine seized on her knee, imagined to proceede from some taste of the Cowe. Whereupon, she would haue her laborer instantly, to play her a pleasant and liuely Carranto. The laborer being verie willing to please his Mistresse, made such haile to touch his Taber, and founde his Pipe in the best manner: that striving to exceede himselfe in Art and dexterity, both in readinesse of his winde, and agility of hand, he fell down in a swoond vpon the Floore. Hee being disabled from playing any longer, and all there present wondering not a little, to see him lye in such strange estate, without anie recovery of strength or knowledge, for the space almost, of three quarters of an houre: the Gentlewoman her selfe, euen then complained, that her paine and affliction was neuer so extraordinary on her, as in the time of the Musicks so sudden cessation.

The Taborer hauing recovered strength and iudgement againe, and indifferentlie refreshed with a sprightly Cup of Wine, fell afresh to his former skillfull Muscull playing, and the Gentlewoman felte her paine immediately to leaue her. I my selfe was in the Chamber when these accidents happened; and do auouch vpon my credit, that the Gentlewoman thus liued an hundred and six yeares.

In briefe, in all well pollicied and ordered Commonweales, men should entrust their Sons and Daughters in Musick, because it mollifieth angrie hearts, allswageth sadnesse, preferueth people in kinde concord and amitie, healeth many melancholy diseases, and is no mean exciter of the minde to deuotion. Plato was of the minde, that the Heauens (in their motion and stirring) doth make fo great and melodious an hermonie, that if man could be able to vnderstand it, he would neuer be wearied with abiding in this world.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of Gold, the properties & excellency thereof: Where it is found: How it is extracted, purified: and what paine is bestowed in getting it.

E thinks, I shoulde offer great wrong to Nature, if hauing written on fo manie fundry things, I shold not say somewhat concerning Gold, it being the most excellent of all other metalls, yea (in a maner) surpassing all things created in this weathier world. For, it is faide to be immortall, exempted from all rust and corruption; inso much, that lying hidden in the earth, in the Water, or in the most putrified heape of filth, for so manie yeares as any one please, yet it will neuer receiue or tast of any imperfection; or let it be continually kept in the fire, yet it neuer diminisheth, neither receiueh any change or alteration.

His colour carrieth resemblance with the beames of the Sunne, which reioyeth or cheareth melancholy people. It hath no euil fauour or tast neither soileth their hands that meddle with it, as all other Metalls esse do; which likewise float aloft about Quick-silver, but Gold only goes to the bottome. If it be receiued into the bodie, it neuer offendeth the stomacke, be it either in powder, or solidly in Morlelles: but contrarywise, giueth chearefulness to the heart, and comforteth the vital spirits, whereto other Metalls are often offensive.

Therefore, let no man enter into anie meruaile, if the World doth make such estimation thereof, and prize it above all other things. For, as concerning the matter whereof it consisteth, a Learned Authour sayeth: That it is composed of two Elementarie substances, insitile and equally proportioned. These substances then so mingled, being equall and vnited in proprietie, can endure nothing else, but this amiable and concordiall Commixtion, which perfecteth it selfe in the fermentation and knitting together, making such an interligation, and absolute vnion of the one with the other; that it appeareth meerey impossible to dissolve or separte them. So that, bee it that this ensue by the influence of the Celestiall bodies, or by the diuturnity and power of time, or by the admirable operation of Nature; or else, that all these are therein assisting: yet notwithstanding, these Elementarie substances do conuert themselves into a Mettall bodie, which is reamed Golde. The temperature whereof, with the Colligation and Vnion, maketh it so firme and solide, that not only it begetteth a common and vulgar permanencie: but receiueh likewise an incorruptible temperature, as it were, hauing (I know not how) some what in him, that enricheth and honoureth him, with all the forenamed excellent properties.

Elementarie conuerted Metally bodies.

Merchants saile by Sea, trauell on the Land, with infinite cares, dangers, and paines, only to get this Gold. The maine intent of Soldiers, that expose themselves euerie moment into the pawes of death, or danger of her perpetuall thraldome, is only to winne Golde. For be it, that they surprize a Citie by assault, or winne the day by triall of battaile: they wil seeke after no other Luggage or Moueeables, but Gold onely: and if prisoners labor to redeeme their liues, the ranfome must be Gold only. Schollers, and men experienced in all Arts, their studie & practise is to no other end, but to gaine Golde. If a payment be made to any great person, it must be in faire Gold. If gifts to Princes, none fitter then Golde. It but betweene Friend and Friend, the courtesie doth best expresse it selfe in Gold.

Kinges, Emperours, and Princes, by the meanes of Golde, haue made themselves redoubted and dreadfull, and conquered manie potent Prouinces. Let Philip King of Macedon remaine as a testimonie; who causing a re-search to bee made in the Mines of Gold which were in his Countreyes (that formerly had bin thoroughly digged, and quite giuen ouer) found yet so much remaining, as yeilded him the whole Conquest of Greece and Alexander his Sonne afterward, of all the East. And many times, by the meanes of this excellling Mettall, the same King Philip, caused impregnable places to bee surrendered to him, which he neuer could haue surprized by power.

To approue the truth heereof, Plutark reporteth of the same Philip, that he hauing besiedged a place, by Nature so inexpugnable, that his owne followers aduised him to withdraw from thence: he demanded of him that had best experience of the faide place, if there were no meanes, to let an Assie (laden with Gold) but goe about it. Whereto answer was made, yes doubtlesse. Then Philip assured himselfe of taking the place, for he that was the Commaunder in it, coming to parlie, and touching the Gold, submitted himselfe to King Philip, & the place also.

The Indians, which be so farre off, are sought for with danger of death, and vn-speakable trauails of so manie thousands of men, which the Kings of Spaine haue continually sent thither: onely for the Mines of Golde, and rich sands so frequently found in the Riuer. Which neuer would be so fiercely followed, if I were able to recount, how manie men and women grow negligent of their own honor and good fame, onely by the base affection of Gold. But let vs now see, where this Golde is found; and in what manner it is come by: which I will relate in a Chapter by it selfe, least this should be offensive to the Reader by length.

Kingdomes & great Prouinces wonnely by Gold.

Impregnable places made passible by Gold.

CHAP. XXX.

How Mines of Gold are known where they are: And in what manner the Golde is taken forth & washed.

I would require too long a labour to relate all those Regions where Golde is found; for I am perswaded, that if men did beflow their paines in seeking, Mines would be found (almost in euery Country: yet more in some one, then in other; and of greater ease to be obtained. In manie parts of Germany, Gold is found, as in Bohemia, Transylvania, Lauris, Sieebourg, and many other Countreyes. In England in some few places. In Macedonia in a place called Syderocapsa. In diuers parts of Africa, as in Ethiopia, and beyond the rest, in the New worlde, which we improperly tearme India, where Gold is had with much lesse labour, then amongst vs.

All Countreies supposed to haue Mines of Golde, but not alike in quantity.

Men find not Ingots ready made to their hands.

No such store of Gold now as in former times.

The Necessitie of Gold.

Yet howsoeuer it be, nothing can be obtained without labour; and we must not thinke, that when men are in the Indies, they finde Ingots readie made to their hands, and gather vp Golde, as we do stones vpon the High-ways. Surely it cannot be so, for we finde by the Spanish Histories, that the more part of the Naturall Indians, do meerey dye with labouring in the Mines of Golde, as being ouer-enforced and constrained vnto hard toyle, and verie badly vsed by the Spaniards.

Now adayes, no such plentie of Gold is brought thence, as formerly hath bin, for that which was sent hither, and in so great quantities, had long time before bene gathered by the Indians. And so much the rather, because the greater part of their Idoles, were made of malsey Gold; the verie soles of their Shooes, Vessels, and wearing Garments. Their Temples and Royall Pallaces, were all couered quite ouer with Golde, as ours are with Lead, and manie other moueeables, which were too long and tedious to relate.

Next, the great and admirable ranfomes of manie of their Kinges, I passe ouer in silence, as being at large discouered in diuers other Bookes. But nowe at this present, a new kind of search must bee made for Golde, with much difficult labour, and great expence of time, especially, to recouer anie such quantitie. Therefore, let vs examine the places where it is to be had, and what proceeding is vsed therein.

Mettall matters haue their proper seating in Mountaines, in the same quarter, as Trees haue their roots, Trunkes Branches, and Leanes. And those hills, whose toppes tend towards the South, and their feetes stretch towards the North, dooth giue a demonstration to haue Mettall in them, because Mettalles doe engender themselves of a verie thicke and grosse humour, which may be knowne by the colour and fauour; for, it yeeldeth a Blacke coloured earth, in regard of the Golde and Siluer, and such is the fauour also.

If ye breake two stones, of one and the same hill, if any Mettall be beneath in the bowelles thereof, ye shall apparently perceiue, that the Stones will fauour exceedingly of Sulphure. Whereby is to bee vnderstoode, that the first creation or compofure of Golde, is in the verie top and highest part of Mountaines, or other loftie places, because the Sunne there purifieth that, which is ouermuch earthy. But when Raynes and Torrents, doe (by little and little) distill vpon the hilles, they beare the Golde along downe with them vnto the lower parts of those hilles: whence likewise ensueeth, that the earth rising by the Raine, Golde therein encloueth it selfe.

Hauing declared sufficiently (as I thinke) the true Originall of Golde, and of his Mines, I come now to relate, how it is come by, as well in Germany, as in Calicut, Peru, and other Prouinces, be they in the East, West, North, or South, in which places, there are diuers diuersities of Mines, Because they must either fish for Graines of Golde in the Riuer, or Mettall matters are in Mountaines, and are discerned by colour, and smell of the earth.

Gold is created in Mountaines of high Hills, and in what manner.

Howe manie diuersities of Mines of gold there are, & how they are generally signified.

Yyy delue

delue and digge in the Rockes & Mountaines, according vnto the places where such Mines are discovered. For knowledge whereof, it is to bee vnderstande, that there be Mines, which are teamed pendant or hanging Mines; others called lying or settled; others, oblique, or winding diuers waies; and others beside, that are streaming or gliding gently along in the earth or water.

The pendant Mines, be those which are found in the sommitie or superficies of hills or Mountaines, and haue (from thence) earth vnderneath them. Those that bee called lying or settled, are such as are beneath in the bottome, or playne firme ground, being carried downe thither by Torrents and outrageous Raiues. And the other which are layde to be oblique or Circling, haue their courses thwarting or trauesing, eyther in those which hang, or in the Lying Mines. And all of these, doo disperse and spred themselves (by the meanes of little Pearling Gullies of Water) into the neereff neighbouring Riuer: from whence ensueth, that there are Riueres, generallye throughout the World, wherein is Sande and Granel, appearing as if it were Azure and Golden in Colour, and therein are pure and fine graines of good Gold.

But returning to the pendant or hanging Mine, it behooueth heere to know, after what maner the Indians (and diuers other Nations, where such matter is in vse and practise) do gouerne and carrie themselves, in getting or deriuing this Metall out of the earths entrailes.

Before we enter vpon the worke, it is necessarie to knowe, that in the Eastern Countreies, where the people are Idolaters, such men as intend to goe and digge for Gold, and neuer were before at any Mines opening: doe abstaine from their Viues, & all other pleasures of the body, vnto verie soleinne Fastes and abstinences, adoring the Sun with earnest prayers. And this they doe, not onely because they hold a firme opinion, that Gold must needs be a sacred thing; but also to arme and settle themselves against Diabolicall Visions and illusions, which they are often subiect to in solitarie places, where they raise vp and finde so precious a Metall, as they that haue bene in Peru, and the other Neighbouring Countreies, confessed to haue seen, during the time of their there present abiding.

Gold there is found in the earth, and in Rockie places, bee they the plaines or hilly grounds, where there is no verdure, but all naked and bare. In such partes as are without Water, as the experimented and skilful in the Veyns of Mines (knowing for a certainty what can be in such an earth) do first wash the place very cleane where they purpose to digge; which being done, they delue about eight or ten foote in depth, and as much in length and largenesse; then, in a certaine vessell made of purpose, they fill doe wash the earth, as it is digged vp. If thus by washing, they finde any Golde, they continue on the labour: but if they find none, they will not yet giue ouer, vntill by digging deeper, they finde out the Rocke, which they breake and pierce thorough with their Instruments, vaulting it daylie as they goe on, with Engines and strong defences of Woodde, that the earth or stones may not fall downe vpon them. Concerning such Mines as are fought for in plaine grounds, they beginne digging (so neere as possibly they may) vnto some Brooke, Riuer, Current, or Lake: because thereby (in washing the earth) they may the sooner perceiue the Gold; or when any cometh to them, for otherwise, the labour would be too insupportable. And this is the reason, that the richest men in the Indians, haue store of Slaues, whom they onely employ in digging and deluing, beside other laborers, that bring or draw vpe the earth in Baskets, and others that carrie it to the Water in Panniers or Doffers. In the Water, bee it Riuer, Lake, Brooke, or Spring there are diuers other slaues, that stand vp about the Knees, washing the saide earth (as it is brought vnto them) in Siues or Seares, making vse of no more water then is needfull. And so dexteroously separating the Golde from the Earth, that as the earth (by little and little) glydeth away, so the Golde remaineth behinde in the Siue or Seare; then afterward, making (as it were) a second kind of separation, it is put into a Vessell by it selfe, and more earth brought to washing in like maner, and vsed accordingly. Heere is to be remembered, that they which wash the Metall in these Siues or Seares, are most commonly Women, who haue two men, standing ready to fil their siues, two others, which bring the Earth or Oare to them; two more for lading, and two for fetching, drawing it vp from the Diggers. So much shall suffice for the first manner of bringing Golde from the Mine.

There are also meanes, and in another manner, as also the place where the Golde is founde, is altogether different. Considering, that there are Riueres, wherein both sande and Graines of Golde are found; which for the more ease in recovering, if the Riuer bee small and little, the Indians labour to empie and draw it drie. Then taking the sande and Earth in the bottome, they wash it in such sort as hath been declared.

But if the Riuer or Spring bee such, as it cannot bee made drie: they change and turne the course some other waie, quite from his Naturall Bedde or Current. Which being done, they go to seeke for Gold in the very midst of the Channell, amongst the Pebbles and Flintes: and more profite returneth by this kinde of Fithing, then by washing the digged Earth, as I haue truly found by obseruation.

But howsoever the Metall of Golde is thus found out in Riueres, or in the Plaine Fieldes: yet it is helde for most certaine and infallible, that it was first bredde in the Sommetie and toppes of Hills or Mountaines; and the vehement showres and falles of Raine (when this Earth was baked and conuerted into Golde, by the radiant and splendant beames of the Sunne) by soft and flow flydings, carried it downe into neere adjoining Riueres and Brookes, which lye apt and readie to receiue whatsoever is sent downe by Torrents from the Mountaines; as also, into the vnder-eeuen groundes.

Therefore, there is no further question to be verged, but that Golde hath his Original in the superficies of the Earth, and breedeth in the most secret partes thereof. So that Mines are oftentimes made like vnto Cauernes and Grottes; whereof, and likewise of Mines in the Mountaines, wee doe now purpose to speake.

The Indians, doe vse another kinde of meanes for the finding of Golde, which is much more dangerous; and is also observed in those Countreies, which lie called the West Indians Iyes, it is likewise vsed in the Northern Regions, towards the higher Suecia, Outbia, and partes of the Finnia; all toying to the kingdome of Norway.

This manner of emptying Mines, is observed in those that are pendant, vnto Mines of the Mountaines. In which labour, diuers Engines are employed, and vaulted Tables vsed, to hinder the danger hourly to bee feared, because great perilles dooth ordinarily happen: For, some haue bene doted, in Vorking to vndermine the Rocke, to be on the suddaine murdered, with the fall of great Stones, breaking out of the hollewe riftes. Others, that climb and grapple along the sharpe steepe Rockes, with Doffers and Baskets fastened vnto their backs, seeking for the Oare of the Mines, to carrie it vnto the Water, by being altogether vnable to holde, their owne weight any longer, fall downe and are destroyed.

But, that this businesse might be put in execution, with much lesse danger, some haue inuented a verie great wheele, guided and directed (in some places) by Horffes: but for lacke of such help, men do therein employ their strength and industrie. By the meanes of this wheele, they let downe and mount vpe againe, the Deluers and Diggers in the Mine; and those also that carrie the Oare to washing. This VVheele serueth likewise, to conuey away the Water which the Diggers happen to light on, verie deepe in the Earth. Another great danger which I do obserue in this search, is the noysome exhalations yssuing out of the Mines, whereby many people haue been stifled, not being able to endure so grosse an Ayre. Many times also, rauiues and inuadations of water happeneth, suddenly breaking forth, by some ouerture of the fource or Spring, and ouertaketh or rather surmounteth them sooner, then they can haue respite for giuing warning to them alofte, for drawing of them vpe. And therefore, those as bee employed in this laborious paines & trouble, commonly are such as haue deuoted the Halter: or else, they oune Slaues, whose Liues are of lesse esteeme vnto them, then are some of their best Beasts.

Wee are further to knowe, that the Golde which is found in the Indies, is not so much charged with Mettals, as that which is hadde in Europe, Asia, or Africa: because it is farre more pure, and yeldeth not so much labour to the Purifier. For that Golde of the Indies, is fined or purified only by fire: but that elswhere (ouer and beside the fire) is beaten and re-beaten with the strokes of hammers; and then in the end, refined with strong Water. Also, rarely or sildome do they find any pure Gold in the Mine: but it is intermedled with Siluer, or some other Mettals.

As for the Golde in Graines, which is found in Rivers and perling Brookes, they vse (in some parts) to gather it with the helpe of Sheepes skinnies, that hadde the Vwool on them: but because it appeared to bee ouer-laborious, the vse of Quicke-siluer was deuised; whereby it is easily knowne among the land. From which manner of trying or finding Gold, the Fable of the Golden Fleece was inuented, which Iason and his Argonautes, sayled for to Pontus. And hauing attained so farre as the River Phasis, where the Country people found out and gathered their Golde, with such Vwooll skinnies: they deriued thence, many good Golden Arguments, and could tell store of Tales, at their returning home. But bee it how soeuer Iason and his followers Fleece, and got all the Golde from the Colchians, which they had gathered for many yeares together, with their sheep-skinnes: And then gaue it out in a mockery, that they had conquered and woonne the Fleece of Gold.

CHAP. XXXI.

Whence the diuersitie of Golde proceedeth: His Medicinable Vertues. Of visions and illusions that are mette withall in Mines. And of the deccite that is committed in the composition, which is called Aurum portabile.

Some do hold, that in the whole vniuersall Worlde, there is but one kinde of Gold only; and that (generally) wherefoeuer it is found, or whence soeuer it cometh: if it be well refined and purified without any commixtion, it is continuallie good Gold. Also, that that which is drawne out of the verie coldest Regions in the world, is as good as that of the verie hottest parts. And that of the East is no more excellent, then the other of the West. But when Finers, Gold-smiths, and Monnoyers, do attribute diuersitie of Names thereto, esteeming one kinde to bee of much greater price and value then another (as we may note for example; one is termed Ducate Golde, another Crown Gold, another Maille Golde, or Or de Maille, another Pistolet Gold, valewing xxi. Carraits, another eighteen, and so of others; some more, some lesse) Questionlesse, these Names and dignities, did receiue their birth and Original in diuers Countries, where Gold had bene adulterated and sophisticated by the vnfaithfulness of Workemen, and multiplied with other minglings of Metals, of much lesser value, and farre inferiour in puritie to the other. Vvhich multiplication, hath bene inuented, according vnto their will and humout, that laboured to augment our moderne Moneys. As for Ducates, Crownes, * Thillipins, * Angoles, and * Portugaleses, they were diuersly forged of pure and impure Gold, and the inuention hath not bene Moderne.

For wee finde, that from the time of the Romaines Greatnesse, the Commonwealth mon-wealth being not able to supply the expences of their warres: did sometimes diminish the prices of their moneys, for an ouer-plus gaine and aduantage. Likewise, they sophisticated their purest Siluer, enter-mingling it with an eyght part of Copper, onely because they wold encrease it.

Some (neuertheless) contrarie to the opinion of Antiquitie, and of many, verie skilfull in matter of Mettals, doe say the contrary, to wit; That the lasterme Golde is much better then the Northern; and better in one Country then in another. But as for my selfe, I holde the first Opinion, as being perswaded, that Nature neuer tooke delight, in making one Elementarie substance of gold, more fine or perfect then another. For, hee is so much the neater and purer in his qualitie, as the Elements are simple, whereof hee is framed or composed.

It is no shame then to vs, if we hold Golde in such excellent estimation, farre aboue all other Riches, and valew it in our iudgement, to bee more precious then all other Mettals whatsoever. For, Nature consulting with her selfe, to compose it of an equal quantitie, truly correspondent to the Symmetric and iust proportion of the Elements, yeldeth it readilie purified from the verie Original, according as the selfesame Elements were truly simple. And by Coniunction of those Elements, being in Vertue equall together, was engendered such a Delicate and perfect mixture of indissoluble Vnion, composing the Connexion so intirely and faithfully: that it formed an incorruptible Paste or substance, which is permanent vnto all Eternitie both in goodnesse and excellencie.

And this is the cause, why it cannot bee Conquered by the injuries of Antiquity, and that it will not containe in it selfe, neyther endure any exccrescence and superfluitie of fowle commixture. For, although it remaineth as buried in the VV ater, or in the Fire, for some long space of time: yet notwithstanding, it is neuer blemished, neyther receyueeth any other qualitie or defect, as I haue formerly sayde. This is the priuiledge, which is alone peculiar vnto Golde onely, aboue all other Mettals what-soener.

Now, albeit the Gracians haue spoken nothing of his properties and Medicinable vertues: yet the Arabians were not therein forgetfull, because they appointed in prepared Medicaments, to euacuate fullen and Melancholic Humors.

Item, to make an actual Cautere, especially in his Soueraigne qualitie, it must onlie be done with Golde: for the Wound which it maketh and Vlcerares, is much more the sooner healed, Golde held within the mouth, maketh the breath good and sweete. The Filidust of Golde, pounded or beaten smallest on a Marble stone, is verie good in such Medicines, as are given for the re-growing of Haire againe, after it hath been formerly lost: or for Ring wormes and Tetters, when it is so finally beaten, as it may be scarce discerned vnder the Thimble Naile: then putting it into the eyes, it is very foueraigne for clearing of the sight. It is drunke also, for a preseruatue against the accidents and dauntings of the heart.

Water, wherein an Ingot of Golde (made red hote in the Fire) hath bene some few times quenched: or, wanting an Ingot, a Ducate, Portugue, or some such other thick and great piece of gold: that Water, mingled with wine, helpeth the Quartaine Feauer, purgeth the Melancholy humor, diminisheth the puff vvp Spleene or Milte, and is also a singulare remedy against the Drophie.

Nor are those reports to be reputed as Fables, concerning euill Spiritres or Demons, which haue bin seene and heard in Mines: for this is the most idlest and dangerous thing, that hurteth and offendeth the poore Mettally Pioners. And manie times, they behold the rowling of great stones from the maine Rocks, their Engines suddenly broken all to peeces; their Ladders ouerthrowne, and the Cords (whereby they holde) broken in sunder; so that the parties fall beyond all recovery.

Others haue bin rapt and transported suddenly away, and neuer after cyther seene or heard of. These hurtful spirits, are thought also to do them infinit small seruices, as to them that draw vvp the Mine, and cleaue the great stones of the Rock, (which is thought sometimes impossible to

But verie soon after, except they be aduised and careful of themselves, a peece of the Rocke falls on thir heades, and then this ioy is converted into teares and sad complaints. And this happeneth more in the Indians, and amongst those Idolaterous people, then where any Christians are, or frequent.

An angry discontented spirit.

Aug. in lib. 9. de Civit. Dei.

Deceite committed by Quack-salers & Empericks.

Belonius reporteth, that when he was in Greece, at the Mountaine of Syderocap- sa, where the Mines are, that appertaine to the Turke: himselfe went to peepe in, at one of the spiracles or breathing holes of a Mine, which had formerlie beene, (but not for a long while) of great reuennue to his Maister, who was a Jew; but as then hee was constrained to forsake it, because it was haunted with a Mettallie Spirit. And because he had very often shewne himselfe, in the forme and likeness of a Goate, with faire and goodlie Hornes of Golde, they called that hole or Spiracle, Hyaris Cabron, which was at the top of a Village, named Pianis; in the same Mountaine, and neere to the Brook, termed Rotas. But this was such a discontented Deuill, as none might be suffered to labour there, neither in company, nor alone.

He affirmeth also, that in other Mines, there were diuers other mettallie Spirits, that would doe no harme to anie of the Workemen, but helpe them many waies in their labours. Munster, who had visited sundry Mines in Germanie, records the verie same. To yeelde a reason for these matters, I cannot: but referre it to such as are better scene in such things, then I am my selfe: yet Saint Augusline speaketh verie amply thereof, in his booke of the Cittie of God.

But before I end this Chapter, I would aduertise the well minded Reader, to beware of certaine gadding Empericks or Mountebanks, making profession of Physicke, who giue vnto sickly people a kinde of powder, or a certaine liquor to drinke, which enforceth the bodie for to purge so violently both vpper & downward, that verie many haue died thereby. Concerning mine owne iudgment heerein, I take it to be Antimonie, though they please to tearme it, Aurum Potabile. For, if it were Gold, it could not do any harm: for whatsoeuer proceedeth of Gold, cannot but be good, and free from hurt. But vnder the shadow of his Sacred vertue, such Conseruers haue taken occasion, to commit thereby verie great abuses. As there are some also, that Nursing young Children after their owne manner, doe let them champe double Ducats in their mouths: and then their slauer or spetle is to bee preferred: affirming it to be verie helpful to diuers diseases.

But because these are euident and apparent tromperies; I am of the minde, that it will not passe any long time vnperished.

This you see, what I haue Collected out of manie good Authors, both Ancient and Moderne; as also the iudgement of approued good Mettallers, concerning the true History of this so excellent & much affected Mettall: which although it looke sometimes verie pale, it only proceedeth thorough the enuie and desire, that euery man (Naturally) beareth vnto it.

CHAP. XXXII.

The Interpretation of those three severall Titles, Democratia, Aristocratia, & Monarchia, which are three diuers kinds of Gouvernement in a Commonwealth, to vnderstand which of them, is the best and most expedient.

Did purposely insert this Chapter, to declare the great error of manie in these our dayes, who be- holding feditious troubles to offend the authoritie of Soueraign Princes (without any cause or subiect) in too manie countries and parts of Christendome; would haue Common-weales formed, according to their petticular affections, some being Democratiques, others, Aristocratiques, and are all vnto Enemies vnto absolute Monarchy. Nowe, because these three three wordes are not easily vnderstood, except it be by such men as haue knowledge in the Greeke tongue; the courteous Reader shall finde my honest furtherance therein; albeit Monsieur du Verdier, Lord of Pauprinaz, hath written and related somewhat thereof, yet very succindly. But I will allege the reasons both of the one and other, to the end it may be knowne, which of these kindes of Common-wealth is the best, and likeliest to be of longest continuance.

Democratia, or popular estate and preheminance, is a Common-weale, where the free and poorest (being the greatest number) do ouer-rule and command all the rest. Aristocratia, is that which we may interpret in our language, to be the power of the most vertuous, and in Latine, Optimum Principatus: in regard, that they are reputed to be very good and vertuous, as commonly wee hold our best Gentlemen to be. This forme of government taketh place, when as few Noblemen are approued vertuous, either in learning or good manners; to sway the Soueraigntie of the wholebody, and minister Lawes to the rest of the people, as well in general, as in particular. Monarchia, is that awfull authority, when one alone hath the sole power ouer all the people, both Nobles and others, commanding absolutely.

This forme of government in any Common-weale, is called Royaltie. And me-thinks, now that I haue giuen yee the signification of these three Titles: it would not much vary from our purpose, to set downe which of them is the most profitable to the people, lole- rable, and of longest continuance. For many reasons and Arguments may be produced on either side, some whereof will seeme to be receivable: which neuertheless are not, and therefore I hold it fittest, to let them bee tried by open euidence.

First then, such as approue the estate of Democratia, or popularity, will allege vnto vs: that there haue been Democraties, of the very worthiest men in Athenes, and that by the Lawes of the very greatest Iurisconsults, Orateurs, and Atezans, there should not be any other Common-weales, where the faction of a few Lords among them, or the ialousie of one sole Monarch, should hinder the subiects in any great attempts. And, which is more, it appeareth, that the true note of a Common-wealth, should consist in a popular estate onely: for then, all the people enioy the publike good, each man partaking in common good fortunes, spoyle, wages, and conquests. As her- as a few Lords in Aristocratia, and one alone in Monarchy; convert the publike benefit to petticular interest. In briefe, if there be nothing more to bee desired, then that Magistrates should be obedient to the Lawes, and subiects to Magistrates: it appeareth also, that these may be best obserued in a popular estate, where there is nothing else but Law, who is the Lady and Mistresse of all. These are the principall points that can be alleged, to vphold popular authority, which carrieth a goodly luster in appearance; but indeed, all these reasons are nothing else in effect, but meer Spiders webs, soft, gentle and cunningly wouen, yet of no validity or strength at all.

To refute that which hath been said, of a popular estate, or Common-wealth, we will begin with the first Allegation: that therein hath been found more Law-makers, Orators, good captaines, and Handy-crafts men, then in any other. It is very certaine, that the cause of so many Law-makers in this estate, proceeded from the contrarietie of Lawes, one repugnant to another, which Magistrates suffered to liue in suspense, during the time as they exercised their Offices; neuer caring or respecting, whether they were beneficial or hurtfull, but onely that some memory might remaine of them, after the expiration of their authority. This was an ordinary custome in Rome, as may be noted, when the Consul Cassius proclaimed by the sound of a Trumpet, that all the Latines and Hernians, which had no Houles in Rome, should aduoe and get them gone. Virginia, his companion in rule, caused the contrary also to be published, to make the people capable of such a Law as he would promulgate, and to flish the Inhabitants (in the hart of the City) against the Strangers. By reason of these two contrarie Lawes, some were found, that studied how to glose and accord these differences, and they that medled most busily therein, were termed great Law makers. If (in this condition) such great Captains have bin found, it grew by no other occasion, but that in such popular estates, cuill VVaires were orderlie very frequent. Heecrof let Rome be a VVincle, where oftentimes the people were b-held in a heape on the one side, and the Nobility on another side, sometimes in three divisions. Or, if they had peace among themselves, then they were at Warre with their Neighbours. And indeed, through this continuall exercise of Armes, there were many good Caprains and Souldiours made; but with the dear expence of the Citizens blood and liues.

For Oratours, because any people that commonly are without Letters or learning, or any store of iudgement, doe affect such as praise them; he that can best please by those meanes, tickling the eare with finery wordes: shall be sure to be effectuated among such people, and eloquence is very dangerous, except it be well vfed. For the attaining of which degree, Oratours have ordinarily no other obiect, but contend in the Art of Rhetoricke, who shall speake smoothest. And it is no matter of materia, if excellent Orators bee found in popular estates: for there was a Demosthenes in Athens, and a Cicero in Rome. Moreover, to aske counsell of the people, as anciently it was done in popular Commonweales: were nothing else, but to request Wisedome from furious mad men, and it hath long past as a well knowne Prouerbe; Wise Men propound, and Fools give resolution. Moreover, we know very well, that in an assembly of people, nothing can be kept secret, which is a most pernicious thing. The difficulties ensuing, by contenting a multitude of people in one place, the disorder among croudes and throngs, the variety of voyces, and inconsistency of men of many minds; all these I passe over.

The people, of their owne Nature (saith Titus Livius) are insolent and effusive in all liberty and licence, when matters goe well with them; and as dejected or downe-pressed are they, upon the least losse: for vicious and impudent men, are advanced among them, but the honest and virtuous are thrust out by the cares. As for in-Iustice, the peoplesay, let no care be had thereof: provided, that profit may be deriued from iudgements, and sold to the fairest offer: that good meanes may be had, to ruinate, Rich, Noble, and honest men, hurrying them without any cause, but mere capital hatred to such good mindes; contrary to the many-headed humour and Nature. For this cause, the popular estate or Commonweale, is the house and refuge of all turbulent spirits, mutiners, seditions, and exiles: who give counsell, comfort and resistance to the siller fort, to make hauocke and spoile of the greater.

But yet there is a more capital plague, attending vpon those popular Commonweales. To wit: impunity of wicked persons, provided, that they bee Citizens, that is to say, petty Kinges. For in a popular estate of the Romaines, it was prohibited to all the Magistrates, on paine of death: to condemn a Citizen to natural or euill death, or to deprive him of his libertie or Bourgeship, or to whip him with Rods, were his offence neuer so foule. Yet we read, that Ferres was accused, arraigned, and conuined, to haue robbed, stolne, and committed an hundred thousand concussions, or publicke extortions, and false iudgements: neuertheless, by parting out of Rome, & leauing a good moiety of those thefts behind him; he was quitted. And yet Rutilius, Metellus, Coriolanus, the two Scipios, and Cicero, they could haue no better fauour then banishment. Ephesus also could banish the virtuous Hermocrates: Athens expelled iust Aristides: Themistocles died in exile; Alistades in Persia; Socrates was put to death; and Phocion, the most intire and virtuous man of his age, after he had bin chosen five and forty times chiefe Captain and Commander, neuer receiuing any blame or taxation: yet notwithstanding without admittance of any answer, he was condemned to death, with forty other famous men; onely because they were his friends. States & degrees were therof also, even as they did at Rome: for Marius durst boldly bring Sumpters laden with Money, to buy the voyces of the people; and Pompey did the like.

The concussions beside were an incredible matter, made in the face of iudgement, and before the eyes of all beholders.

Most conformable to this, was that of Statoles, and Democides, Athenians, who when they took possession of their Offices. Come on (quoth they) let vs now goe to the Harvest of Gold. If then such estates, degrees, and Iustice it selfe were so vnworthily sold, in two such great Commonweales, enriched with the spoyle of other people: what then may men iudge of the popular preheminance, where the poore are alwaies needy, wretched and indigent? Wee haue an example of the Megarenes, who hauing expelled their Prince Theagines, established such an irregular popular gouernment, that it was lawfull for the poore to liue in rich mens Houses, as Plato hath very well recorded.

Now we are to know, that if the Commonweales of the Romaines, Athenians, or others, hadde some time of flourishing: it was onely occasioned, by hauing in those tempestuous daies) a Senate, full of men of honour, as also of worthy and virtuous Capitaines, that kept the people from disordering themselves, and serued (indeed) as a bridle to them; As in Rome there a Mennius Agrippa, a Camillus, a Papirius Cursor, a Fabius Maximus, a Scipio, a Cato, a Scannius, and a Pompey. In Athens, there was a Senate of the Areopagites, and a Pericle (saith Thucydides) who was the true Monarch thereof, though in appearance it was merely popular. In briefe, the popular estate can haue no long subsisting; if there be not some especiall Wise-men, that haue an eye to the gouernment.

But some will obiect vnto me, and say: doe we not see the Lordes of Leagues and Confederacies, that they haue built vp a goodly popular estate, and continued in the gouernment thereof, more then three hundred and fiftie yeares? Are they not also (by these meanes) warranted not onely from tyranny, but likewise haue giuen chase to Tyrants, insluting on their Neighbors? To a double demand, we must needs returne a double answer. First, the Country it selfe, and naturall disposition of the people, is very conuenable for a popular estate. In the second place, they that are most quarrellous & mutinous, doe goe to the seruice of other strange Princes: the rest of the milde people, apt and easie to be ordered, they haue no great care how the State stands.

Moreover, all the Lordes of Leagues, and popular Commonweales, doe enter into confederation offensive and defensive, and are vntied strictly together: Not much unlike to such as walke in darke nights, or goe ouer slipperie places, where is danger of downe-falls, they hold one another fast by the hands, and in this manner they maintaine themselves, against the power of Monarchies, as the Athenians and Thebans did in those elder daies. Yet one thing more may not be forgotten, the foundation of their popular estate: was builded and cimented with the blood of Nobility, and of those that were the very richelt.

Our auncient Predecessours, for the better assurance of their estates, did strue to equalize all their Citizens in Goods, Honours, Power, and recompences, and if there were some one, more iust, more virtuous, and more wise then the rest: if he were not banished, he was vfed as badly, for all things possible was taken from him, even as it was a common practise in the Commonweale of Athens. It is an act of great in-Iustice, to take away the goods of a rich man (which he hath obtained by his care and industry) and make them equall to another, of no meritor worthy qualitie. It is also contrary to the Law of God, who hath exprefly commaunded, that the proprietie of mens goods, should be kept to themselves. It behooueth not then to say, that nature made all things in common: for the law of the Mother, can no way be contrary to the commaundement of the Father.

And as for the power of commaunding, wherein popular men would equal one another: there is much lesse appearance then in goods: for wisdome and prouidence is not giuen by an equall distribution, and therefore (on mere necessity) election must bee made in a popular estate, of the most sufficient Magistrates, for the better commaund and and deliury of Iustice. But who is he then, that perceiue not at first sight, that among men there are some, who haue lesse iudgement then brute beasts; yet others againe, who haue the diuine Character to clearely, that they appear rather to bee Angels, then Men? All which notwithstanding, they that seeke after equality; would haue authoritie giuen to furious, ignorant, and insensible Men, as well as to the wise, and best vnderstanding. For the voyce of such assemblies is not poyzed by weight, and euermore the number of Fooles, wicked and ignorants, is a thousand times greater then people of respect: therefore Salomon said truly, Hardly ye shall finde one among a thousand.

For conclusion, seeing it is not in the power of good Citizens and wise polititiques, to change the popular estate into Monarchie; the principall foundation of popular sway, consisteth in the strict obseruation of Edicts and Ordinances. For in as much as the popular estate is established, contrarie to the course and order of Nature, which bestoweth command and preheminence on the verie wisest: this appeareth incompatible to the vulgar people, who will not receive any command in a collective name, neither set good lawes and ordinances before their eyes, as bright Torches for their better direction; therefore such an estate must needs be quickly ouerthrowne. And this is the reason, why those Lordes of Leagues doe so strictly keepe Edicts and Ordinances: otherwise, their estate had long since beene sunke. Now, in regard that this Chapter seemeth ample enough, and (I hope) not weariesome to the Reader: the matter of Aristocratie and Monarchie, shall be handled (by themselves) in the following Chapter.

CHAP. XXXIII.

That Monarchie ought most especially to be preferred, before Democratie or Aristocratie.

BY naturall reason, that Seignurie or Dominion is cald Aristocraticall, where there be many Citizens, and the lesser part of them doe hold the estate: or more properly, where the best and worthiest people are onely received and aduanced. And yet it may be faide, that souerainetie ought to be giuen to the richest persons only, as to them that haue therein the greatest interest: considering also, that they beare much heavier charge then the poorer sort, who hauing nothing to loose, meere neede maketh them to forgoe authority. It appeareth then, that Aristocratie should be preferred before the popular estate, but not before Monarchie. And yet doubtlesse, they that doe well consider what Aristocratie is, will finde it full of maine incommodities. That it must needs be so, make some obseruation. In a great Common-wealth, ye shall haue many Lordes that wil command, and the more Lordes there be, the greater store of factions: among whom, deliberations being difficult to resolve on, they rather vanish away like smoake, then are seriously considered. For this cause is it, that Aristocraticall authorities haue bin much longer durable and assured, where there haue bin the fewer Lordes: As the Lacedemonians with thirty Lordes, and the Pharisiens with one and twentie, did long time maintaine their rule, but others not halfe the while.

It may be objected vnto me, that they which gouerne the Aristocraticall estate, must be proud, valiant, wise, and rich. I answer, that it is very hard to finde such men there, but at length they will be touched with ambition: and if there happen any to be conscientious, or religiously affected; as commonlie they are the fewest in number, so shall they they be sure to haue the lesse respect & partakers. In which regard, wicked and ambitious men gaining eminency; their conclusions passe for authentically, and they may the easier tyrannize ouer the people.

But to be brieue, it is daily seene, that the more heads there are in governing, the more disputes there will be, and lesse resolution. For this cause, and to shun the inconueniences of a great multitude, the Seignurie of Venice, consisteth in the managing of their State in a dozen persons, but more often in ten: especially, for the determining matters in secrecy, wherein lieth the soule and safety of any Estate.

Let vs put the case, that the private Council in Aristocratie should be so secret, that nothing could touch the ayre or wind: yet it will be a very difficult thing, for so few Lordes, to maintaine their estate against all the people, that haue no part at all in their honourable qualitie, considering, that euen the Lordes themselves doe continually despise popularitie, and the poorer sort also cary as contemprable hatred against great men. So that, thorough the meanest fedition of Lordes among them, (which is inescutible, if they bee people of martiall stomacke and disposition) the most ambitious and troublesome, will fall into the peoples mercy, and then comes the down-fall and ruine of Aristocratie. And this was the onely occasion that ouerthrew many Seignuries and Common-wealthes; as of Genneua, Sienna, Florence, Caloyne, Zuriche, Strafbourge, Liudaw: And the ancient Phoenices, Samiens, Cnydians, Mtylenians, and many other.

If an Aristocraticall Common-wealth haue warre against a Stranger, and doe come to the losse of a battell: the estate stands in danger, and as little assurance haue the Stangers also, fearing to be foyled by the other. To which dangers the popular estate is not so much subiect, each man hauing a part & interest in the State. Aristocraticall government then, is not onely in danger of Strangers as enemies: but also of the people, who must be contented, or restrained by power. To content them, without giuing them part in the estate is verie difficult: and impossible also to accept them in honorable charges and offices, without changing the estate of Aristocratie, into popular rule. To reframe them by might, is no matter of certainty, or ease when to be performed: because it were an open entrance into feare and distrust of them, that rather are to be won by benefits and countesse. For otherwise, the least warre of Strangers against the Seignurie, or of Lords among them; will make the people vindictive Armes, onely to throw off the yoke.

For this reason, the Venetians (to maintaine their State) haue appointed some small Offices on part of the people, contracting loue and alliance with them, & vice borrowings of them; to binde them the better for the States maintenance, yet wholly disarming them. And to the end, that they may be the more milde and pliable: they grant them freedom, and all kinds of pleasures, yielding sometimes the right of Bourgeships, to the richest Citizens. Also, if they haue War against a Stranger; they haue appointment therein, at what rate soeuer it be. But about all things else, they labour to quench partialities and hatreds among their Gentlemen, which procureth: that the rich beinge drunke with pleasures, and the poorer sort hauing neeces to Traffick, and exercise themselves in all Mechanicall Arts, with commodity of the Maritime partes, and naturall strength; they can haue no great occasion, but much lesse the power of rebellious among themselves.

These are the onely meanes, which (next vnto God) hath principally maintained their estate: and not the Nature of Aristocratie, as many haue imagined. And yet notwithstanding, within these foure hundred yeares, or there-about, they haue hardly out-stood many ciuill Warres and feditions, of the Bocchoniens, Falerians, Tepolians, Batiamontans, and cruell factions of the Iustinians, Scapoliacs, Selians, Bassianes; the murders of eighteen Dukes, and a great number of Senators, as may be read in their own Histories.

If the worthy men that gouerned this Common-wealth, were generous and martiall minded: they seized the State, as Cesar did at Rome, and as Sylla before him.

him. Or as Hannibal at Carthage, who moued Warre against the Romans, whereby he became the cause of ruinating the estate of his Country: in regard of the Barchian faction, which was quity contrary to him, and hindered, that men and succour should bee sent vnto him in Italy. We may perceiue then, that the principall foundation of Aristocratia, consisteth in the mutu-all amity of Lords: for if they agree and consent together, they will maintaine and gouerne much better then the people. But if there be any faction among them, there is no estate more difficult to be kept, for the reasons before specified; and namely if the Lords be Mar-tially, for men of war doe brooke nothing so badly, as peace.

It is no maruaile then, if the Aristocra-tia of the Venetians, Raguzians, and Lucians have continued some ages: considering, that they doe not addit themselves to armes, neither hold any thing in more recommendation, the Traffick, and vse of Mony. And, to speake all in one word, there is not any forme of Aris-tocratia more tightly or assured, then that which maketh choise of Lordes of reputation and vertue, or (at least) that are not infamous: especially when due care is had, of substituting another honest man, in the place of him that dieth, and by true election, as continuallie is done in Venice. Thus you see the commodities and discommodities of the Aristocratical estate: Let vs now speake somewhat concerning Monarchy, which all the best and chiefe men have commended before all other commonweals.

It may be objected vnto me, by such as approve Aristocratia or Democratia, that in Monarchia, when the death of the Monarch happeneth: new disignes doe thereon ensue, new Lawes, new Officers, new Friends, new Enemies, new Habits, and new forme of life. For Princes delight to please themselves, by changing and remouing (well-nere)
all things, to make speech of their own noueltes: which oftentimes causeth great discommodities, not onely to the Subjects in particular, but likewise to the whole bodie of the Commonwealth, holding the forme of Monarchy.

If things do not fall out in this manner, but that the Prince is the wisest that can be wished: yet the alliances & loues made with the Predecessor, do visually end in him. And such fauours and respects being finished, Princes doe thereon betake themselves to Armes; and then the strongest assayleth the weakest, or (at the least) will giue him Law. Which cannot so fall out in Estates Popular and Aristocratical, where perpetuall alliances are made, considering that the people dye not. This oc-casioneth, that those other Princes, and particulars, do continually affect rather to contract with a Seignour, then with one Prince, for the assurance of Treaties and Obligations, whereto the Successors of Princes stand not obliged.

Moreover, Monarchies that make their Kings by election, do oftentimes fall into ciuill Warres, by diuisions among such as aspire to the Crowne, which draw after them the ruine of the whole Estate many times: considering that euery in the right of succession, there is no meane perill, if there be di-uers in the same degree, who sometimes do murder one another, or make diuision among the Subjects, whereof too many examples are extant to our eyes; yea, it often falleth out, that the lawfull Successour is expelled, by him that hath no right at all. But admit we the case, that there is not any contention in Monarchia, yet if the Monarch be a Child: there will be denision for his gouernment, betwene his Mother and the Princes, or else among the Princes themselves. And if the Child haue a Tutor or Guardian, by ordinance of the Predecessor, or else by Custom: there is then some danger, least this Guardian should make himselfe Sole Commander, which is the most to be feared, if he marry with the Mother of his Pupill. And although (to auoyde this danger) the gouernment be giuen to the nearest, and the Childes Nurfing to his Mother: yet notwithstanding, there haue some Mothers bene found to be Murderers, and haue not onely made sale of the estate, but also of their Childrens liues. And sometimes the Tutor continueth in the gouernment, and leaueth nothing vnto the King but the bare Title: as the

the Duke of Northumberland did to the K. of England, Edm. 6. And as Apelles did to Philip King of Macedon, who could not enioy his owne outlarb, till hee had slain his Tutor. I know likewise, some one will tell mee, that many times it cometh to passe, when a young prince attaineth to the Crowne, he will not allow the gouernment of Maisters, that are placed nere him for instruction, but bee ruled by his owne fanly, being addicted to Playes, Masques, and such like. In brief many times his Court sheweth like a meer Burdell, falling into a thousand Vices, and the people following their Prince in imitation. If the Prince be a Soldier, he may expose his person and kingdom to many hazards. Admit that none of these afore said things doe happen, yet it hath bin obserued, that Princes being wife & well mannered, when they arise to the Monarchie, Soueraignty hath had this hard fortune, that the very wisest haue proued fooles, the most valiant turned coward, and the very best to be most bad:

If the Prince be subtle and wicked, he will establish tyranny; if cruel, he makes a butchery of the Commonwealt; if conuets, he will haue both the haire & the hide of his Subjects; if Prodigall, he will suck both the blood and Marrow, to glut some dozen of Horse leaches that attend about him. And if he be ignorant and sottish, then is tyranny so much the more to be feared, when as he hath neyther Maister nor Companion that dare make head against him. These are the dangers that attend on Monarchies.

But yet there is much more perill in the Estate Aristocratical, and a great deale more too, in the popular condition: for these dangers which wee haue proposed, castrkth for the most part, where the Monarchy is deuolued by successiue right. But seditions, partialities, and ci-uill wars are ordinary, and continually (as it were) arising in greatnesse, for the vi-der-handing of Offices in the common-weale Seignourall and Popular, then in the estate of Monarchy, which will endure no sedition for Offices, or for anie Estate, except after the Princes death, and but kildome then too. But the principall point of a Commonwealt, which is the right of Soueraignty, cannot bee, neither subist (to speake properly) but only in Monarchy: for none can be So-ueraigne in a Commonwealt, but one only. If there be two, three, or more, the one is no Soueraigne, because one can neither giue, or yet receive lawe of his companion. And although we may imagine a bodie of many Lords, or of appointed hie Soueraignty: yet it is, most certainly, that there is but any true subiect, or any support, if there be not one head with Soueraigne power, to whome one with another, which one simple Magistrate neuer can do, without Soue-raigne Preheminence and authority.

The difficulties are daily noted, which continually haue accompanied popular Commonweales and Seignuries, when both the one and other do hold contrary parts, and by diuers Magistrates. Some calling for peace, others war: One will haue this law, another a quite contrary.
One will haue this man to be chiefe, another another at his frind and pertaker, and the like in diuers other matters.

Moreover, in a Seignourall and Popular estate, the greater part are continually made to beleuee things, howbeit the wise and vertuous are alwayes the lesser number: by which means (diuers times)
the more sound and better sort of people, are constrained to stoope vnder the greater, to please the appetite of some seditious fellow, or seditious Orator-maker. But the Soueraigne Monarch, hee can alwayes keepe with the more healthfull spirited and meaner part, making choise of wise men, and such as vnderstand the State affaires: whereas quite contrary necessity compelleth the popular and Aristocratical estates, to entertain and embrace both fooles and Viscemen together.

When the Common-wealth of the Romains was in perill, they made a Soueraigne Magistrate, according to which dignitie, hee had no Appellation, but commanded Soueraignly, and they tearmed him Dictator. The Penetians created a Prouidore; the Lacedaemonians an Harmolite, & each of them did so, considering Monarchia to bee the most assured estate. Me thinks, that these reasons, and many other, which might bee drawne in particularly, are sufficient to shew, that amongst the three kindes of lawfull Common-wealths, the right of Monarchie is most excellent; and among them of Ryot and Disorder, the popular estate is the most vicious. Lawfull borne Monarchie, as a strong, and potent bodie, may easilie maintaine it selfe: but popular qualitie, and Dominion of a few people (as being very weak and feeble) are subject vnto many diseases; and must of necessity bee gouerned by dyet and prescriptions. Neuer were Arifocracies and Democratias sene to continue so long as Monarchies, which we finde (by writing) to haue endured a thousand or twelue hundred yeares, as those of the Persians, Assyrians, Medes, and others: but the Popular or Arifocraticall, three or foure hundred yeares only.

Therefore, it shall be needefulle to insist any longer, in approving Monarchie to be the most assured estate: considering, that a Family (which is the true Image of a Commonwealth) can indure to haue but one head only, as we haue approued. And all the Lawes of Nature are our guides to Monarchie; be it, that wee respect the little Worlde Man, who hath but one bodie, and but one Head, as chiefe of all the other Members: on whom, dependeth the will, motion, and vnderstanding. Or bee it, that we looke vpon the great world, which hath but one Soueraigne God. If we eleuate our eyes to Heauen, wee shall see there but one Sunne. If we descend to sociable Creatures, we may plainly perceiue, that they cannot suffer many kindes, or many Lordes, how good foucer they be.

This is the very same example, which Solyman, King of the Turkes, vsed in Anno Dom. 552. hauing heard the lowd acclamations and shouts of ioy, which the whole Armie made for the Sultane Mustapha his Son, at his returning from Persia. Commanding him to bee strangled in his Chamber of preface. When he was dead, he threw his bodie forth before the whole army, and cried out aloud, There is no more but one God in heauen, and one Sultan on Earth. Two dayes after, he did put to death Sultan Gebusi, because hee wept for his Brother, and Sultane Mehemet the third, because hee fled away for feare, and would leaue no more but one only to shun the inconveniences ensuing by many Lordes and Commanders. Euen so we haue beheld all the people vpon Earth, from the sun-their date of Antiquity, and when they were guided by one light only: to like nor allow of any other forme of Commonwealth, but absolute Monarchy.

An example derived from Antiquity.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of the Vertues & secret properties of the Nut-megge: That it was unknowne to our ancient predecessors, with diuers obseruations, worthy due regarding.

HERE are manie things, which becoming ordinarily worn or carried about a man, do impair & grow vnto lesse estimation: as some precious stones, which though they are of a hard and solide matter: yet notwithstanding they waxe old, and loose much of their valew.

Cinnamon, Cloues, and Pepper, borne about vs, do drie of themselves, and loose their sweet savour. Contrarywise, the Nut megge (on whose behalfe I haue written this Chapter, termed by the Latines, Nux mixtifica) being worn or carried about a man, doth encrease it selfe, and becommeth much the better. I found this rare effect of Nature, in the lower Germanie, where the Inhabitants of those Countreys, doth vsuallic hang Nutmegs about their Childrens necks, and beeing so worn five or six yeares together: they were then much more Oily and moyst, then they were the first yeare. After I had considered on diuers reasons inducing to this purpose, I could finde but one especially which I will declare: submitting my selfe neuertheless, to any other, that can alledge a better, and more profitable.

Nutmegges (doublelesse) beeing long time kepte in Spiceries, bee it in places dry or moist, and well packt vp together, do yet dry of themselves, become rustie, full of holes, and of bad tast, euen like to worne-eaten and rotten wood. Neuertheless, a young man bearing a nutmeg about about him, & exposed to the open aire; doth encrease and make it much the better thereby.

Now, to comprehend whence this proceedeth, we must vnderstande, that this is not proper to all Nutmegs, worn by all men indifferently: but it is to bee considered, of such as is about an infant or elder Child, a youth, or anie other young man, not hauing attained to the age of fortie yeares, as commonlie the Belgians are, and those of the nether Germany, beeing of verie good habitude, euen as vulgarly they are. This is easilie knowne, by the goodlie proportion of their bodies, the chearefull countenance and complexion of their faces, and firm fleshtiness of their limbes, by their Ordinarie appetite to feeding, strong digestion, and being liuely disposed in all their ioynts and members; alwayes trauielling courageously, rarely troubled with sicknesse or diseases, shunning and auoyding the riotous excesse, and lawfull desire of gourmandizing, whereof they are verie carefull, mingling wholesome Spices continually amongst their meats, and scarcely anie one of them, but wearing some about them, especiallie Nutmegs.

The younger sort do weare them about their Neckes, because they hold opinion: that they make stay of the Rheume which falleth downe on the stomacke, and is a griefe ensuing by ouermuch eating and drinking; suffocating thereby, the Naturall heate. And because such Nutmegs as are worn about the necke, for the space of foure, five, or six yeares, (some more, some lesse) do neither wast or consume, but appeare to bee more weighty and Oily: it seemeth to proceed by this commendable temperance, from whence it exaleth a vapour somewhat delicate and humecting, wherewith the Nutmegs (which they weare) are plenteously stored, which causeth that their Oily nature, cannot by no means become dry, but rather is much the more encreased.

Nor is this to bee accounted any way straunge, because we finde in Learned mens writings, that from the bodies of diuers persones, haue vsued very sweet and odoriferous sweats. Among whom we read of Alexander the Great, whose Garments receyued a wonderful sweetnesse (as one recordeth) from his verie bodie, and so continued in them most pleasingly, without any other Arte or cunning. I my selfe sawe an Indian at Nantes, who though he was stark naked, and his bodie seeming of a wilde Olie colour: yet, when mens hands were sweate thereon, they brought thence a sweeter fauour, very answerable vnto Ciuit.

As for Maides and young Women, such matter is not acknowledged of them: and therefore I thinke, that the hinderance proceedeth from this, that Naturall heate is more imbecille, and of lesse power in them, then it is in men; and their exhalation is nothing so temperat, and in regard also, that they are fuller of Excrements, as hath beene declared in the precedent Chapter. But if wee shall speake of aged people, they do resemble trees ouer spent with yeares, full of Putrifaction humors: which maketh them white-headed, wrinkled, and full of defects, hauing no more strength to grow or encrease, whereby to produce matter of anie worth. Otherwise, they are so drie, that no exhalation at all commeth from their bodies; for age is nothing els but a meere exiccation of the Radical humour, and an extinction of the Naturall heate. Whereby may appeare, that they can no way better a Nutmeg by their exhalation. The Reader may content himselfe (if he please) with this reason, which many learned men haue approued, as well as my selfe. It shall now not be much amis, to discourse a little further of the Nut-megge, concerning the manner of his growth, in what Countreys; and likewise of the faculties thereof.

That Nutmegges were vnknewne to our reuerend Antients, is verie easie to be comprehended: because, neither Theophrastus, Histories, nor Galen, did euer make any mention of them. And it serueth to no purpose, to alledge, that they haue spoken of Mace: for, I say, that the Mace of the Greeks, was not the Mace of the Arabes, which is a hide or skinn that doth couer the Nutmegge. And it is verie likelie, that if they had hadde anie knowledge of the Maces, questionlesse they would haue lesse something written thereof. Neyther could wee attaine vnto anie

The outward Rinde of the Nutmegge.

The first appearing of the Maces, & alteration of their colour afterward.

In what places the Nutmegge Trees doe usually most grow.

The choyce of Nutmegs.

The Tree which beareth these Nutmegges, and the Maces is as great as a Pearre tree, hauing the like Leaues, but shorter and rounder. It carryeth his Nutlike fruite, couered with a very hard rinde: which (when the ripening season is come) cleaueth or openeth of it selfe; and sheweth the filme or skinner that encloseth the Nutmegge, like a scale or shell; and that is it which wee call the Maces or Mace. I meane not the exteriour or outward rinde, albeit (in diuers parts) they vse to Confect it with Sugar, and is much commended in the Countrey where it groweth; that the smell & taste thereof, is verie wholesome against the paine of the Collicke, and the dis-ease of the Reines.

The fruite being ripe, and the sayde rinde exteriour opening (like to the shel or scale that encloseth the Chestnuts of Lymosine) the Mace appeareth as red as Scarlet, wonderfull goodly to beholde, especially, when the Trees are wel charged and laden, and beare more then is their vsuall custome. The Nutmeg drying, the Mace still keepeth close and fast about it, till loosing his red colour, hee begetteth another, which is like a Golden Complexion: And these Maces are folde at three times dearer rate, then the Nutmegges.

This Tree that beareth these Nuttes, groweth in one of the Islands of the Molucces, which is called Bandano. It is found also in diuers other places, as in Banda, Bandornica, Herma, Tharod, Macchedad, Lyzamath, Cares, and in Zeylan, which are the most fruitful Landes, and better then anie other. The people of the Countrey doe vse to gather them, some more in one place, then in another, according as they can get them: for, in the most parts of all the Islands, all things are in common, without any priuate claime. This is affirmed by Gariet d'horta, who traiailed himself into those parts.

They that be fresh, and not drie, withered or worne eaten, are the best nutmegs; likewise, they that were waightie, maisie, oyle, & abounding in moisture: so that by pricking them with a pinne or Needle, they send forth a sweete sauour. Nutmegges (according to the Arabians opinion) are hot and drie, in the second degree compleat: they are astringent, & (by champing in the mouth) doe make the breath sweet: they take awaie spots and blemishes out of the face, sharpen the sight, and strengthen the Liver and stomacke: they diminish the Spleene or Milt, prouoke Vrine, stay the courie and Flux of the Belly, expelling all Windicoffe, and helpe greatly against the Disease of the Mother, proceeding of Frigiditie. In briefe, they haue the very same Vertues and properties, as the Cloaues haue. Nutmegs do yeilde a liquor or iuice, being freshly pounded, heated in a pan, and presently pressed: which iuice being let stand till it be cold, becommeth like virgin wax, and senteth very sweetly. This vnguent is very soveraigne for cold Gowts, and to make a man gracious in the fauor of Ladies. Thus much haue I gathered concerning the Nutmeg.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

A Paradox purposely written in the defence of Warre, approving and maintaining it to be much more famous, honorable, & meritorious of commendation, then Peace.

Ecause many sufficient men haue (heeretofore) verie plentifully discoursed on the praises of peace among which, wee haue Erasmus Roterdamus, Romulus Amasius, Claudius Ptolemeus, and Adriano Bentiuoli; all of them (with others of no lesse elegancy) hauing spoken foundlie, and to the purpose, as being Orators of no lesse learning, then fluent and eloquent in the tongues: the two first in Latine, and the other in the Tuscan language, all hauing discretely employed their paines: yet notwithstanding, altho their defences bestowed on the behalfe of Peace, I cannot forbear to maintain the contrarie, and

and will approue with resolute courage, that they haue done mightie iniurie vnto themselves, in making such description of commendations, by multiplicitie of ydle arguments, which now I will not trouble my selfe withall, either to impropose or confute. But so many onely will I produce and aduertise yee of, as shall happen to my memorie, in fauour of honourable combustion & war, and appeare to the manifest discredite of Peace.

For the first of my reasons, I say that in the time of Peace, Militarie Discipline is lost, and commeth to nothing: which (neuertheless) hath bene at all times reckoning, and allowed as a matter most necessarie, for Conquest, enlarging and conseruing of Empires, Provinces, and the venge greatest and ciuilest Iurisdiccions throughout the world.

Witnesses heereof, are * Marathon Salaminus, * Thermopye, * Plataea, * Leuce, & many other places, not meanelly renowned by the Heroicall Actions of Armes. By the means of warre, Horatius Cocles was made immortall; and the three Deij helde for three Demie Goddes. Hence arose the great & infinite praises (so sweetly sung and Celebrated by Poets, and our ancient Historians of both the Cypriotes and honourable Marcellus. To whome, I would gladly see who can be iustly compared, vnder Correction of whatsoever hath bene said by fore-named Authours, in honour of their Gowne-men, the onelic especiall louers and fauourers of peace.

We see also by experience, that (well-neere) all ancient Statues or Figures, both were and are formed in military habits, And it was not lawfull (by the customes of all elder and noble Nations) for a Citizen to weare any other Garment, then a party coloured coate: vntill hee had laine, or (at least) vanquished two of his Countreyes enemies. In this case, the Carthaginians had a most notable obseruation; for, looke how manie times a Soldier had bene seene in the face of the enemy: so many Plumes, helmets, or Horles, should bee bestowed vpon each feuerall man: but contrary-wise, as often as they were absent from the field, so manie Larbes and Capons wer sent them, as remembrances of their cravenly cowardise. Liſe wife by publick agreement, it was not lawfull for any mā to marry, except hee had first serued in sundry foughten battailes, or performed some one or other honourable exploit, in the defence of his Countrey.

Let vs consider the great honor which Warre maintaineth euen to this verie instant, to such as either haue or do beare Armes for safety and defence of our holy Christian faith. In memorie whereof, Noble and famous Orders of Knights of Ierusalem, of Malta, of Saint Iames, of Holie Lazarus, of Iesus Christ in Portugall, of the Round Table, and of the Garter in England, with diuers other Dignities, for Religious warfare, onely for the performance of meruitious and excellent Actions. Vnder these contrary-wise, the mindes that were thus fitted to haughty achievements, in the fleshfull times of peace, would too easily (euen of themselves) be conuerted to proud and insolent attempts.

To proue this true, that they which in the times of Warre, doe accomplish deeds of Vertue, and in the dull daies of peace, fall into quite contrary behaviours, we may perceiue by great Marines, the Conqueror of the Cymrians. When warre did set an edge vpon his true temper, he had not his equal for valour and rowesse: but, in the trifling times of peace, he was the most wicked and dangerous man in all the Countrey. In like manner, wee shall finde it for most certaine, that Peace quencheth whatsoever is good in anie man; and quickneth or giueth life vnto all such things, as are in him most hurtfull and damnable.

Let mee moue a question (in meere Courtse) vnto such as are the greatest blamers and deprauers of warre. What can they call Hatreds, Quarrelles, and Seditious, but the onelic true and perfect Instrumēt, whereby Nature oftentimes helpeth to performe manie verie lawdable actions? Ye may imagine, that it was not without very great reason, that VVarre (by the Latines) was called bellum, Fayre, Pleasunt, and Commodious: for such indeede is the true Nature thereof, albeit our new vplust gaine-layers dooth affirme, that Concerning Hatreds, Quarrels and Seditions.

The name giuen to warre by the Latines

it is meant in a contrarie fence. But if it were lawfull, to compare the losses in peace, with them that ensue onely by warre: the report would be pittifull, and the remembrance verie Tragicall.

How many goodly Armies haue bin broken, defeated and destroyed, by the meanes (I will not say of peace) of truce onely? Which, though it bee Vvares neereft Kinsman, yet it is sworne enemy vnto all Vertue and Valor. The strength and powers of Truce, ministers the meanes (euen as Peace doth) to lessen and impair Cities, Townes, and whole Prouinces, by straitne Lawes and Ordinances: beside, it engendereth infinit secret hatreds, and vpholdeth Princes in roughnesse and feueritie against their Subjects. In time of peace, the dispositions of men, which (but for it) would be highly exalted with enflamed desire to expresse their brauerie and roialty, do become sleepe, drowsie, pensue, slothfull, lasciuious, and effeminate.

But to prouoe that Warre hath bin fauoured and esteemed by our Lorde God himselfe, tell mee (I pray yee) he is not called by the Children of Israel, The Great God of Battails, The Lorde of Hostes and Armies? Look in the Olde Testament, how manie mightie ouerthrowes and slaughters were executed in his Name, vppon them that were the Aduersaries of his people? Howe manie were slaine by Moses, Iosuah, Gedon, Sampson, and diuers other? Howe manie slew Abraham, Dauid, Iudas Machabees, and they that wer in those times? What shall we say of Saint Michaell the Arch-Angell; who (euen in Heaven it selfe) made such a sharpe Conflit against the Draggons? And, to continue on this discourse, euen to the New Law, if GOD had beene displeased with Vvare, would hee haue commanded his Apostles to sel their cloaks, and buy each of them a Sword? If Saint John Baptist, had hated Soldiers, or Militarie Discipline, would he haue appointed them this Law and Ordinance (when they demanded of him, what way they should take, whereby to attaine to the saluation of their foules) That they should content themselves with their Vvages, and not rob or pille from the poore people. Hee would then rather haue commanded them, to leaue that estate, and betake them vnto some Hermitage; or else, to deale in some assayres of Merchandize, or in some such like employments. No, content your selues (quoth hee) in your Garrisons, with your ordinarie pay, and offer no shame, violence, or extortion, to any one. For your calling (which is the Art Militarie) will not let or hinder yee from your saluation: because manie of your profession, haue thereby wonne their safest security.

This in briefe, and in my conceipt, is that which blessed Saint Johns words intended, if I bee no bad Paraphrastor Interpreter. If hee had beene willing to discommend Warre, yet he wold haue forborne it: perceiving what pride and insolence was crept into rich mens minds, during the pampering daies of peace and no way so soone to be cured or corrected, as by the worthy discipline obserued in warre.

How many haue beene observed, of great Gentlemen, Merchants, Countrey-men, and other of all conditions, who were wont to be most proud and arrogant: suddenly to become kind and tractable, onely by meanes of the bridle of Warre? This is it, which deliuereth vs from a number of milbaps by theenes ydle Vagabonds, Gamblers, Pipers, Players, young Rogues, Cozeners, Ruffians, and High-way watchers. It serueth to whet and waken the spirits of Men, making their bodies to become more strong, light, nimble, patient; yea, and emboldened against all hard and sinister fortunes.

Consider the sweetnesse and delight which the Cymbrians founde in Vvare, vsing it as the Conseruation of their Countrey: and when they went to fight, they woulde sing as chearefullie, as if they had beene going vnto a wedding. Imagine what pleasure was taken therein by furious Hanniball, Valiant Morcellus, Vertuous epio, Courageous Camillus, and that Victorious Alexander.

If say moreover, whofoeuer is ignorant in taking good order for publike assayres, there is no place or Schoole, wherein hee may more easily attaine thereto; then by noting the preparation and conducting of an Armie. Besides, whofoeuer knoweth not the deceptives, sleights, and trickes of ingenious prudence,

Which therefore shall serue me to conclude withall, maintaining still that war is to be preferred before peace, as deeply beloued, and with choicest praises commended. Beside, our Prayers should continually bee made to God, to create such chearfull hearts in our Princes, that wee may not any long time, remaine in want, of such a precious and vnnuable Iewell.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Indian Beare: And of those Beares in our owne Native Countreyes, howe different they are in their severall Natures.

All kinds of Creatures haue their contraries appointed, to appeare their hurtfullnesse.

Nature hath verie many times expresse hit care and prouidence (as a dutifull handmaid attending on God) where there are any store of hurtfull creatures in some country, that may inpeach the inhabiting of men, or Lienes of other beasts and animals, to engender some other of contrary kinds, to destroy the ouer-abounding of such harmefull things. As we may obserue in Serpents, which do deuore vp Toads & Lizards: Serpents also themselves, are eaten by Storks, and many times they themselves do feede one vpon another: Cats also do deuoure Rats, and so in diuers more beside. I speake this the rather, because we finde recorded in the generall hitorie of the Indians, that in Quilas, a certaine Countrey of the New-world, there are such extraordinary fwarmes of Antes, that they consume the feeds and rootes of all Trees and plants. So that, if there were no Beares (which Nature in effecti- all fauour hath there appointed; and in great plentie) ther could not be any possibility of dwelling there, because they would make the Countrey to bee quite barren.

The Beare of this Region, liueth only (without anie other foode or Pastorage) by eating those Antes, whose beddes and Nests hee chiefly findeth, and so with his tongue (which is verie broad and large) hee is so quicke and readie in licking of them vp, that hee is onely nourished by them. There are also great store of those Beares, but they are not fierce, wild and harmefull, as those in other partes: for they will not set vpon men, neither mount vppon Trees, to deuoure the young sprouts and fruites, but are verie easily made tame and tractable by the Indians.

There is no need of plucking out their eyes, or boaring their lippes, to thrust Rings of Iron thorough them, onely to tame them. For euen of themselves, they are (well-neere) Domestically: and, if it were not for these Beares, neither men, and great store of other creatures, could not liue there: but they encrease in those partes so abundantly, that they suffice to destroy the plentie of Antes; in which respect, the Countrey may well account it selfe to be most happy.

I haue not well bene informed, whether it bee the Nature of the Beares in this Countrey, that (according as hath bene reported) the three Beare yeildeth or whelpeth a Male of Fleish, without anie forme or apparance of life: and that the Damme, onely by the Vertue of licking, giueth it true shape.

Of this opinion, were manie Learned and graue men, as Aristotle, Plutarke, Plinie, Ellanus, and Dn Barlaam: but it is a manifest error, as experience hath plainly declared vnto vs, because in manie enclosed places of Germanie, and of France also, Beares of both sexes

A description of the Nutmegge and Mace Tree.

The outward Rinde of the Nutmegge.

The first appearing of the Maces, & alteration of their colour afterward.

In what places the Nutmegge Trees doe usually grow.

The choyce of Nutmegs.

The Tree which beareth these Nutmegges, and the Maces is as great as a Pearre tree, hauing the like Leaues, but shorter and rounder. It carryeth his Nutlike fruite, couered with a very hard rinde: which (when the ripening season is come) cleaueth or openeth of it selfe; and sheweth the firme or skinner, that enclōseth the Nutmegge, like a scale or shell; and that is it which wee call the Maces or Mace. I meane not the exteriour or outward rinde, albeit (in diuers parts) they vse to Confect it with Sugar, and is much commended in the Countrey where it groweth, that the smell & taste thereof, is verie wholesome against the paine of the Collicke, and the dis ease of the Reines.

The fruite being ripe, and the sayde rinde exteriour opening (like to the shell or scale that enclōseth the Chestnuts of Lymagne) the Mace appeareth as red as Scarlet, wonderfull goodly to beholde, especially, when the Trees are wel charged and laden, and beate more then is their vsuall custome. The Nutmeg drying, the Mace still keepeth close and fast about it, till loosing his red colour, hee begetteth another, which is like a Golden Complexion: And these Maces are solde at three times dearer rate, then the Nutmegges.

This Tree that beareth these Nuttes, groweth in one of the Islands of the Molucces, which is called Randano. It is found also in diuers other places, as in Banda, Bandornica, Herma, Tharod, Machedad, Lycamath, Cares, and in Zeylan, which are the most fruitful Landes, and better then anie other. The people of the Countrey doe vse to gather them, some more in one place, then in another, according as they can get them: for, in the most parts of all the Islands, all things are in common, without any priuate claime. This is affirmed by Gariel d'Uorta, who trauielled himself into those parts.

They that be fresh, and not drie, withered or worme eaten, are the best nutmegs; likewise, they that were waighte, malise, oyle, & abounding in moisture: so that by pricking them with a pinne or Needle, they send forth a sweete fauour. Nutmegges (according to the Arabians opinion) are hot and drie, in the second degree compleat: they are astringent, & (by champing in the mouth) doe make the breath sweet: they take awaie spottes and blemishes out of the face, sharpen the sight, and strengthen the Liver and stomacke: they diminish the Spleene or Milt, prouoke Vrine, stay the course and Flux of the Belly, expelling all Windnesse, and helpe greatly against the Disease of the Mother, proceeding of Frigiditie. In briefe, they haue the very same Vertues and properties, as the Clooues haue. Nutmegs doe yeilde a liquor or iuice, being freshly pounded, heated in a pan, and presently pressed: which iuice being let stand till it be cold, becommeth like virgin wax, and fenteth very sweetly. This vnguent is very soueraigne for cold Gowts, and to make a man gracious in the fauor of Ladies. Thus much haue I gathered concerning the Nutmeg.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

A Paradox purposely written in the defence of Warre, approving and maintaining it to be much more famous, honorable, & meritorious of commendation, then Peace.

Ecause many sufficient men haue (heeretofore) verie plentifully discoursed on the praises of peace among which, wee haue Erasmus Roterdamus, Romulus Amasius, Claudius Ptolomeus, and Adriano Bentiuoli; all of them (with others of no lesse elegance) hauing spoken foundlie, and to the purpose, as being Orators of no lesse learning, then fluent and eloquent in the tongues: the two first in Latine, and the other in the Tuscan language, all hauing discretely employed their paines: yet notwithstanding, al their defences bestowed on the behalfe of Peace, I cannot forbear to maintaine the contrarie, and

and will approue with resolu'd courage, that they haue done mightie iniurie vnto themselves, in making such description of commendations, by multiplicitie of ydle arguments, which now I will not trouble my selfe withall, either to impropoe or confute. But so many one will I produce and aduertise yee of, as shall happen to my memorie, in fauour of honourable combustion & war, and appeare to the manifest discredite of Peace.

For the first of my reasons, I say that in the time of Peace, Militarie Discipline is lost, and commeth to nothing: which (neuertheless) hath bene at all times in reckoning, and allowed as a matter most necessarie, for Conquest, enlarging and consuetudine of Empires, Prouinces, and the verie greatest and chieffest iurisdiccions throughout the world.

Witnesses heereof, are * Marathon Salaminus, * Thermopila, * Plataea, * Leucaea, and many other places, not meanelly renowned by the Heroicall Actions of Armes. By the means of warre, Horatius Cocles was made immortal; and the three Decei helde for three Demie Goddesses. Hence arose the great & infinite praises (so sweetly sung and Celebrated by Poets, and our ancient Historians) of both the Achilles and honourable Arcellus. To whome, I would gladielie see who can be iustly compared, vnder Correction of whatsoever hath bene said by fore-named Authours, in honour of their Gowne-men, the onelie especiall louers and fauourers of peace.

We see also by experience, that (well-neere) all auncient Statues or Figures, both were and are formed in military habits. And it was not lawfull (by the customes of all elder and noble Nations) for a Citizen to weare any other Garment, then a party coloured coate: vntill hee had slaine, or (at least) vanquish't two of his Countreyes enemies. In this case, the Carthaginians had a most notable obseruation; for, looke how manie times a Soldier had bene scene in the face of the enemy: so many Plumes, helmets, or Horsles, should bee bestowed vpon each feuerall man: but contrary-wise, as often as they were absent from the field, so manie Larbes and Capons were sent them, as remembrances of their cravenly cowardise. Likewise by publick agreement, it was not lawfull for any mā to marry, except hee had first serued in sundry foughten battailes, or performed some one or other honourable exploit, in the defence of his Countrey.

Let vs consider the great honor which Warre maintaineth euen to this verie instant, to such as either haue or do beare Armes for safety and defence of our holly Christian faith. In memorie whereof, Noble and famous Orders of Knighthood were aunciently established. As Knights of Ierusalem, of hodes, of Malta, of Saint Iames, of Holie Lazarus, of Iesus Christ in Portugall, of the Round Table, and of the Garter in England, with diuers other Dignities for Religious warfare, onely for the performance of meruailous and excellent Actions. Vnder contrary-wise, the mindes that were thus fired to haughty achievements, in the sloathfull times of peace, would too easily (euen of themselves) be conuerted to proud and insolent attempts.

To proue this true, that they which in the times of Warre, doe accomplish deeds of Vertue, and in the dull daies of peace fall into quite contrary behauiours, we may perceiue by great Astir, the Conqueror of the Cymbrians, when warre did set an edge vpon his true temper, he had not his equall for valour and prowesse: but, in the trifling times of peace, he was the most wicked and dangerous man in all the Countrey. In like manner, wee shall finde it for most certaine, that Peace queneth whatsoever is good in anie man; and quickneth or giueeth life vnto all such things, as are in him most hurtfull and damnable.

Let mee moue a question (in meere Courties) vnto such as are the greatest blamers and deprauers of warre. What can they call Hatreds, Quarrells, and Seditious, but the onelie true and perfect Instruments, whereby Nature ofentimes helpeth to performe manie verie lawdable actions? Ye may imagine, that it was not without very great reason, that VVarre (by the Latines) was called bellum, Fyre, Measurment, and Commodious: for such indeede is the true Nature thereof, albeit our newpittard gaine-sayers dooth affirme, that it is meant in a contrarie fence. But if it were lawfull, to compare the losses in peace, with them that ensue onely by warre: the report would be pittifull, and the remembrance verie Tragical.

How many goodly Armies haue bin broken, defeated and destroyed, by the meanes (I will not say of peace) of truce onely? Which, though it bee VArres neereft Kinsman, yet it is sworne enemy vnto all Vertue and Valor. The strength and powers of Truce, ministers the meanes (euen as Peace doth) to lessen and impair Cities, Townes, and whole Provinces, by straunge Lawes and Ordinances: beside, it engendereth infinit secret hatreds, and vpholdeth Princes in roughnesse and feueritie against theyr Subjects. In time of peace, the dispositions of men, which (but for it) would be highly exalted with enflamed desire to expresse their brauerie and roialty do become sleepe, drowsie, pensue, slothfull, lasciuious, and effeminate.

But to proue that VArre hath bin fauoured and esteemed by our Lord God himselfe, tell mee (I pray wee) hee is not called by the Children of Israel, The Great God of Battails, The Lord of Hostes and Armies? Lookie in the Olde Testament, how manie mightie ouerthrowes and slaughters were executed in his Name, vppon them that were the Aduersaries of his people? Howe manie were slaine by Moses, Joshua, Gedeon, Sampson, and diuers other? Howe manie slew Abraham, David, Iudas Machabees, and they that wer in those times? What shall we say of Saint Atchael the Arch-Angell; who (euen in Heaven it selfe) made ticha sharpe Conflist against the Dragon? And, to continue on this discourse, euen to the New Law, if GOD had bene displeased with VArre, would hee haue commanded his Apostles to sel their cloaks, and buy each of them a Sword? If Saint John Baptist, had hated Soldiers, or Militarie Discipline, would hee haue appointed them this Law and Ordinance (when they demaunded of him, what way they should take, whereby to attaine to the conquest of their foules) That they should content themselves with their Wages, and not rob or pille from the poore people. Hee woulde then rather haue commanded them, to leaue that estate, and betake them vnto some Hermitage; or else, to deale in some assayes of Merchandize, or in some such like employments. No, content your selues (quoth hee) in your Garrisons, with your ordinarie pay, and offer no shame, violence, or extortion, to any one. For your calling (which is the Art Militarie) will not let or hinder ye from your saluation: because manie of your profession, haue thereby wonne their safest security.

This in briefe, and in my conceipt, is that which blessed Saint Iohns words intended, if I bee no bad Paraphrast or Interpreter. If hee had bene willing to discommend VArre, yet he wold haue forborne it: perceyuing what pride and insolence was crept into rich mens mindes, during the pamping daies of peace and no way so loone to be cured or corrected, as by the worthy discipline obserued in warre.

How many haue bene obserued, of great Gentlemen, Merchants, Countrey-men, and of all conditions, who were woot to bee most proud and arrogant: suddenly to become kind and tractable, onely by meanes of the bridle of VArre? This is it, which deliuereth vs from a number of millaps by theenes ydle Vagabonds, Gamblers, Pipers, Players, young Rogues, Cozeners, Rustians, and High-way watchers. It serueth to whet and waken the spiites of Men, making their bodies to become more strong, light, nimble, patient; yea, and emboldened against all hard and sinister fortunes.

Consider the sweetnesse and delight which the Cymbrians founde in VArre, vsing it as the Conseruation of theyr Countrey: and when they went to fight, they woulde sing as chearefullie, as if they had bene going vnto a wedding. Imagine what pleasure was taken therein by furious Hannibal, Valiant Marcellus, Vertuous epie, Courageous Camillus, and that Victorious Alexander.

I say moreover, whofoeuer is ignorant in taking good order for publique assayes, there is no place or Schoole, wherein hee may more easily attaine thereto; then by noting the preparation and conducting of an Armie. Besides, whofoeuer knoweth not the deceptions, sleights, and trickes of ingenious prudence,

Furthermore, hee that couets to vnderstand the true Nature of inuincible obedience, strict diligence, incomparable vigilance, vnspokeable promptitude of heart, and inestimable strength of the bodie: let him but vouchsafe so much leysure, as (for a while) to follow a field well manned and prepared, there to obserue carefully, what hee may behold for his owne benefit. If hee finde not himselfe well satisfied; yea, & more then contented in verie few dayes, I will yeeld, and looke my credite in this cause. Which therefore I shall serue me to conclude withall, maintaining still that war is to be preferred before peace, as deely beloued, and with choicest praises commended. Beside, our Prayers should continually bee made to God, to create such chearfull hearts in our Princes, that wee may not any long time, remaine in want, of such a precious and vnualueable Iewell.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Indian Beare: And of those Beares in their owne Native Countreyes, howe different they are in their severall Natures.

All kinds of Creatures haue their contraries appointed, to appeare their humilitie.

Nature hath verie many times expresse hie care and prouidence (as a dutifull handmaid attending on God) where there are any store of hurtfull creatures in some country, that may inteech the inhabiting of men, or Lienes of other beasts and animals, to engender some other of contrary kinds, to destroy the ouer-abounding of such harmefull things. As we may obserue in Serpents, which do deuoure vp Toads & Lizards: Serpents also themselves, are eaten by Storks, and many times they themselves do feede one vpon another. Cats also do deuoure Rats, and so in diuers more beside. I speake this the rather, because we finde recorded in the generall historie of the Indians, that in Quinta, a certaine Countrey of the New-world, there are such extraordinary swarmes of Antes, that they consume the feeds and rootes of all Trees and plants. So that, if there were no Beares (which Nature in effect all fauour hath there appointed, and in great plentie) ther could not be any possibility of dwelling there, because they would make the Countrey to bee quite barren.

The Beare of this Region, liueth only (without anie other foode or Pastorage) by eating those Antes, whose beddes and Nests hee easily findeth, and so with his tongue (which is verie broad and large) hee is so quicke and readie in licking of them vp, that hee is onely nourished by them. There are also great store of those Beares, but they are not fierce, wild and harmefull, as those in other partes: for they will not set vppon men, neither mount vppon Trees, to deuoure the young sprouts and fruites, but are verie easily made tame and tractable by the Indians.

There is no need of plucking out their eyes, or boaring their lippes, to thruste Rings of Iron thorough them, onely to tame them. For euen of themselves, they are (well-neere) Domestical: and, if it were not for these Beares, neither men, and great store of other creatures, could not liue there: but they encrease in those partes so abundantly, that they suffice to destroy the plentie of Antes; in which respect, the Countrey may well account it selfe to be most happy.

I haue not well bene informed, whether it bee the Nature of the Beares in this Countrey, that (according as hath bene reported) the free Beare yeildeth or whelpeth a Male of Flesh, without anie forme or apparance of life: and that the Damme, onely by the Vertue of sucking, giueth it true shape.

Of this opinion, were manie Learned and graue men, as Ariftole, Plutarke, Plinie, Ellanus, and Dr Bartas: but it is a manifest error, as experience hath plainly declared vnto vs, because in manie enclosed places of Germanie, and of France also, Beares of both sexes are kept, which haue engendered young ones, verie well formed in all their members. For, it is an order, obserued by nature verie strictly in our terrestrial Animals, that in their passage out of the Matrice, they are fully compleated in all their parts, without any need of further forming, encreasing verie well in those three dimensions, length, largenesse, & depth.

It serueth to no purpose, to alledge, that Childrens teeth are engendered or formed after their birth. For I answer, that they bring them with them from the Mothers wombe: as I haue seene in the dissection of many young infants, newly borne and dead, whose gummies beeing opened in the pitres and hollowes of the Iawes, the Teeth haue beene plainly found.

But indeede, no outward appearance is made of them, vntill certaine monthes determined by Nature, in which time, they grow greater and stronger, & pierce their passage through the gummies. For mine owne part, in the Mountaines of Saint Claude, in La franche comte de Bourgogne, I haue seene a shee-Bearre laine: whose Belly being presently opened, three young VVhelses were there found, fully formed and hairy, and (as I thinke) verie soone to haue beene whelped, and that which is affirmed by eye-testimony, I hope hath no neede of further probation. Sealger, a great Physitian and Phylosopher, also affirmeth; That he being once at the taking and killing of a Shee-Bearre on the Alpes, the young VVhelses in her belly were found to be wholly formed, as I haue formerly iustified by mine owne sight.

Plinie saith, that the thirtieth day after her conception, the shee-Bearre deliuereth her young ones: but Elianus sayeth, within three monthes after, which is the more likely and credible, because all great creatures, do beare their burthens longer, then such as are small and little. VVhen they are brought into the world, they are about the bignesse of VVeazels: and there is good apparence, that they can be no bigger, because they are carried no longer time, as Kine doo their Calues, Mares their Foales; and other great Beasts their young ones; and these Shee-Bearres hath commonlie three or sue.

So soone as shee hath conceived, the commeth no more into the males sight. VVhen desire of coupling with the male is kindled in her, shee is so greatly affamed thereof: that she hideth her selfe in the remotest obscure places, and the male neuer seeketh after her. At length, being pressed by Nature, and desire of generation, shee commeth to finde the male, and tumbling and playing before him, lyeth directly vpon her backe; and so hee coupleth with her, even as men and women vse to doe. And this is the reason, why it should not bee accounted so strange, that Beares haue had actual dealing with VVomen, wandering thorow the Forrests and Mountaynes, and conceyued by them, as I shall declare more at large in the next following Chapter.

They helpe themselves with their Pawes and Feete, even as men do with their hands and feete; for, they can goe vpright along while together, and hurle or throwe stones with their formost Pawes, smite with a Staffe, and whatsoever else themselves will doo, as well as we.

They are almost continually troubled with paine and Ache in the head, and in such violent manner, that oftentimes (as madded therewith) they throw themselves downe from very high rocks their heads going forwardes, covering their eyes with their pawes, because their sight is verie feeble, and by covering their eyes, they seeme to find some ease.

They espie out such places, where Bees doe make their Honie and VVax, onely to make them angrie, and to the end, they may bee pricked and pierced by the Bees stings, both in their head, and about their eyes: whereby their sight is amended, and their head greefe much alluaged. They feede indifferently on all kinds of Foode, be it Fleish, Fruites, Hearbes, sprouts of Trees, and Honey. They will assaile and kill (if they can) all wild and favage Beasts; as Harts, Hinds, Boares; yea, and VVilde Bulles manie times.

The Shee-Bearre feeling her selfe to be bigge, or conceyued with yong (which most commonly is in the winter time) with-draweth her selfe into her Cae, which shee preparerth in a strong defended fenced place, far from common resort, and well couered with earth, boughes, and branches, entring thereinto alwaies backward, because it should not be knowne, or found by Huntmen. There she remaineth forty daies together, without any food or sustentation; doing nothing else, but like her right paw, whereby she liueth all that while. Afterward, she commeth forth againe, and then eateth all the Antes she can come by: yet not for any nourishment (like to the Indian Beare) but onely to prouoke her to vomit, to the end that she may feed the better. Which when she hath done, she then seeketh after food, and because she hath continued the space of forty daies, and eaten nothing: her intestines are fast clunged together; so that, no meate can haue entrance, but is instantly cast vp againe, and therefore she eateth the Hearb called * Aren, which giueth dilatation and open (preeding to her bowels againe.

As for her VVhelses or young ones, they do not teate or sucke, like to other Creatures, because Munier reporteth (but I know not from whom) that one Demetrius a Maffonia, who was sent thence as an Ambassadour to Rome, declared for a certainty to some periculer Men of credit: that in his Country of Maffonia, there were great store of Beares, big in stature of body, and very fierce, that after their birth (for the space of foureteene daies) liued without eating any thing, continuing in so profound a sleepe, that nothing could waken them, no, though they were pricked and pierced very deeply. After that time is passed ouer, they do then awake, and fall to licking of their formost pawes, and liue (onely by this licking) till the Spring time, when they begin to come abroad with their Dammes, and nibble on tender Hearbs, as they see them do. Now, to speake vprightly, I can hardly beinduced to beleue this, because Nature hath giuen Beasts, or Dugges to Shee Beares, as I my selfe haue seene, and then they should haue their Milke in vaine.

Moreover, that if they be pursued by Hunters, hauing their young ones in their company, and they vnable to escape, in regard of their weaknesse: the Damme carryeth some on her back, and one in her mouth, and so climbeth vp vpon a high Tree, to preferre her selfe and them in this manner. This maketh me to remember, that which is recited by Elianus, of a Shee-Bearre and two Lyons.

He saith, that he heard it reported by one Eudemus, that a Shee-Bearre of * Pan-gau, a Mountaine in Thrace, chanced to finde a Denne; wherein were young Lyon-whelpes, and neither the Sire or Damme there present, to defend them from this Shee-Bearre, therefore she killed them, & afterward departed thence. VVithin a short while after, the Lyon and his Lyonnesse returned to their den, bringing preyes to nourish their young VVhelses withall: but finding them dead, and gathering (by their sente) how they were murdered; they instantly pursued the Shee-Bearres foot by the smell, and discerning her a farre off, drew neerer and neerer still, deuising their best meanes, how to entrap her. Which the Shee-Bearre also perceiuing, and knowing her strength farre insufficient, to deliuer her from these displeased Lyons: forthwith shee began to climbe a Tree, and got vp to the very top thereof. These enraged Beasts seeing they could compass no amends from the murtheresse; tormented themselves exceedingly, and the Lyonnesse lying downe at the foote of the Tree, kept it as besiedged, to be reuenged on her Enimy. But the Sire or male Lyon, he ran vp and downe from Hill to Dale, making the Mountaines to tremble with his loud out-cryes, and all the other Beasts to be very fearefull. At length, hee lighted on a man a Wood-feller, who was hewing downe a Tree in the Forrest, and perceiuing the Lyon to make towards him with extremity of dismay, shee Axe fell out of his hands, and faine he would haue fled for his ownnesafety. The Lyon approaching neere vnto him, made signes of humble and gentle sawning on him, and in such pleasing manner, as we see Dogges to do: licking his hands and garments, oftentimes prostrating himselfe at his feete, even as if he implored his help in some vrgent occasion.

At length, he took him by the cloaths with his teeth, as if hee would bee his guide and conduct to some place, often patting patting his paw vpon the Axe, that the Wood-feller should take it vp againe: which the fearfull man being not able to comprehend (though the beast still vrged it by diuers perswasue signs) the Lyon took it vp with his teeth, and carried it himselfe. So, winding his taile about one of the mans legs, he conducted him, first to the place where the young whelps lay murdered, which was not far from the Tree whereon the She-Bear was mounted. Thither also he brought him, and the Lyonnesse seeing them comming, she arose (with chearful disposition) to meete them, equalling, or rather exceeding the Male Lyons affability to the Man. In briefe, both the beasts made such apparant signes to the Carpenter, that hee not only saw the She-Bear aloft on the Tree; but gathered also by their moanes, that these had killed their young Whelpes, and therefore they would haue him to cut downe the Tree; because, by no means else, they could be auenged on her. The man did quickly cut downe the Tree, & as it fell, so did the She-Bear: which was so sooner on the ground, but instantly they rent her in infinite peeces, returning many gratefull signes to the poore Carpenter, and conducting him safely to his former working place againe.

But returne we now againe, to the naturall disposition of the Beare. He will neuer eate the Flesh of any Beast, which he findeth dead, or readily killed for him. It is faide also, that if a man counterfeit himselfe to be dead, and retaineth his breath while he smelleth to him; hee will not doo him any harme. He diueth all Rats out of his Denne, and will not abide therein, if there bee but one left in it. He will neuer eate any Hony out of the Hiue, where he findes the Bees to be dead.

Munster declareth (by direction from the fore-named Demetrius) that a Beare saued the life of Man, in the very remotest and vastest Forrest of all Asiatica, in the yeare, one thousand five hundred and thirty, and after this manner. A man inhabiting in a neighbouring Village, went into the Forrest to gather Waxe and Hony: because in those Countries, the Bees vse to make their Hony in hollow Trees in the Forrests, whereof there are no meane number, and hee thereby maketh his best benefit, that is most diligent in search, and getteth the greatest quantity.

The poore Countrey-man, standing with his Legges extended abroad in a hollow Tree, for his better gathering of his Hony-Combs: the slender hold (which supported his feete) chanced to breake, and downe he fell further into the hollow of the Tree, till hee was vp to the Chin in Waxe and Hony; destitute of all strength for helping himselfe, or hope of any succour, because no Passengers frequented that way (at least-wile, very sildome) that might heare his wofull complaints, so that he continued there for the space of two daies.

Now, if fortun'd, or rather, the especial Grace of God so directing, that a Beare came by the Tree, and smelling the Hony, climbed vp the Tree, and descended downe to the place where the poore man was. The Beare seeing fearfull when he beheld the man, turned to get vp againe out of the Tree: but the poore man caught hold on one of his himmost feet, and held so strongly with both his hands, that the Beare brought vp himselfe and the man out of the Tree, and both fell downe together on the out-side of the Tree, somewhat astonied with the fall, but no way hurt, the Beare returning into the Woodes, and the man to his home. Thus the Beare saued the poore Countrey-mans life, without declaring any signe of hurting or offending him.

Bachiles Ambrosius saith, that in the Northern Countries, there are white Beares, that liue both in Waters, and on the Land: beside, that either with hurling stones, or branches of Trees, or with their claws, they will break open the Ices in Rivers, and in the Sea, only to catch Fishes to feed on. Moreover, that they are not so malicious or harmful, as other Beares are, neither are lustfull, or seeking after women: As one, whereof I am now to speake, and whereby a Lady conceiued; after the manner of women, witnessed for truth, by Joannes Saxoniensis, in his large History, and Joannes Magnus, Arch-bishop of Upsalia in Suetia; & lastly, by Arch-bishop Olaus, his

Of a Lady of Svvetia, that was conceiued with child by a Beare, and afterwards was enured thereon.

IN a part of the Kingdom of Svvetia or Suecia, there stood sometime a goodly Cattle, builded neere vnto a Mountaine, by a wealthy Lord, and one of great authority.

This Lord had a very faire Daughter, who walked abroad in an evening, accompanied with some other Gentlewomen, to take the open ayre in the Fields. As they walked together, pleasantly talking and discoursing; a Beare (by chance) had strayed abroad from the thickets on the Mountaine, of verie huge stature, fierce and terrible, making directly towards this faire troupe, who (in great feare) when they espied the Beare, fled, some one way, and the rest another, for their best deliuerance. The Beare laying hold on the chiefest Ladie of all the rest, lifting her forcibly vpon his backe: ran (so fast as he could) into the thicket of the Forrest, not meeting any resistance by the way, because the fore-said Ladies came forth alone of themselves, not hauing any man in their company.

Now, albeit the Beare had thus wandered abroad, in search of some prey, for appeasing his hunger: yet (referring the maine point herein, to Gods mercifull and omnipotent preferuation) the Beare, moued by some instinct of nature (sare differing from that in Beasts of the same kind) would not kill her for his foode, but carried her to his Cauer, which was in a very darke and deep valley. There his wonted, rough and sterne nature, became conuerted into lowlike embraces and carresses, which were so extremely pursued and continued: that the Lady apprehended his lustfull intention, which, though it was monstrous and vnnatural, yet it qualified some part of her former feare. And, as she durst not (in this extremitie) resist the fury and power of the Beare, dreading each houre the losse of her life: so (questionlesse) much against her wil or liking, shee was enforced to consent, and endure such companying with him, as you may better imagine, then I expresse.

The Beare would daily issue forth of his den, hunt and kill all kinds of Beasts, and bring them home as food for himselfe and the Lady: who (in this vrging necessity) was glad to eat raw flesh, wilde Fruits, and some other foodes familiar to men; as Cheefe, Bread, and such like victuals, which he would get from the that kept Cattle in the fields, or such as traualled to Faircs and Markets. Her daily drinke, was Water of a cleare running Brooke at the Caves entrance, shadowed with a lovely thicket of young Trees: and thus she liued, in hope that (one day) God would deliuer her. Many times (while the Beare was abroad at his prey and purchase) shee purposed to make an escape thence: yet durst not attempt it, least hee should againe recover her, and then kill her; beside, she feared the rauensome fury of other sauage Beastes, whereof no meane store frequented the Mountaine.

As thus she spent some moneths in this haplesse manner, it fortun'd, that certaine Huntmen (pursuing their deligntfull sport ouer the Mountaine) with their Grey-hounds and Beagles, followed this Beare so mainly; that he being false into their snare, they there slew him. And although this was vnknown to the Lady, yet when she heard the voyces of men, and they appearing to be neere the Cauer: she came forth vnto them, to their no little dread and admiration. Yet looking more aduisedly on her, they perfectly knew her, and had heard of her losse, with generall supposition of her death: whereupon they conducted her home to her Father and Mother, who scarcely knew her, her complexion had been so greatly altered. In this time, Nature (who sometimes worketh wonderfull things, and and contrary to common order) had disposed of the Beasts feed in her bodie; that she being growne great, and generally expected to be deliuered of a monster: it prooued to be a goodly Male Child, not any way pertaking in the Sires bestiall forme or appearance, fawing that his body was much more hairy all ouer, then is seene in other Children. He was carefully nurled, and the name of Beare imposed on him: but when he grew to mans estate, hee became so strong and powerfull, that euery one stood in great feare of him. The Huntmen that killed the Beare, his begetter, would often boast in his company, after what manner they had deliuered his Mother but hee was the Deathman of them all, saying, Albeit, he had received such a fauour by them, yet notwithstanding, he stood bound in nature, to reuenge the death of his Father.

This Man begat Tragillus Sprachaleg, who was a very valiant Souldiour and Captaine; and he begat Vffen, a man of high deseruing: of whom, the Chronicles of the Countries of Dannemarch, Swenia, and Gothia, doe make most large mention, for he was the Father of Suegar, who was King of Dacia; whereupon, all Histories doe affirme, that al the Kings of Dacia, and of Swenia, proceeded from this race, and all the fore recited Authours (who are of the same Countries) doe maintaine as much. Concerning my selfe, I haue seene many tame and domestick Beares, amorous of Women, and She-Bears to be thelike of Men, although their eyes haue beene plucked out, and very few are ignorant of the truth in this case: therefore this history sufficiently approueth, that these beastes doe couple after the manner of men.

Now, let vs admit the Beare to be cruell and vile in all his actions; yet notwithstanding, Nature hath bestowed diuers medicinable properties, on some peculiar parts of his body. His head is held venomous, to such as eate thereof, and to procure raging madnesse: in which regard, the Inhabitants of these Northerly Countries, doe vse to burne those heads, and the Athes of them are exceeding good, for them that haue the Foule-ewill, or Felling-sicknesse, by often washing the diseased parties head, with Lye, made of the faide Athes or Cinders. If they be mingled also among Hony, it will cause Haire to grow againe, where it hath long time wanted: euen as the Fat or Grease of the Beare doth the like, when men haue lost their Haire; helping likewise the paines of the Sciatica, and other Gouts. Also his Fleth is wholesome to bee eaten, and hath no euill tast. The Seythians, Getes, and other Notherne Countries, doe fasten Beares heads on the Gates of their Citties and Townes, perswading themselves; that they doe preferre them, from being hurt by their enemies. Thus you see, what I collected out of good, ancient, and approoued Authours, concerning the Nature of the Indian Beare, and those of other Countries, better knowne to vs.

CHAP. I.

Of the Great Turkes Court, more commonly called (in these daies) the Court of the Great Signior: His Pompe, State, Officers, and Attendants; As also their daily Wages and Allowances, according to their degrees, and places of Service, &c.

We haue already spoken sufficiently (though briefly) concerning the Originall of the Turkish Empire, and in what manner they attained to such height and greatness: Our purpose therefore, in this present Chapter, is, to discourse onely of the Government, and Order observed in the Court, vsually tearmed by themselves, the Porta or Court of the Grand Signior; whereto I am the more willingly induced, because the Pompe, Might, and Maiesty thereof, may bee publicly discerned.

The Cittie of Constantinople, where in the Great Signior Turke (with his Court Royal) maketh his most residing; was in former times called Bizantium, and new Rome, containing now in circuit, about eightene Miles. It hath feauen small Hills, not of any great height, and it is rounded with old ruined walls, being full of Houses, though none of the best, yet composed of Clay, wood, and some few of stones. There are many Groues or Thickets of Trees in the Cittie, vn-inhabited, consisting of Cipresse Trees, and diuers others there growing in like manner. In Constantinople is the Serraglio of the Signior Turke, which is a singular thing, & very great, as we shall relate hereafter. There is the Serraglio of Women, for the Great Signior; The Serraglio of Tanissaries; The Patriarke's Pallace; The Pallace of Constantine the Emperour, which is partly ruined; The Church of Saint Sophia, which was builded by the Emperour Iustinian, of admirable fine stone, and curious Marble, as yet (though very ancient and excellent) is to be seene, part whereof, the Great Signior employeth as a Stable for his Horses. There is also the Moschea of the Sultane Mehemet, which hath an Amarato (that is as an Hospitall or Almes-house) ioyned vnto it, wherein is entertained and lodged men of all Nations and Religions, that will enter into it, and there they are allowed three dayes acceptance and fobd, as Hony, Rice, Bread, Water, and a Chamber to rest in. There is belonging to this Hospitall, goodly Bathes; and rare Fountaines or Springs of Water, very delightfull to behold. There are also the Moschees of Sultane, Batazet, of Sultane Selim, and of diuers other Lords, which are very beautiful and costly builded; whereby it appeareth, that when they pleased, they knew how to make houses, and Pallaces most magnimagnificent and sumptuous.

There is likewise the * Hippodrome, which is a place, where anciently they vied to breake and run their Horses, in the forme of a Theater or circle in the midst of which Hippodrome, there standeth a sharp Spire or Pinnacle, being an ingenious Piller, made in the fashion of a Needle, very faire, well wrought, and without any Lime or Morter: yet made of fine Stone, and framed in such manner, that it riseth about fifty fadome in height, observing still the true shape of a Needle, and resting vpon foure round Bals of Marble. There is also a Piller of Brasse, in forme of a Serpent with three heads: and a Heracles of Brasse, brought thither from Hungaria; and in the midst of all these, standeth a frame or deuise, made like a Colossus, of diuers kinds of beautifull Marble, whereon is curiously engrauen, the Histories of all the fore-named things; and others, that were wont to be in the Theater or Hippodrome. Thorow the City, there are diuers tracts or pathes of Antiquity, Arches, Colloons of Porphyry, Springes leitch from Danubie, &c other neere neighbouring Riuer: many Gardens with goodly Houses in them; many Moscheas be- longing to priuate Lordes, and great store of Bathes, annexed to the Moscheas of publike Magistrates, and other priuate persons.

On the other side of the Sea, and at the head of the Serraglio, are the hills of Asia, containing the journey of two miles, little more or lesse: which Asia, vnder one name only is now call'd Nardus, and there (on the shoaring bankes) are diuers little Castles, termed Scutari. Next, there is that which they call Chalcidonia, seated in a corner of the Hellespont; where diuers notes of Antiquitie are to be obserued, and (in many places) the foundation of ancient Churches many be seene, as well of Christians, as of the Gentiles, being now goodly places, and abounding in Fruits. The site or situation of Constantinople is such, as not only it exceedeth all description, equal to the due merit thereof: but also can as hardly be conceiued in thought, in regard of the beauty and delicate compofure thereof, so that (vndoubtedly) it may rather be reputed diuine, then otherwise, and whatsoeuer bee be that shall behold it, will iudge it worthy to be preferred, before all other sit'd Cities in the world.

In the City, beside Turkes, there are Towers, being * Marrani, fled, or repelled out of Spain; and these are they that haue taught, and do yet teach, all kinds of Trades to the Turkes, and the most part of all the Shoppes and Boothes for Trades, are kept and exercised by those Marrani. There is a place named Besselano, where is bought and sold all kinde of Cloathes, and Turkish Commodities, Silkes, wollen and Linnen Cloath, Silver and Gold wrought into all formes, Bowes, Slaues, Horses, and all kinds of things else to be had in Constantinople, which continually are brought to this Market, and which is euery day kept open in full sale, except Friday onely. Constantinople is in Thrace, and the terminations thereof are in this manner. On the East, is the Propontis, and mouth of the great Sea, from the streights of Hellspont, to Bosphorus Thracius. On the West, is part of Bugaria, and part of Macedonia. On the North, Basina; And on the South, Egeam Mare, with part of Macedonia, which turneth towards the Riuer Nessus, anciently called * Agasus Fluminis. This most Noble City is inhabited with Turks, who (by the writings of diuers approued Authours, for confirmation, and many of the Turkes themselves also) had their Original from Scythia, which now is part of Tartaria, a Northerly Region, and deuided into two parts by the Riuer * Tanais; one part whereof is in Europe, & the other in Asia. That part of Europe is confined (on the one side) with Pontus, and on the other side, with the Rhiphan Mountaines, being backed aloft with Asia it selfe, and with the Riuer Thapsus. By Ptolomie, these two Scythians are named, the one, Intra Jamnum montem, and the other, Extra Iamnum, as is more at large else where to be seene.

This people, being parted from Scythia, as formerly hath been said, and beginning (in their own confines) to make commodities and irruptions, proceeding on still further: in short time they ouer-ruled a great part of Asia; but in regard they knew not how to maintain themselves vnder one Head or Commander, they could not make any firme firme or seild foundation. Which being well perceived and considered by one, who was named Othoman (a man of more condition then common base- nesse, being of high spright and valiant minded) he consulted with his owne thoughts, that if he could compass the arme and furtherance of some ingenious man that had authority: hee might easily haue the people and whol Country vnder obedience, and encrease the same as occasion shil serued. Hereupon, he discovered his priuate intention to three men, whom he thought more apt and conuenient for this business, then any of the rest: promising them, that if he could compass the hope he aymed at; both they and their offspring should be continued and maintained in such high state and dignity, answerable to so great a benefice as he receiued by them. Moreover, that not any one of their posterity, should be vnder-handed, or left to the mercy of Law, except they offended very grievously. The conditions were accepted by these men, and they conspired together against the chiefeft Soueraignty: in which progression, what by art, craft, threatnings, & much expence of blood, all was obtained to their full desire. These three men, one of them was named Michaelis Greco, made a Turke: of whom are descended the Morcalogi, & one of them (is at this instant) Saniack of Bosfina. The second was called Malto Greco, a Renegado: of whom also came the Malerlogi, and there is but one onely left of them, who is Saniack in Grecia. The third was Anrami, a Native Turke, the descendants of whom were termed Euracasti, and it is not knowie, whether any of them bee left, or no. When the Race and Family of Othoman failed, these other pretended right to the principalltie, and therefore they were very highly respected. This Othoman came to the Government, in the yeare one thousand, three hundred, or there-about, and liued in the regiment, twenty eight yeares. After whom succeeded Orhanes, who liued twenty two yeares in the dominion. Next, Amurath, who reigned twenty three yeares. After him Batazeth; Then Cyrisclebes, or (as others will haue it) Calapine, who liued sixe yeares. Next him was Mahomet, who reigned fouenteene yeares. Then Amurath the second, who ruled one and thirty yeares. Then Mahomet the second, who reigned two and thirty yeares, and was called the first Emperour of the Turkes in Constantinople. Next, Batazeth the second, who reigned one and thirty yeares. Then Selim, eight yeares; To whom succeeded Sultan Seliman, who reigned forty seauen yeares: And after him, Selim the second, reigning byght yeares: Then Amurath the third, who reigned one and twenty yeares. Next to him, Mahomet the third, ruling nine yeares: And lastly Achmeth, or Sichmet, who came to the Empire, being but fouenteene yeares old; and reigneth yet at this present.

THE Great Signior hath a Serraglio in a part of Constantinople, at the two Seas deuision, which containeth (in circuit) about three miles: and therein is his chiefe Sear and Court, which is called the Porta. This Serraglio, because it was begun to be builded by the Sultane Mahomet: when hee eyed, hee would haue it leuelled with his Moschea, and that a thousand Affers should be daile paid towards the charges, which Affers doe amount to twenty Ducaes, and this payment is yet offered. In the said Serraglio are very many goodly Chambers, but one (above all the rest) appointed for the Great Signior, and wherein hee sleepeth, where doe attend fixe Youtthes (supposed by some to be W'omen) who onely doe awaite on his person. Of these fixe, two are appointed daily for seruice in the Chamber, and of the Signior, and by them at night time, the Office of Guard is performed, one standing at his head, and the other at his feete (continually vigilant) with two lighted Torches in their hands.

These two doe helpe in the morning, to put on the Signiors Garments, the vppermost whereof being called Caslan, hath two Pockets: into one whereof, the Pages doe put a thousand Affers, and into the other, twenty Ducaes of Gold euery morning, which Moh, if (in the day time) it bee not giuen away by the Signior: it remaineth to them that maketh him vneade at night, Bbbi for

When he rideth abroad on pleasure, either to hunt, or any other sportfull exercise, beside the forenamed Money which he carryeth about him; the Cafadar-Bafhae, who is his chief Treasurer, rideth next behind him, who carrieth great sums of Money, which the Signior commandeth to be given away. The Offices of the forenamed fixe young Pages, are altd according to the Signiors will and pleasure. One of them is called the Chincher, that is he which carrieth the Pantofles of the Signior: The second, Seilichner, who beareth his Bow and Arrowes; The third, Chicadar, who carrieth his cloak or Mantle; The fourth, Saraptar, who carrieth his Vial of water; The fifth, Schemelighi, who beareth his Roole or seat; And the last is Oda-Bafhae, who is chiefe of the Chamber. These Pages haue firm and setled allowance of VVages; some fifteen, and others twenty, but the Oda-Bafhae thirty Aspers daily.

The Capagoffi Eunuch, that is he which is chiefe of the Porta or Court, hath threecore Aspers daily.

The Cafadar-Bafhae Eunuch, chiefe of all the other Treasurers, hath threecore and ten Aspers daily.

The Chilergi-Bafhae Eunuch, chiefe of all the other Dispensers or Stewards, hath forty Aspers daily.

The Saraidar-Bafhae, Eunuch of the Serraglio, when the Signior is in Prograce, hath fifty Aspers daily.

Twelve Eunuches, subiect, or at command of these fore-named, haue some ten, and some fifteen Aspers each man daily.

In the next place, we are to speake of five hundred young Women, from the age of eight, to the yeares of twentie, who are kept in a Serraglio, and are the choise delights of the Grand Signior. They haue ten and twelve Aspers daily each one of them, and are instructed in diuers Arts, according to their abilitie apprehension: but most especially in Reading, Writing, and Doctrinie of their Law or Religion, and in riding. Their Maisters or Tutours, are ancient Talismani, called Cozza, that is to say, Doctors of the Law.

These young Women, at the time of Bairone, which is (among vs) the Feast of Easter, are all allowed Garments by the Great Signior, which are of Silke and of Cloath, without any forme of Livery. Their Head Attires are all of Gold, and they haue Semitaries and Bowes, like Amazones: but they neuer go forth of the said Serraglio, till they attaine to such yeares, as the Signior thinketh them apt for some Office, and then they are made eyther Spacoglani, or Seilichneri, or of some greater degree, according to their carriage, or grace that they haue won with the Signior. Euery tenne of these VVomen are kept by an Eunuch, called Capoglani, that is to say, chiefe of the younger Women, and euery one of them hath a night-Slaue, and toucheth not him that lyeth nearest him. They lodge in goodlie Roomes, like great and spacious Halls, verie full of lights, and their Eunuches doe sleepe in the midst of those Roomes. There is a Garden belonging to the Serraglio, containing in compass more then a mile, whereto appertaineth fixe and thirte Gardiners, called Bostangi, who are decayed and aged Janissaries: and these Bostangi haue (from three to five Aspers) each man daile, and euery one hath a Livery of Turkish Cloath, and a Shirt yearelie allowed him. When they depart out of the Serraglio, they remaine Janissaries, or Solachis, or Capigi, or otherwise, according to their qualitie.

The Bostangi-Bafhae, who is chiefe of the Gardiners, hath fifty Aspers daile allowed him, and many other royall fauours beside.

The Protogero, who is a Lieutenant to the Gardiners, hath twentie Aspers daily, and euery ten hath a chiefe, called Boluch-Bafhae. Out of this Garden, which is very great, welllaboured, and full of excellent Fruits of all sortes, there is yearely gathered such plentie: that the benefit made onely thereby, sufficeth for the Signiors expences in dyet, beside a good ouer-plus remaining for other vices. Neere to the Garden, doe two Foyfles or small Barkes continually attend, which are rowed by the Gardiners, when the Signior pleaseth to iollace himselfe on the Water, and the Boluch-Bafhae gouerneth the Helme.

Casagir-Bafhae, is chiefe of the Confectionarie, hauing forty Aspers daile allowed him; and he hath thirty other Companions, who haue some fixe, or others fixe Aspers each man.

The Casagir-Bafhae, who is Maister of the Butlers, or chiefe Butler to the Great Signior, hath forty Aspers daile. Morning and Euening hee bringeth in his hand, the Cuppe which the Signior drinketh in, and hath an hundred Casagirs vnder him, who haue from thirte, to sixtie Aspers each man daile.

The Mutpachemin, who is the chiefe Steward, hath fortie Aspers daile, and keepeth a Clearke vnder him, that hath twenty Aspers daile.

An hundred decayed Janissaries, which with Carts doe carry Wood to the Serraglio, they haue from three, to fixe Aspers a man daile, and are clothed also.

Ten Sacca, which carry Water on Horses in Bouges, haue each man from three, to fixe Aspers daile.

The expences which is graunted by the Grand Signiors allowance, to his women and their Eunuches, with other persons, to the number of a thousand, or thereabout, amounteth to fixe thousand Aspers euery day.

There is a Stable in the Serraglio, with two hundred Horses for the Signiors person, and two hundred men to manage and keepe them, who haue from fixe, to eight Aspers each man daile.

Three Capigi-Bafhaes, who are Captaines of the Portes or Gates, that haue an hundred Aspers by the day, and are clothed yearely. Vnder them they command two hundred and fiftie Capigi, that haue each man from fixe, to leauen Aspers daile. Each Capigi-Bafhae, standeth obliged (with a third nuber of the Capigi) to keepe a Guard at the Gate of the Grand Signior, being changed still day by day. And when Ambassadors, or others doe come to kisse the Grand Signiors hand: all of them are presented with Garments, or else Mo-ny, according to the degree of him that is brought to that honor.

A Capigichebeshi, who is as Protogero of the Capigi, and hath forty Aspers daile.

Four Bafhaes, called Visirs, that is, chiefe Councillers to the Signior. He that is greatest in authority, hath foure and twenty thousand Ducates by the yeare, and the other of them, haue fixteene and eighteene thousand yearely each man. They hold (beside) so much Land of him, as yeildeth three times more benefit, then is their allowance and prouision of Money: whereto are added the rich garments giuen them by the Signior; the great presents of Suiters, and others; beside the royalties held by their Offices, which are infinite.

These Bafhaes liue and goe clothed verie pompously, hauing Slaues, both Men and W women, to whom they giue Wages, Horfes, Garments, Head-attires of Gold, Girdles of Silver, according to such Office and degree, as they hold about them: and by these (with his owne prouision) is each Bafhae serued, euen as the Signior is serued by his attendants.

They haue fixe and twenty, or thirty Secretaries granted them by the Signior, who are men of good esteeme, and haue fixe and twenty or thirty Aspers each man daile, beside Slaues, some more, some lesse, according to each mans quality and estate. These Bafhaes doe go in and out to the Signior, about matters and occasions of State, & are they (in briefe) that gouerne and manage all things after their owne liking.

Next, there is the Mophy, who is the Interpreter and chiefe of the Law or Religion: And he is not troubled with any other matters, but in cases belonging to Religion, and concerning their Faith. His Office and Dignity is, as preferring the person of the chiefe Priest or Bishop.

Two Cadi Leschieri Talismani, who are Doctors of the Law for the Armie, one of Greece, the other of Natoia, and they hold very worthy Offices. They sit at the Court gate, and do proceed or go before the Bafhaes Visirs, albeit the other are more esteemed. They are Executors of the Lawes, and with consent of the Bafhaes. They place and displace the Cadis, who are as Porteflates and chiefe Magistrates thorow the Countries. They hold in Lands (each man) about seaven thousand ducates yearly, and do keep two hundred or three hundred Slaues severally: being also allowed by the Signior, ten Secretaries, and two Mechur-Bashas, who performe the Office of Cavallery, and live on the royalties, whereof they have good store.

There are two Disferdari, or rather, (as we vse to teame them) Governours of the rents and revenues. One of them hath the collection, & keeping of those accounts, which come from one third part of Greece: to wit, those parts which are towards Danubie; and next, from Asia, Soria, and Egypte, with Landes of ten thousand Ducates yearly, albeit, (with their royalties) hee vaileth three times as much. The other hath charge of the other two third partes of Greece, but when the great Signior goeth forth into the Field: he remaineth as his Vicar and Lieutenant in Constantinople, and hath fixe thousand ducates in lands, whereof he maketh three times the value, and their severally Offices are of great dignitie. They keepe vnder them fifty Clarke, with many coadiutores, who have care of the Cafsa accounts, that is, of the Signiors Treasure: and these Clarke are allowed wages by the Signior, from fifteene, to fifty Aspers each man daily. Also these Disferdari, each one of them hath 1000. Slaues, & the other five hundred: Likewise, the Clarke, they have from two, to twenty Slaues, each man allowed him.

Two Rofunamgi, Masters of the Clarke, that receive the Monies, and make disbursement thereof again when need requireth, who have xxv. assistants betweene them. These two men are allowed forty Aspers apiece; and the five and twenty have from eight, to ten Aspers each man daily.

Defnadar, whereof there are two, whose office is to weigh the Aspers and Ducates, with five and twenty Aspers allowance daily for the one, and thirtie for the other.

Six Saraffieri, as Bankers or Lombards, who know the true estimate of Gold and Silver, and have from ten to fiftene Aspers, each man daily.

Then there is a Neflangi-Basbae, who signeth the Commands, and publike Writings, with the Signe or Marke of the Signior. His Office is, as Great or chiefe Chancellour, and he is a man of much reputation. He sitteth in the Porte, next to the Beglerbey, and hath eight thousand ducates of annuall Lands, beside very honorable places, with aboute three hundred Slaues.

There is a Cafnadar-Basbae abroad, or at large, as common Treasurer, with ten Cafnadri vnder him: himselfe hath fifty Aspers daily, and the ten other fiftene each man.

The Deftermin, who is as Surueyer of the Lands, and keepeth a Register of them all. He hath forty Aspers daile, and vnder him are ten Clarke, rewarded from ten, to fiftene Aspers daile each man.

Then there are fourescore Mutaferrache, who are as Demy-Lances or light Horlemen to the Signior, carrying their Lances alwaies, whensoever he rideth abroad, and acknowledging no other Head or Commaunder, but the Grand Signior himselfe onely. Afterward, when either by art or desert, any one of them can attaine so farre into his fauor; he is made Agas, that is a Captain. The meaneft of them have ten, and the better fort, fourescore Aspers a man daile.

There is a Chians-Basbae, who is chiefe of the Sergeants for the Army, and holdeth such credit with every man: that when he is sent by command from the Signior, to any Basbae, Saniack, or Cadi, with order, to cause the head of any one to be smitten off: he is obeyed, without receipt of any Letter by him, or commaundement in writing, and euen no otherwise, then as if the Signior himselfe were there in person, and commaunded it to be done. This man hath an hundred Aspers by the day, and keepeth an hundred Slaues vnder him, for whom he is allowed from five & twenty, to forty Aspers for each man daile.

The Mechur-Basbae, is Master of them, that display or spread abroad the Tents of Pavillions, and the Tapestry that covers the Floores in the Court, with such like busineses thereto belonging. He hath forty Aspers daile; one Protogero, and five and twenty Aspers allowance: three score Mechters, waged from five, to eyght Aspers

The Agas, that is, Captaine of the Janissaries, who hath a thousand Aspers and more daily, and fixe thousand Ducats in Lands yearly. This Agas, when Court is kept, which is commonly twice or thrice every weeke, standeth obliged, to feede the Janissaries, with Bread, Rice, Mutton, Hony, and VVater. He hath a Cheecaya vnder him, or rather a Protogero of the Janissaries, who is as his Vice-gerent, and hath two hundred Aspers daily in ready Mony, and thirty thousand in Lands yearly. He also hath a Clarke of the Janissaries, called Janissariafia, waged with an hundred Aspers daile.

The Sechemen-Basbae, is Master of the Hounds for Hunting: he hath an hundred Aspers daile, and to the number of almost two thousand Janissaries vnder him.

The Zagari-Basbae, is Master of the Beagle-Hounds, being allowed fiftie Aspers daile, and hath about seaven hundred Janissaries vnder him.

There are to the number of twelue thousand Janissaries, that haue from three, to eight Aspers wages, each man daile allowed them. Every ten haue their Oda-Basbae, and euery hundred haue their Boluch-Basbae: but these chiefe Men of the tens and hundreds, do ride on Horfebacke, the Oda-Basbaes being allowed forty Aspers each man daile, and the Boluch-Basbaes sixtie, the rest of the Janissaries doe goe on foote, being clothed once a yeare by the Signior, in coorse Azure cloath.

Their dwelling is in two partes of Constantinople, freely giuen them by the Signior, wherein dwell they that haue no Wives; but such as be married, do inhabit diuers places of the City. For their liuing together in friendly manner, euery Man layeth downe his peculiar proportion; And they haue a Steward, and a Cooke, who make preparation of their dyet: but such as come short in stipend to the rest, are bound by obligation to attend on the other, and take their leauings. Every hundred of them, when they go to the Field, do carry their Tent or Pavillion: with them, being all Foot-men: and part of them Shot, other Halbardiers, and some that vie the Seminary onely, euerie three Men hauing a Horfe, for carriage of their necessaries. When they grow into yeares, or (in some other respects) their seruice seemeth not pleasing to the Signior: they are cashiered out of the Janissaries Booke, and are termed Assarici, that is to say; Guards for Cattles; & then they haue Commanders appointed them for that purpose, who are called Caftilians, with equall allowance to the wages which formerly they had, so that no one of them falleth into distresse.

Some of them there be who speede so successfullie in the Warres: that they come to be made Vanoides, and exalted to great Dignitie. They begin the exercise of Armes when they be but young Lads, and are entrusted by the most expert: being chosen of healthfull disposition, strongly limbed, yet quick and agile, but (about all) courageous, and much rather to bee cruell, then any way pitifull. In these men consisteth the strength and full firmenes of all the Turkish Armies: because they are continually exercised thereto, and (altogether) become one sole body as it were, are (indeede) to bee feared and doubted.

Of Janissaries there are elected an hundred and fiftie Solachis, who are as Foot-men to the Signior, with allowance from fiftene, to twentie Aspers each man daile: and they go euermore about his person, at all times when hee rideth abroad.

Two Solach-Basbaes, are chiefe of the Solachis, and ride on horfebacke; being allowed thirty Aspers daile each man, and the Solachis are vnder obedience to the Agas of the Janissaries.

The Agas of the Spaccogiani, a very honourable Office, hath in Lands and day Wages, ten Duckets continually, and great store of Slaues, with a Cheecaya vnder him, or else a Protogero, who hath (betweene Lands and Wages) an hundred Aspers daile, beside a Janagi, that is, a Clarke, hauing thirty Aspers, and sufficient regalities.

There be of the Spaccogiani, who are young lustie men on horfebacke (for so meaneeth the Word Spaccogiani) three thousand, being waged from twentie, to fortie aspers each man daile, & euery serue on Horse-backe, with five or sixe Slaues, and as many Horses for each man; giuing their attendance alwaies (and lodging likewise) on the right hand of the Signior. They are men of sufficiency, ouer whom the Signior appointeth no head or Controller, but onely himselfe. They are first brought vp or educated, in the Serraglio of yong Boyes, and as they grow in yeares and goodnesse, choyse is made of them, and to they do attaine to this degree, which serueth as a Ladder for them, whereby

The difference
betweene the Silkichtari and the Spacchi.

Of these Silkichtari, there are three thousand, who ride on horsebacke likewise, and lodge on the left hand of the Signior, hauing from twenty, to five and twenty Aspers each man daily: with four or five Slaues, and as many Horses, beside Lands for their better maintenance. These men are educated in the same manner, as the Spacchi or Spacco-glani, and there is no other difference betweene them: but that the Spacchi attend on the right hand, and these on the left, of the Signior.

Olofagi-Ba-

uer the Soul-
diers.

Two Olofagi-Basbaes, who are chiefe of the Souldiours, with two thousand Olofagi, that serue on the right and left hand of the Signior. The two chiefe Commanders, haue an hundred and twenty Aspers each man daily, and the other, from eight, to sixteen each man.
Moreover, the two haue vnder them, a Checaia, a Cleark and a Protogero, with Slaues and Horses, the one more, the other lesse.

Two Agas, Maisters or Rulers of the Caripoglani (who are poore young men) with fourecore Aspers of allowance for each man. Their Protogeri haue thirte Aspers, their Clearks five and twentie:
And they haue vnder them, about two thousand Caripoglani (who are waged from seauen to foureteene Aspers each man) and they haue Slaues and Horses beside.

Bracor-Basbae
chiefe Groom-
es of the Stable.

Two Bracor-Basbaes, who are Maisters or chiefe Quiries of the Stable, one aboue the other in Office. The better hath five hundred Aspers by the day, & the other two hundred; beside Protogeri and Checaiaes, and others that are waged from thirty, to forty Aspers dailie each man.

Then there are to the number of sixteene thousand some tearmed Sarachi, who make Bridles and Saddles; others Ceisti, Seruants or Groomes of the Stable; others Carmandari, that attend on the Mules; others Denegi, that waite on the Camels; and Caruigli, that feed the Heards of Horses in diuers places, who are waged from two, to twentie Aspers each mandaily.

Next there is betweene thirty and forty Peichi, Foote-Poasts, or Lackies, who were brought vp (from their younger yeares) in knowledge of the miles, & dispatch much ground in short while,
and with wonderfull swiftnesse. When the Grand Signior, is to ride abroad, they are continually ready, because they are employed fill in many businesses.

Of elected and choyse Horses, there are about foure thousand, for the person of the Signior: which are ridden by the youthes of the Serraglio, and by the Eunuches, as a dailie practise and exercise.

There is a Zachergi-Basbae, Maister of the yong Hawks, and another Zachergi-Basbae, Commander of all the Faulconers. The first hath an hundred and fiftie Aspers dailie, and the other but fourefcore; with their Checaiaes, Proto-geri, and others, that are waged each Man dailie, from ten, to five and twenty Aspers. Vnder these, are about two hundred Zaniglieri, one hundred wher-of, haue onely tenne Aspers each man dailie: but the rest hold Landes, or else exemption from taxation, and follow the fields as pleaserh the Signior.

The Gebegi-Basbae, is Maister of the Armour, hauing threecore Aspers dailie, a Protogero, and Cleark, with twenty Aspers each Man dailie. Vnder him are a thousand and five hundred Gebegi, waged from seauen to foure-teene Aspers dailie each man, and they all goe on foot with the Signior to the Field.

The Tepe-Basbae, is M. of the Muskettiers, hauing threecore Aspers dailie;

the Signior's Standard-
bearer.

Imrelem-Aga, who carrieth the grand Signior's Standard, hauing two hundred Aspers dailie, and he is (beside) Captaine ouer all the Meisters.

Arpaemin, Pur-
ueyer of grain
and Corne.

The Arpaemin, hee is Purueyer for Corne, hauing a Protogero, and a Chancellor: himselfe hath fixtie Aspers, the Protogero thirty, and the Chancellor twenty dailie. This Arpaemin hath xx.
persons vnder him, who are allowed dailie amongst them, eight hundred Af-pers.

Saraemin, Pro-
uider in generall.

The Saraemin, is Purueyer or prouider in common: for hee looketh to the streets of Constantinople, and al the waies whereby the Signior passeth forth to Warre. He hath charge also of publick Buildings, of Springs, Wells, and Water-conduits. He is allowed fifty Aspers dailie, and hath foure hundred men vnder him: among whom, is giuen a thousand Aspers: hauing a Protogero, and a Cleark also, with 38. Aspers, allowed each man dailie.

Karatemin, Steward of the Signior's
commands.

The Karatemin, who is appointed to deliuer the Signior's commands in writing, and to receiue his house monyes:
hauing fortie Aspers dailie, and attended with two Clearks, and two Ouer-seers, with twenty Aspers dailie each man.

Dragman, the Interpreter of Languages,
or Maister of the Ceremonies.

The Dragman, who is Interpreter of all Languages, which Office is as highly reputed, as is the Vertue and Wisdom of him that exerciseth it. He hath five hundred Ducates in firme Prouision e-uery yeare, besides, his enjoying as much in Landes, and about foure times as much in extraordinary fauours, being alwayes verie especiallie respected of

them.

The Women Serraglio, differing from the other.

2. OVer and beside all the forenamed matters, there is another Serraglio of the Signior's Women, containing in circuit more then a mile and a halfe: being richly furnished with di-uers goodly Chambers, and other retirements, wherein the Signior's Children are kept, seperately one from another, with their Mothers, and a great number of Eunuchs allowed for their keeping & seruice. There is also the Sultana, that is to say, the chiefe Mother, or the Signior's Wife, by whom he is said to haue his first Child.

In this place also, are three hundred young Damocels, brought thither Vir-gins, and deliuered to the gouernment of many Matrons: which Virgines, are enfructured in all kinds of curious imbroi-dery and workes: and euery one is allowed from ten to twentie Aspers daylie, as wages, and euery yeare, at the two Bai-ranes, they haue costly Garments of silk giuen them. Among these, hee maketh choise (to his owne liking) of such as hee will admit to his priuate companie: and when he hath lien with any of them, hee giueth her a rich head attire of Golde, & ten thousand Aspers, placing hir then in another lodging, separte from the other Virgins, encreasing still hir ordinary wages.

To this Serraglio belongeth an Aga
of the Eunuches, who hath an hundred score Aspers for him & his: three Capigi-Basbaes, and a hundred Aspers amongst their Capigi, lanisaries at the Gates: among whom are dailie giuen six hundred Aspers. The Sacates, that bringeth in Water, who haue in all forty aspers daily. These Damocels are thus seruiced and enfructured, till they be five and twentie yeares of age, the Matrons beeing their Mistresses, and the seruants are the verie yongest of them. When they are five and twenty yeares olde, if the Signior please to make no more vse of them, they are then married to the Spacchi, and

The Serraglio of Children.

There is another Serraglio neere to Pera, consisting of about four hundred Children, who are waged each one from sixe, to ten Aspers daily, and are clothed with Silke twice euerie year. These Children haue an Aga and Eunuchs, even as the great Serraglio hath, with Capagi, young Janissaries, and an hundred Maisters of diuers Artes and professions: amongst whom, are given eight hundred Aspers daily. They are not so Nobly borne, neyther of so seemelie preference or ingennity, as those that bee with the Signior: and yet neuertheless, many of them do attaine to greameffe: and choise is made among them of many, that are admitted to the great Serraglio. Especially, in Adrianople, called by some Andrianople, there is a Serraglio of three hundred Children with Wages, Aga, Eunuchs, Capagi, Janissaries, & two hundred Maisters, that haue amongst them, two thousand and eight hundred Aspers daily.

These children are of a third or more inferior quality; and therefore, are the more respectiue enstructed and restrained, even as all the rest (in ciuill manner) are of them, according vnto their spirit and behauiour, choise is also made for their further aduancement. There is likewise in the same Countrey, another Serraglio, newly made with a goodly great Garden belonging to it, and seated on the Riuer * Mariza: wherein there is about three hundred young Janissaries, who dispend each man yearly, a thousand and two hundred Aspers. They haue an Aga, allowed fortie Aspers, a Protogero, and a Clarke, each thirtie Aspers daylie. In diuers other places of Adrianople, there are Gardens, continually belonging (even as in Deposito) to a thousand and five hundred young Janissaries, selected out of these youths, as they grow to yeares and qualitie: hauing Agas, and Clarke on whom are bestowed fix thousand Aspers euerie year, or very little less.

There is then an Aga of the Azamogiani, called young vntutor or vnciuill Janissaries, that abide in Constantinople, and haue three score Aspers dayly: there being vnder his command, about five thousand of these wilde-headed Janissaries, who are clothed twice euerie year, and haue Maisters for their instruction; among whom, is spent tenne thousand Aspers yearly. These do attend about the Ship-wrights, bringing them wood to supply their building, and diuers other attayres beside. Some practise Cookerie, and so become seruants to the Janissaries, whereby (at length) they attain to bee Janissaries themselves. Euerie fourth year, the Signiour sendeth into Grecia and Natolia, to take and surprize Children from the Christians, and then ten or twelue thousand of these men are sent out at a time, that doth bring verie many christian children back with them: who are then conueyed vnto further in * Natolia, towards Bursia, now called * Mysia, or into * Caramania, where they are brought vp in digging the Ground, because they may bee invnd to labour, and also to learn the Turkish Language. These Children are thus kept, three or foure yeares; and then sent out to allure other in like manner: being then giuen to the government and Discipline of the Aga Azamogiani. No wages or allowance is granted to these by the Signiour, so long as they abide in Natolia, because they are both fedde and clothed at their cost, in whose seruice, they delute the grounds, or doo any other labours for them.

I thought good to make mention (in this place) of all the Serraglios, because they are as appendixes on that belonging to the Signior, and reckoned in the whole expences, returned into the books of charge, belonging to the great Serraglio of the Signior. Into which accounts are also called the Moneyes laid out for cloathing (twice yearly) the Basbaes, the Cadlescheri, the Differdari, the Beglerbeyes, and the Nessang-Basbaes: which expences, allowed to them that be extraordinary, do amount to, and exceed the summe of a Million of aspers yearly.

Of the Arsenale, or Store-house of Munition.

There is also an Arsenale on that part of Pera, not of anie bigge bigge or large circuit, which hath on the Sea-shore, to the number of ninetie two Arches, and containeth so little ground within: as not onely the Gallies, but also their other appurtenances, and Timber for worke, can hardly bee there placed. In this Arsenale, do about two hundred men labour ordinarily euerie day; who, with their Maisters and Overseers, haue daily two thousand Aspers among them. There are a thousand Asapi, who haue foure thousand Aspers among them.

Prati, or Workemaisters, to the number of fiftie, who when they are idle and labour not, haue sixe Aspers dayly, but when they work, twelue Aspers each man.

The Emino hath fortie Aspers, the Clarke five and twenty, with ten Clarke more vnder him, that haue an hundred Aspers daily. All these, when neede requireth, do performe their severall Offices. But if they intend badly vnto their Trades, or labour not effectually in the building of Gallies, whereby no such benefit ensueth on their paines, or like expedition as is vied among vs: if the fault be found by any Christian, he is well recompenced, and the other verie severely punished.

Of the Beglerbey.

A Commander ouer the Arsenale, and all the rest, there is one that is called the Beglerbey of the Sea, as much to say, as Lord of Lords, an Office newly created: for, in times past, he was alwaies wont to bee called Captain of the Sea. He that was Sanick of Callipolis, is and now the first that had the degree of Cairedimbi, was called Barbarossa, and afterward created the Beglerbey. To him is giuen the government of all the Nauie, and he hath in prouision euerie year (both in Lands and Ducates) fourtene thousand, collected on Rhodes, Negropont, and Mytelene, albeit he gathereth a double aduantage. There is not any other especiall man, appertaining to matters of the State, and charge of the Sea, that deserueth Annotation, and therefore comming to land affaires, I will proceed in this manner.

There is one called the Beglerbey of Grecia, wherein is comprehended all the Countreys which the Great Signiour enioyeth in Europe. This Beglerbey, is the greatest of all the rest, hauing in Lands sixteen thousand ducates yearly, but his benefite amounteth to twice as much more.

Hee sitteth in the Fortis, behinde the chiefe Basbae, and is of great reputation with euerie one. He hath beside his flauies (which are about a thousand) a Deferdaro, Landed at three thousand Ducates yearly: An hundred Clarke, that keep the Bookes and accounts of the Landes, assigned to the Sub-Basbaes, Cadi, Spachi, and others; among whom, is yearly giuen ten thousand Ducats. Thirtie leauen Sanicks, who are al vnder his obedience: and haue each man from five to twelue thousand Ducats yearly.

These men, are distributed into the Prouinces, where they remaine so long as please the Signior; and are thence translated or changed (as hee thinketh good) into some other Prouinces. Their Office, is to gouerne the Spachi, to see them well exercised in Armes, and to be kept in due obedience. Foure hundred Sub-Basbaes, who haue in Landes among them, foure hundred thousand Ducats. Thirtie thousand Spachi, who are Souldiers on Horsebacke, diuided for best order of seruice: partly of the Beglerbeis of Grecia, and partly of all the Sanicks of Grecia. They haue (one by another) in Lands, two hundred Ducats, and each one of them, for euerie hundred of Ducates, is bounde to keepe a man armed on Horsebacke, with his Launce: and beside the saide armed man, they haue, some two, some foure, and others five Seruants and Horses. These Spachi, are all flauies to the Signior, and the sonnes of flauies, and of Spachi.

Next, there are twentie thousand Timariotti, who haue from tenne to fortie Ducates in Lands, each man yearly: but because their compensation is not to an hundred Ducates each man, they are not called Spachi. These haue a horse and two or three seruants for each man, seruing distributively to all the Sanicks of Grecia. That which they call Timari, is the assignation or appointment of lands, the Rents, Fees, or Reuenues of which assignations are deriued, partly from the Fee-farme, letting, or deuising: but the greater renewmes granted from the Turkes as well as Christians, and from the leauies which are five and twenty Aspers (Per poule, as we vie to say) of the Christians only, and from the impositions on cattell, Trees, and other things, which taxes are ouer and aboue those, that are paid ordinarily to the Signiour. Sixteene thousand Archi, those are aduenturers on horsebacke, set downe thorough the Countrey of Grecia, and bounde to follow the warres without any pay; and therefore are exempted from all taxations:

the Cities and Townes are tied to find their prouision of victuals onely, from place to place where they serue.

There are in Grecia, that is, thorough-out the whole Countrey thereof in towns, Villages, and other places, as well of Turkes and Christians, enioyned to seruice, about the number of threecore & eight thousand.

Next, there are six Beglerbeyes in Asia, and one by himselfe in Egypt. The first, is called the Beglerbey of Natalia which (in elder times) was Asia minor: he hath fourteene thousand Ducates in Landes annually, but hee maketh much greater benefit thereof. Ths man hath vnder him, and in his government, Pontus, By-thinia, all Asia, Lydia, Caria, and Lyca; all which Prouinces (vnder one Name only) is at this day cald Natalia. His place in the Borta, is next to the Beglerbey of Grecia, and he hath (beside his own proper Slaues) aboue a thousand more vnder him; and twelue Saniaks landed from four to six thousand Ducats each man; Spachis, ten thousand; from five to ten Aspers, each man daylie, besides much more in Landes, and those serue vnder him, according vnto euerie ones degree.

The Beglerbey of Caramania, which anciently was Celicia and Pamphilia, with tennethousand Ducats in Landes.
Hee hath vnder him seauen Saniaks, from four to fixe thousand Ducates, each man in Landes. And fixe thousand Spachis, from five to tennethousand
Aspers, each man daily beside their lands.

The Beglerbey of Amasia and Tocato which was Cappadocia and Galatia, with eighthousand Ducates in Landes. Of Saniaks he hath eight from six to eight thousand Ducates each man in Landes:

Spachis, foure thousand, from fyue to ten Aspers daily each man, and lands.

The Beglerbey of Aladula, which is a place betwene Soria, Caramania, and Tocato, anciently called Paphlagonia, & is the one halfe of the lesser Armenia. He hath ten thousand Ducates in Landes, and Saniaks seuen (sometimes four, & sometimes six) from four to six thousand Ducates in lands: Spachis six thousand, from five to ten Aspers daily each man & lands.
In this Prouince of Aladula it is sayde, that when the Signiour was there, beside the stipendarie men, thirtie thousand other persones were obliged to ride on with him, at the charges of two villages onely.

The Beglerbey of Mesopotamia, vnder whom is the rest of Armenia Minor, and part of the greater, the other appertayning to the Sophie, and the Cordi, which confineth with Bagadeth, or Baldacco, anciently called Babylon. His Landes amount to aboue thirtie thousand Du-cates: and beside his owne slaues, hee hath more then two thousand. Vnder him are twelue Saniaks, landed from four to fixe thousand Ducates yearelie each man: Spachis, ten thousand, from ten to fyftee Aspers each man daylie, and verie well landed, because they liue on the Sophies Confinyes, with whome they haue continually bickerings.

The Beglerbey of Damasco, Soria, and Iudea. Landed foure and twentie thousand Ducates. Hee hath aboue two thousand slaues, and twelue Saniaks vnder him, Landed from fyue vnto seauen thousand Ducates: Spachis, twen-tie thousand, with Aspers from tenneth-ousand, to fyftee each man daylie, and good Landes.

The Beglerbey of Cairo, whose iurif-diction extendeth so farre as Amech, that is in Arabia, and the Arabians are possessed by the Signiour, in the same manner as hee is possessed of Albania, where hee challengeth no such obedience, as all other States and Countries doe yelde vnto him of his owne: yet, Arabia Felix is nowe in farre more subjection to him, then the other. He hath thirtie thousand Ducates in Landes, and Slaues aboue foure thousand. Sixteene Saniaks. Landed fix vnto eight thousand Ducates each one of them;

also confineth the plaine of Nasium, then toucheth Eslum and Ersun, which are principall places in Armenia Maior, and confine with the Hybers and *Geor-

and lesser, are many of the Cordi, people living in the Mountains, yet warlike

Asia, Cities, Townes, and Villages belonging both to Turkes and Christians, are seauenty two thousand, besides them in Egypt, whereof there are great store.

Of the Saniaks.

THE Saniaks assuredlie (as I haue alreadye saide) haue go-uernment in the Prouinces, committed vnto them by the Beglerbey, and are men of much reputation and great esteeme, especially in warlike occasions, whom I will also set downe, by the names of those places, which are gi-

CHAP. II.

Of the lawfull meanes, whereby to compass the esteeme and reputation, of being truly and excellencie Courageous & valiant.

A demand made to Augustus, in what hee worthy an-fwere.

T was demanded of Augustus, in what hee could best obserue the valour of a man of war. Thus (quoth he) when his effort and endeuour, hath relished (in common) with that of his Fellowes, but that some perticular matter appeareth in his attempt, which is no way due to the Armes general victory, wherein himselfe fighteth vnder the Captaynes charge, yet as if himselfe were no chiefe in respect. Such a man among the Albanians, was George Castriot, who hadde to deale with two of the verie greatest, and most dreaded Princes of the East against whose iniustice he opposed himselfe only, and manie times wonne verie goodly victory ouer them: yea, and compelling them sometimes to require peace, yet without anie other aide, then his owne perfect valour, accompanied with Diferetion and Equiry. Vvith yet (neuerthelesse) at length hee lost, both to his owne ruine and all Albania, by the enter-mises and medlings of the Pope, and of the Byshop of Durace, who constrained him (iniuriously) to breake his faith promised vnto Mahomet the second, being at that time in Warre against the Venetians.

He could freely anouch, that (as naked and all alone) hee vnderooke warre against the Great Signior, and that hee did it onely by the bright beautie of his courage: which could no way gather apprehension of surmounting, fighting in so iust a cause as the Christians generally quarrell against the Turk. And he might also as freely confesse, that the losse of his estates and of his sonnes (which hee had not till after his death) was onlie continued in the wombe of a Popes and By-shoppes rashnesse, who more enflamed with spleene, then strengthened with men of armes, ouer bare the modestie of this poore Lord, who died in a weake estate, yet not wholly troden downe; but in leaving nothing to his heires, whereby to make a fresh reply vpon Mahomet. Hee ruined Christianity in Greece, thorough the insolencie of these two men of the Church, who were more apte to command a fedition, then anie way to appease it, and had more Cowardise in giuing bad counsell to their friends then courage to helpe them out of the losses bredde by them, euen as in a fourle of infallible and vnderstandable misfortunes. Whereinto also they threw Hungary headlong, hauing counselled a young King vmadly to violate peace with the Great Turke: who (thorough this error onely) is at this day victorious, and remayneth possessor of the Hungars whole estate; & afterward fell vpon Austria, where hee hath (almost) as great a share as the Emperour. And he, though endued with perfect valiancie, hath had much payne and care to repaire those wide gaps and breaches, which these rash & presumptuous men made, without any necessitie or ouer profitable consideration vnto Christendome, but well-neere to the vi-

ter subuersion of the Eastern people in those parts.

Leonides also is one of them, to whom iustly may be attributed the glorie and perfection of intire man-hood, confidering, that without any curious inquisition for himselfe, eyther of good or euill, and carelesse of any intention for praye or misprision: he vnderooke to oppose himself (at the Thermopylae) against great king Xerxes, the astonisher of the world, who had filled all Greece with horreur and affrightments, both of Soldiers and horses, hauing no lesse prouision (beside this equipage) of power & fighting men on the Sea, which they did nothing else, but merely suite and beate with their Oares, euen as if hee would haue compelled the insensible Elements, to the vnderstanding and fauouring of his enterprizes.

All which notwithstanding, the worthy Leonides, accompanied onlie with foure thousand men, fought against him with such sprightly resolution and Vertue: that he left vs more matter and subiect of amazement, then capacity of imitation. I must fend ye amongst the Greekes, there to admire the whole History, which is the most remarkable in al Antiquity.

Brasidas must not be forgotten, who trauesied the Campe of the enemy, at the siege of Metone, and by a necessary endeauro, accomplished and woon immortall Fame and Renowne, which serueth yet (to this day) for a common Prouerbe, by the wonderfull perfection of his courage, whose picture is plentifull among the Greekes, only with this Motto.

Be as valiant as Brasidas.

Hyspermenes, Captaine to Darius, is worthy to holde ranke amongst them, that not onely had a beame, but an entire Starre of true valiancy. For, his Master, and the fortune of all Asia, bowing vnder the yooke of Great Alexander, he would not yeeld himselfe vnto the Conquerour, though his Castle was no longer holdable, the Cittie of Susa beeing brought in subiection to the Macedonians, to whom he made this answer. I do not resist against Great Alexander with any hope to overcome him: but only to Com-

quer mine owne misfortune, which may suffer me to dye, yet not at the discretion of any other, then of myselfe, who would force the fortune of your Master, if hope were answerable to my dutie. Yet, all that I can hope, is now not lawfull, because the royal Darius is dead.

Hyrtius Mela, purchased most signale glorie, in perfection of courage, when seeing the Cittie wherein he dwelt, called Praneste, wholly destroyed from the toppes to the bottome, and by his Guest Sylla, who (in the right of Hospitality) graunted him both grace and life: hee valiantly made refusal with this exclamation against the Tyrant. *It is possible, O thou most barbarous and cruel of all men, that thou wouldst be so bloody to thine Hostie, as to let him live, after so many cruelties which thy rage hath exercised on an innocent people? Thou art not pittifull to me, but onely to afflict me more, & wouldst bestow life on me once, so make me thereby dye a Million of times. Ait thou shaine my Companions, Fellow Cittizens, kindred and Friends, and wouldest thou now compel mee to live? Speaking these words, hee stabbed with a Poniard, Marius Latrius, the principall Instrument and Organ of Syllas cruelties; yea, the only Authour and motiue of Pranestes ruine.*

To whose Athes, this good and Famous Cittizen, sacrificed his owne life, by the death of the dearest Friend vnto the Tyrant, who instantly commanded, that hee should be massacred & throwr into the common Sinke, or Lay-fall of the City.

Quintus Curtius, that Honourable Romaine Knight, did a dede of absolute and respectiue manhood. For, when he had Learned from the Oracle, that the wide gaping Gulfe in the middest of Rome, which infected the Cittie with pestilence and most noysom aires, could no way be closed againe, but by the Voluntarie leaping of a man into that infernall and darke downefall, hee gladly threw himselfe thereinto, for to end the Romaines miserie, and sauing the liues of infinite people of all degrees. Cicero Cepio, made his manly courage to appear, in a matter worthy to be observed. For, when he beheld a huge mightie Elephant, stouping and make offer to feize on Domitian his Captaine: he preuented him quickly, by throwing himselfe vnderneath his bellie, which he slaid with so many strokes of his Poniard, that the Elephant being faynt with paine, violence of his wounds, and losse of blood, fell downe dead, and with his fall, crushed him also to death, who made no spare of his owne life, to speede his Generals with safety.

Fulvius Nafſus, was carefull to winne himselfe faire reputation in Arms, when the Romaines his Companions and war-fellows being vanquished by Hannibal at the Lake of Thrasymene, and flying away like Cowards, hee stept betwene their pursuite and attaint, allowing them time for running, by making a wall, as it were, of himselfe and his horse in a narrow passage, where the flight of the one side, and following of the other, was merely logd vp. The death of his horse was frightfull and terrible to the Horses of his enemies, and a safegarde also for himselfe, that he could not suddenly bee surprized by many Numidians. So that, thorough his long resistance, euen vnto death, he saued the remainder of the Romaines liues, that fled from forth their owne field of battell.

The valour of Matius Scenola cannot be confuted by eternitie of ages. For he (all alone) amazed a victorious Prince, ready to possesse himselfe of Rome, which must needs haue yielded in verie few dayes, or be compelled to render or ruin it selfe, by falling into the Tarquin handes, and the people of Hetruria, verie desperate enemies.

This braue and Courageous Scenola, (without any communication of his desseigne) threw himselfe into his Enemies Army, not as a friend, but as an open enemy. He fought for King Porſenna in all places of the field, he found his Royall Paullion, and slew the intendant on his affayres, as guesing by the riches of his habite, and the honour generallie done vnto him, that it had beene the King himselfe. Heereupon, hee was apprehended, and brought before the King Porſenna, who suddenly conuerting rage into admiration, and admiration into pardon, sent backe Noble Scenola to Rome. And which is much more, he raised his siege, as being fearefull, that some other courage, more fortanfull than that of Matius, should make a second attempt, and so proouee to bee his death indeede. But what gratitude did Scenola returne for this high fauor? that you shall perceiue by his owne wordes, which are these: Sir, for the kindness I haue receiued from your Maiessty, I purpose neuer to rest vntill thankfull. Let me then tell ye, that there are yet in Rome, foure hundred gallant young men, who haue protested they will kill you, or else to lose themselves in the aduenture.

Androcles the Samian, made the most aduantageable essay in Courage and perfection of valour, that anie of vs can desire to accomplish. For, being prisoner vnto Eupolemus the great Pyrate, who (vnadvisedly) had tolde him, that the verie next Night, hee purposed to surprise the Citie of Samos (as doubleste the enterprise would haue beene infallible, because all the ablest fighting Samians were restrained in Peloponnesus) hee preuented him halfe a day before, by giuing him so strong a blowe with a Candelstick vnder the eare, that so dyed the losse of his Countrey, and he together that had intended it. A matter questionlesse exceeding beleefe, that a man to saue a Citie, and the Inhabitantes, would run into such a certainty of death, whereto hee merely prostituted his life, because hee would not behold the place of his birth and Natiuitie, in the mercie of such an infamous and outrageous Pirate.

It is in such actions (you my braue masters, & dainty sweete perfumed Courtiers, that true courage makes it selfe to be seene: and not in committing affrontes and impudencies in our publicke streets, streets, in bawdy-houſes, yea, and in the frequent company of our best friends. We are like to Lyons, that make no acknowledgement of their fostering nurses, Gouernors or Guardians, if the colour and fashion of their garments be neuer so little changed. If all their humors that keepe vs company, do not iumpe and correspond with ours; immediately one is an Ass, another a Nouice; this fellow hath no complement, that neuer came where courage was; either hee is too fad, or too merrie, or else he hath no taste of our Court ayre: these are our most familiar discourtings; yea, and (many times) all that we can say. Make a little better search into your felues henceforward, for som such faire occasions to appear in, and that our outward shewe may not be by starts and passions, but on well formed and compleat designs. Regarding aduisedly, wherein we may be profitable to our Prince and Countrey; and thereon immediately resolve, to effect some such one thing or other, as may be worthy each of the other. Let it appeare (then) that we are Captaines indeed, lest we be not reckoned worse then filly Soldiers; and let it be seene, that we are necessary helps then, when men would iudge vs vterly vnprofitable. Let it be noted, that we haue courage then, euen when it faileth in our fellows: and yet without accusing them of any cowardise but only by attempting and executing more then they. Let vs then (in good earnest) performe the Rodomontado of Scipio Affricanus, who was wont to say: I seeke not to be known to man by man, but I would only make my selfe known to al the world.

Selenus hearing and perceiuing, that every man boasted and flattered him, that he was worthy to inherit the fortune and vertue of Alexander, returned this answer, You should bid me forsake the credulity, which you haue conceived of my valor, and then you would quickly emptie mee of courage in aspyring, when you but make me to remember Alexander, who performed more then a man can thinke, or anie way is able to do. He also said, Asia is yet the same field of battaile, where his Captains disputed about his heritage: but no man was to be found, that could answer his deservings. Let vs strive to imitate the valiancy, and necessary courage of Bertrand du Guesclin, who conquered the fortune, enuy, hazards of war, and furie of the victorious. Let vs read the histories of such as (heretofore) opposed themselves, against the good successe and vertue of the English men. Let vs not make esteeme only, but forme in example and singular study the valor of those ancient knights, that made this State of ours inuincible, and drev it out of decayed ruines, yea, out of a bottomlesse gulfe, wherein it appeared to be sunk, and (welneere) wholly swallowed in dooing so, it is not to be feared, that although we were no more then peticuler men, or Gentlemen, or Captaines, or Soldiers, yet we should attaine to worke woonders, and to arrive before the eyes of Commonweals, of Empires, Monarchies, and of their Princes, by whom (at length we should be admired, fought for, acknowledged, and recomenced, according to our owne wishes, and contrarie to the mediocrity of a wel gouerned hope. About all our courage declares it selfe, notcheable by a weak man, or one that is not so valiant as our felues; provided, that it be stil vnder our own charge, and can command in some such case, where it may well come off with dutie discharged. Otherwise, it will happen to vs, as Sophocles said:

Who lea his furious tongue walke liberally,
In checking some & censured quality:
And hath no reason but his owne bare braine,
Must looke himselfe to finde the like againe.

I haue seene some to misprize their own companions so mainly, that they offered much iniurie to Armes, and to the whole companie, whereof themselves were but poore dependants, seeming more in outward shew, then inward substance. For, a Vertuous Souldier, or he that is a man indeed, should alwayes bee comforted with iudgement, to supply the defects of such as are lesse then himselfe, and say; that although they bee not qualified in some one kinde, yet in some other, they owe nothing to him. One may bee a worthy Senator on Horseback, another on foote, euerie way equall to him, and so likewise in the other degrees of Manhood.

The cie is the most excellent part of the countenance, yea of the whole body: and yet notwithstanding, if a man were composed of eyes only, he would rather be a monster, then any piece of perfection & excellence. Let vs neuer note then, whether a man be inferiour to vs in anie one vertue: but rather consider, that manie other Vertues are needfull for vs, which we bestow no paines to purchase. Let vs expresse contempt of vile and detestable men, that serue as spurs to whoring, Sodomy, Flatterie, and softnesse, which (among vices) are not onely enemies to true and perfect valour, but to the generall society of men, and Authours of scandall to all Nations. Ignorance is not to be counted as a Vice, when it is accompanied with simplicitie and natural care for the auoyding of euill. But misprision of Vertue, and disdayne to compass it, is not onely an odious brutality amongst true men: but (which is much more) a crime punishable by fyre and sword, and all other inflictions Customarily due, to the perfluence of foule and guilty offenders or euil doers.

There is no necessity, that a valiant man should be apt to spleene or offence, through the riots of a Court Minion, of a Buffone, or of some young Sir, that hath not as yet learned how to be silent, or when to speake to purpose. A Gentleman of courageous perfection indeed, should bee of the humour of inuincible Hercules, of whom Homer deliuereth testimony in the first Booke of Odyssees.

He made no more account of frowards words, Than of the Flee, thatilly harme affords.
He suffered (in all) from common kinde:
And Fortunes frownes with him were as the wind.

Hee ought likewise, in all his other actions, to correspond with these precepts.

The constant wife, is euer like himselfe,
And neare shrinkes courage at the losse of selfe:
The death of Children cannot make him eye,
But, when help faile, Hope doth the place supply.

He should not conceite, that he is to deale with some small enemy, but rather to crie out with courageous Brasidas, of whom we haue alreadie spoken. O God, there is not anie thing of so weake power; but, if it darst defend it selfe: it could finde means whereby to preferre it owne life. Hee vied these words, in regarde of a Mouſe that bit him by the Finger, as he thrust his hande into a Fraile of drye Figges.

Demetrius being at Thebes, aduisedly noted a man that was Lame of all his

Members; and of whom, a Court Musk-Minion, made a subiect of scornfull Laughter, saying: This is not he, that hath (in this day) seraid our victorie, for Nature hath made him a Cripple. It is true (answered Demetrius) but how dost thou know, whether reuenge and disdaine haue any other weapons then hands onely, considering that mine hande doe no seruce at all for the surprizing of this Cittie?

CHAP. III.

Of those meanes which Princes ought to obserue, for being well attended vpon by Gentlemen and valiant Captaines of true perfection.

Princes that seeke the Conseruation of their subiects, and to leaue peaceable estates and dominions vnto their Children, ought Religiously to ordaine (next to the establishment of Iustice) that lawes should be allowed to periculer families, whereby children may bee educated euen from their infancy, as destinated to the inclination of such Artes, as (by manifest experience) their nature is subiected vnto, by the secret power of the more or lesse great blessings of God, and as it pleaseth him to extend or shut vppe his graces in one more then in another. Yet notwithstanding, as accommodating the diuers inclinations of men, to perfect that great harmony which maintaineth the world, and combineth human societie with so strict a bond, that (as it often cometh to passe) the very greatest haue neede of the meaneſt mens help, & al sciences, yea, euen the silliest, do tend to one selfsame end, by diuers precepts & contrary manners, yet all for the seruice of nature. For otherwise it would fall out, that common weales would conuert into deserts: and men (being apt but to one exercise only, how excellent soeuer) should haue no commerce together, but only in words & vfe of the Elements, which being wholly contrary (as it seemeth) in that common concord, for fortifying and maintaining this great building; and the lesser also, which boasts his owne mirror and liuely figure: doth teach vs, that wee ought to haue a generall vertue of profiting: and yet neuertheless, that it is necessary therein to make vfe of different effects and proprieties. This was well knowne to Hesiodus, when he said:

The very darkeſt ſullen night,
Helpes Nature with as deere delight,
As the brighteſt Sun-ſhine day,
That the Gods moſt honor may.
They both moſt neceſſary be,
Healthfull alike in each degree.

Let me then tell ye, that neuer (throughout all the ancient Monarchies) was the like inuented for the institution of youth; as the Discipline vſed by the Great Signior, towards the Amasogians and children of the tribes. The only euill (which is great, in regard of God, yet litle according to his estate & manner of governing) is, in that Christians are compelled to renounce their Religion, to embrace that of Mahomet, which (at this day) is the verie greatest, and most respected in all the East. Take off this defect, and then there is not any thing (I say) in the world, neither did all former ages euer afford the like. For you may behold in Constantinople, a Caravani or numberlesse troope of yong Boies, that are carefully tended by Maisters of all estates in al such things as they are most apt vnto, without any constraint of Nature, and for the space of a yeare, they are permitted all kinds of exercises; to the end, that becomming iudges of themselves, each one may afterward pursue his owne instinct, and best inclination. Some are found to be fit for warre, and they are as quickly recommended to Maisters meete for such instruction: yet with so great an obseruation, that time shall rather bee wanting, then care of their employment. Such are noted to please themselves, in the composing of ships or gallies, with paper sailes, and packe thred tacklings, or anie other husse, more assidue to their yong fancies, then others they are forthwith bestowed in the Sea Arſenale, & instructed in al affaires fit for the sea. These docible and debonaire spirits are differently employed: some to Philisck, others to priest-hood, & some beside to iudiciary seruices. Finally, such as are of so grosse temper, that no faire apprehension shineth in them, are employed in Gardening, a middle fort in Architecture, Painting, & Horology. They that seeme wholly disgraced by nature, are instructed in Carpentry, Taylory, and twilling of Cables, making of sailes and many other mean offices: which are by their aptnesse (in them) very gracious in the great Signiors respect, & begeth them both lands & perpetual penſions.

It is necessary in a Christian Oeconomia, to make the like practise, as we plainly behold in the fabrick of man. If we look vpon our bodies, or those of beasts, wee may perceiue many members to haue their distinct operations; without the intrusion of any others office, or that the enuy of inferiours discontent themselves at the dignity of their superiors, or any of them (either through discord or partiality) do refuse to lend one another their assistance. It behooueth I say, that in well ordered Commonweales, but especially among Christians, the same course should bee kept and maintained one with another: and although our charges and estates are different, yet that wee should euermore continue vnitied in our spirits; and with a iust desire, to supply the defects of our associates, and also to assist them. For it is very requirith, that we should be all like to trauailers, wandering by diuers wayes, yet all to arrive at one haven in the end.

But about all, a King ought to constrain his Nobility, to cause yong Gentlemen to be instructed in good Letters, for Capacity of administering the great and soveraign Magistracies of his kingdom: for thereby must needs ensue, that dignity will be more venerable, iustice in better respect, and iudgements more legitimate. We may see (to our shame) that at this day, the greater part of Magistrates in all our Parliaments of France, receiue their originall from plaine Pebleians and Yeomen, who neuer could haue honour so liuely imprinted in their brows and souls, as they that naturally are heires, to I know not what admirable and holy vertue, which (with no meane advantage) appeareth rather in yong spirits of Nobility, then in them of the thirde ranke, who alwayes haue but feeble Conceptions, and neuer eleuate or rayſe their thoughts, except it bee to euill, as either to sedition, or infamous and dishonest again. Whereto wee may adde, that their courages are cowardly, standing amazed and confounded at the smallest accidents; neyther are they so apt to outstand tumults and ciuill inconueniences, as Sun-bright Nobility, which euen of it selfe is engirt with some celestiall flame, that cauleth the vulgar people to apprehende more in their opposition against them, then in thousands of poore spirits that are of their owne quality, whose fathers at the best, were but Farmers, keepers of Granges and Dairies, which they helde at a certaine price, and annuall Rent.

Nobilitie then doth shame to it selfe, by not seeking to appeare in the venerable authority of the Senate; considering that Presidents and Councillors in Courtes Soueraigne, seeme to be voluntarie Tutors to the Prince, and as Noble Guardians to his innomable Greatnesse. By this means they would free them from the gripes of a hyge heape of wretched Officers, and they should neuer be subiected to the mercenary iudgment of their subjects, who mistake themselves verie suddenly, and dispose both of the liues and goods of Gentlemen drawn into action: euen like to their Shop-keeping fathers, in their esteeme of paltry wares. In this manner, the King should haue a more found, sure, and strong election of men meete for warre, which now adayes hee cannot haue: because Gentlemen doo (indifferently) employ all their fonnes to such trades, as is impossible in conueniency for them, considering the dissimilitude of their natures, repugnancy of their humors, and contrariety of their spirits, which is more or which is lesse apt vnto one office then to another. I doubt not, but at length thorough the great scarcity to be found of martiall minded men: all sorts of Gentlemen will not know howe to appeare in the diuersitie of warre hazards, whither they be ciuill or strange.

Yet I may verie well say, that there are many carried thereto, contrarie to the first conception of their Genius, who (neuertheless) being apt to diuers things: can accommodate their spirits therto, albeit it is much lesse natural to them, then something els. This is the reason why Aristotle saide, that lukewarme water was cold, in regard of that which is boiling, and yet esteemd hot, in consideration of that which is ycie. This is asmuch to say, as that the moderat spirits of gentlemen, peraking in the thirde or fourth degree of heat, may serue for warre. If so much better then should they be apt and profitable for the assayres of State and policy. Such also, as incline to the fourth or fifth degree, do perake of an influence more strong and pregnant for war, then anie other exercise else. This is to bee discerned in the Nature or cale of our infancie, which telleth vs by our yongest carriage, what will be the inclination of our most folide age, and inciteth, nay, merely exalteth vs (with a certaine violence) to acknowledge that which shall (one day) be either necessary or profitable at the least. According to the saying of Hesiodus.

All Infant Pleasures, Plays, and Toyes,
All youthfull Apish tricke and toys;
Our Cradle-power, which breaks no bands:
Our first essayes in ripper houres,

Princes and great Lordes ought to instruct their Pages in such exercises, as do best answer vnto the condition of true Gentlemen, and should make no vse of their seruice, in seruile, base, or abiection occasions: as in these daies they do, without any care of government, or prescribing them some honest forme of conduction. I protest, as I see the carriage of these ill taught times, I had much rather place my son or Kinsman, with a Spittle Maister, or Hospitall Keeper, then with a Prince: considering how badly Pages are entertained, and so slenderly entrusted in anie vertuous actions, as wee cannot distinguish them from common Lackeyes, but by the outward appellation, being else employed for all vses; euen all one, with the verie foulest condition Varlet of the house. One while they are Gourmands, by some Groom of the Chamber; another while beaten by a Scullion of the Kitchen: and beaten they bee at euerie moment, but not to any good purpose; and more for Ceremony, then with any vertuous intent of their Correction. They are baselie reputed, and badly nourished, whereby they constrain them, yea, and of themselves are merely constrained to forget and and decline, from their owne first faire and naturall disposition, to sharke and get by vnlawfull meanes, such things as are most needfull for them. Some teach them how to be dissolute at their Table, for a Trencher can be no sooner offered: but it is presently swept ouer with the Nails and Fingers; yea, with the whole hand, and tongue too sometimes. Afterward, perhaps Nature beinge carfe halfe contented: poore Youthes, they trot after their Galloping Maisters, who rid a great deale of ground in a very short while, wher their Pages follow not so fast with their feet, as with frequent and disordered passions. By which meanes, Youth neither do or can learne any thing among them, but forgetfulness of vertue and good manners, by the example of indiscretion & folly in their Maisters.

Moreover, we may see our streetes crowded with a heap of young Gentlemen, who haue much ado to maintain themselves: and yet they must haue attending Pages, to trudge with Tokens or Loue-scripts, to Madame or Mistris Mammy-better. And then come they posting after, euen through the chiefest parts of the Citie, not shaming to let the world see their gracelesse insolence. Now, the very great hurt of all, consisteth in this, that the whole multitude of Pages (as well those about Princes, as them that follow great Lords and lesser Gentlemen, being themselves ill bred, and worse discipline:) are compelled to bastardise their naturall splendour, by putting on a new habite, of disordered, shamelesse, and monstrous behauiour: that (afterward) they looke rather like wilde and barbarous Albanians, then any true borne Gentlemen of blood. By which meanes, Common-weales are afflicted, Kinges lowly serued, Magistrates scarcely obeyed, the Lawes dispised, and confusion embraced.

Beside, a Gentleman brought vp out of the Princes eye, beginneth to grow disdainfull of him, when hee once apprehendeth (and maliciously enough) that he is not in any obligation to him: he waxeth proud, and such a man soone forgetteth all proportion and measure. The very highest degree of such a mans seruice, is to domineere and rule, to mount into the Seat of his Maister, Lord, or Prince: for, whatsoever hee seeth beneath, or on either side, is nothing to him, and the World (all this while) honoureth none more, then such a man.

Howbeit, the Paganes did euermore acknowledge, that Generositie is more familiar with good, then vicious men, and that valour is more domestick and naturall to a man than is temperate, peaceable, and milde, then the proud and ambitious, who is of the condition of a weake stomack, which couseth more meat, then it can resolute and digest. Princes ought to be respectiue, of such a rich and sanctified education, and not admit such ouerture to the designs of Gentlemen; ouer greedie and countous, in aspiring daily to some nouell degree, yet no one of them seeing the way, by the eye of his owne power, or Iustice of his merit. Thus all runs wrong, for God blesteth no Mans actions, but his that doth well, & with-draweth his eye from wicked inclinations: who will haue no other King, then the State, or any Law, but such as may bring him in some benefit. Vertue is the Primum mobile of courage, that seemeth (by his owne power) to attract all things to it selfe, that is required in the perfection of valour: which is onely borne to be entrusted, and entrusted to serue, and (by seruice) to ytild it selfe not onely beneficall, but necessarie also.

Princes in these daies, are faultie of too little care, that Nobility should be more forward in the exercise of vertue: and themselves also doe lend most employment, to such as are more commended to them, then fit for vs. Vertue giueth no more hire to the intercessions of a Courtier, made honorable and rich altogether; then to one of her owne breeding and bringing vp. Hence should arise all the Officers of a Crowne, and hence are aborted all the Creatures of a King, that leaneth wholly to passion, & nothing to vertue. He ought then to hold the list in his owne hand, to fore-see each man in his profession and degree, and hence he will deriue: that his Financiers or Cherker-men, shal bee without fraud; his Councillours free from partialitie, and his Gouernours voyde voysde of faction. All their ayme and scope, will be to iustifie by their effects, the good choyse and lawfull election, which the Prince hath made of such persons. And although they should come somewhat short of merit, yet would they stretch their endeavour, to deserue the voyces of the honestest Men, and the grace of their second Creator.

When a Man of Honor is aduanced, the people doe looke on it with a pleasing eye, and discernce (therein) the wisdom of their Prince: who instantly is exalted to admiration; from admiration, to intire loue of his Subiects; and from thence to the blessing of GOD, who plaubly entertaineth the fustriages of the Common-weals suppliants, for the health and preseruacion of their Prince. Contrariwise, all is in disorder, when bad men hold the best places of credit: then the people mutiny; the Princes iudgement is scandalized; common affection cooleth; the curse of God embraceth, and bringeth the latest cauer that cleaueth to this euill. Above all, I wish that he, of whose seruice a Prince shall make vse, should haue the feare of God before his eyes, without which: all Wisedome will easily be conuerted into craft; valour into violence; Iustice into Crueltie; Pollicy into Monopolies; and without which (I say) all those things which heauen hath best bestowed on vs for the best, will only be Instruments of the worst. Without this, our very affections, are as so many violent torments, and cruell Hells both to the Soule and Body, and our reason is nothing else, but meere trumpery and deceipt. O what infusions could I wish to some Machiuelists, who maintaine, that such as bee bound to Conscience, reason, and Lawes, are no meete Seruants to attend on Princes: but that flattery is to be preferred, both above Lawes and Nature.

If it be so, that those blessed Quires of Gods Booke, do beare witness, that No Man can serue two Masters. Commanding vs also else-where; To feare God, and honor the King: it is then a matter very euident, that the most part of all other Seruants, doe yeilde nothing else but eye-seruice only. And this is the reason, that Kings are euill serued farre off, and betrayed in secret. They that being Seruants to their King, will also do seruice to God; they euermore walke after one manner. They serue to content their Conscience, and not they eye of their Maister. They propose God before their eyes, as both the Beholder of their actions, and searcher of their hearts. They waite for his grace and Wages: being assured of recompence and reward on his part, when they doe their dutie, although it bee to vnthankfull Maisters. This is the Seed from whence Kings should gather all hope, of being maintained, strengthened, and well serued. From hence ought they alwaies to chuse their Councillors of State, and al the, to whom they will communicate their power and authority.

The Prince that desireth to accomplish all these things, both for the quiet of his owne Conscience, and happy administration of his Estate: must be sure to haue no Flatterers about him, vnprofitable persons, Loue-Brokers, voluptuous and Epicurian Courtiers, that make the publike Purse, serue for the expenses of their pericular Luxurie, gurmmandize and pomp, while (in the mean time) the virtuous, and such as haue deserued much better of the State: remaine far enough off, slenderly known, without Grace, and without Honour, (I meane no other, then that of their owne proper merit) who neuertheless are (oftentimes) inestimable, and more worthy of administration; then of the blind and briske (let mee not say faint-hearted) fauours, which the Princes of these times vse towards some young Gallants, that smell more of Ciuets, then the Cannons Powder, and much more of the Woman, then Man: yet vnworthy of eyther Sexe, their depraued Natures are so highly subiect to infamous Vices, which funder them frō those common proprieties, that do let vs know a Man, to be truly a Man, and a Woman, truly a Woman. I am perswaded, that it was of them, which that Great Man spake, on the Grecian Theater, saying:

Kings looke themelues, that doe in you delight.

But why do I seeke to enstruēt Gentlemen, seeing they strue (as much as possible that they may) not to be- hold any lawfull action: because their Soules should bring no iudgement against themselves for the excellencies which they haue committed? It is enough for them, to make some essay of that which is written in Saint Iohn, to wit. That if all Testimonies of Scripture, and lawfull imitations doe faile vs: yet notwithstanding our Conscience, and Nature is selfe doth sufficiently shew, what is our dutie. Looking thorow all Windowes of Equity, Iustice, and Reason; Pagane Authours tooke knowledge, yea, and did set down in Writing: that there were Furies, who inflicted reuenge on the iniuries, as also on the finnes of Men, which is nothing else, but the torments of vile and wicked Consciences.

This is the worrne whereof the Prophet Esay speaketh; it is the W orme (I say) that neuer dyeth, but byteth and teareth without intermission. These are the Tapers and Torches, which terrifie and burne our hearts: This is that which is called, the remembrance of our wicked and abominable liues. Epicurus himselfe, being an enemy to the Deitie, could yet confesse, that the very great paine of such as sinned, was, that they had sinned: for the punishment of wickednesse, is wickednesse it selfe. The Man that is attainted with this great scruple in his Soule, is of no worth, neither can be valiant, or come any thing neere to that happy quality. For he that is a perfect knight indeed, ought not onely to win the Conquest of his Enemies: but must also triumphe ouer the Passions of his owne Soule, which must be cleane, and exempt from all vnlawfull desires, or absurd and base villainies. That which was presented to the Emperour Theodosius, is well worthy to be followed by him, in whom I would decypher perfect valiance, as thus.

Though in rich India, or a further Land,
Thou wast adored, and dost o're men command,
Although the Medes and Arabs roupe to thee:
Yet, if not iust, valiant thou canst not bee.
Thou art no Man, if terror sway thy Soule,
Nor can be valiant, if weakne thoughts controule.
Such follies leaue thee to thy selfe alone,
In torment, fadned, and deliquishing moone.
But when thou dost o're-maister fond desires;
Then thy faire Soule to her true pitch aspires,
And makes thee meet for Kingdomes, or all Nations;
Hauing once conquered thine owne private passions.

Verue doth meane fight, but for successe,
If then baste thougths the Soule of Man possesse,
And be not crod downe, at their first arise:
In suffering them, the greatest perill lies.
Then boldly check thy inward dull conceits,
Shun those deepe blames that on neglect awaites,
Let not the Lawes reprocue thy care and heed:
Shalt thou be a Man, in name and deed.

This other of Clandian, is very little different.

If diuision, which is tearmed valiance,
Be not in verue: then vs impudencie.

Knights of greatest courtesie, Capitaines most remarkable, and Kings of highest fame, did euermore accompany their Armes, and strengthen them by a gentle and liberal knowledge in Vertue: whereby they could best decipher such about them, as were most or least apt for Warre seruices, making distinction of their valour, according to the circumstances and ordinary manner of Souldiours; were it in apparrelling themeluss for fight, or in firming the breaches happening in their Field, or in exercising and applying themelues to some other seruice, conuenable to the time, place, and commandeement giuen them. By this meanes, Men of merit addressed themelues vnto the Prince, who made profession to be careful and respectiue, of euery particular wife and hardy mans courage, and vpon good note thereof: to render double recompence, that is to say, by benefits, and by iust commendations. For hee must neuer hope to see virtuous Men flourish, or their actions in true appa- rance: if they be not recompenced, and some way satisfied.

The Prince that desireth to finde valiancy in his men of Warre, ought to imitate the discipline of Alexander Sene- rus, the Romaine Emperour: who would haue his Souldiours to be well armed, wel enstruēt, and continually to haue some Mony in their Purses, but (by no meanes) of that humour, as Aphrates the the Capitaine wished his Warre-followers to be, to wit; avaritious, amorous, and full of voluptuousnesse. For he was wont to say, that as they were persecuted by those three violent passions; even so would they prostitute themselves, and forsake all perill, to satisfie their own desires, and the free compassing of their base desires.

True it is, that Cesar wished his Souldiers, to have faire and rich Armes, because they might have the more occasion to be knowne, for auoyding the shame of flight; & not to fight so much for the worth of their Armes, as for their liues. But he was deceived, considering as Thucydides saith. The valiant Man is alwaies himselfe, and his vertue appeareth much more, when he is disadvantaged and afflicted: then when he strengtheneth himselfe with some apparance, if it be not necessary.

The Great Turke, who continueth (even at this day) the Military Arte of the Romaines, and causeth it to be much more observed, then the Spaniards doe, (who are in very deede, but Apes of the Turkes conduct) hath so admirable an observation: that a troupe of an hundred thousand men, do resemble rather a peaceable Congregation of people, assembled together to heare a Sermon; then an Army to fight against the World. The Great Turke (I say) is euen more accompanied with an incredible multitude of valorous men, which he winneth out of Tartaria, and atreat his Wages and endlesse pay; like as the Switzers are in France. He helpeth himselfe also with the Souldiers of Mysia, of Europe; of the Albanians, sometimes called Epirotes; of the Thessalians, now called Enlaues; and of the Arabes, that teame themselves Alarbes. All these glorious Nations (for their Armes) are so certified by the Othomans, that there is no day ouerpasseth them: but they doe receiue some honourable and notable reward and respect, from the Generals of the Turkish Armies, who employ them at euery moment, in verie great and perilous enterprises, wherein (nevertheless) all these Men do carrie themselves, with such prudence and iudgement, as is not to be a little wondered at.

New and fresh Armes is provided them, vpon the quickest and suddaineſt returne, and albeit their successe hath not answered to the premeditated designe: yet, in the very least performance of well doing, they are not left vnacknowledged, but ved, as if the attempt had bene happily ended. Hence ensued those great Stratagems at Modon, Chaly, Siger, Schafforin in the George, and at Trauelis. In all which places, they surmounted the valour and fortune of the Romaines, the hardnesse of the Parthians, and the cunning and industry of the Christians; whose troups resembled Carauans of Goates, that make motion with their mouths on all things indifferently, how profitable or hurtfull fouer they be.

The Perſians, who seeme to be more ciuillized then the Turkes, and yet (notwithstanding) are lesse proud and capable of great matters, doe shut vp their Children of good Birth, in certain places of the Field-Country, which they call Spitaf Kier Belti, that is to say; The entrance into the Signeury of vertue, where they haue Maisters to instruct them, according to their inclinations: but at the charges of their Parents, vntill such time as it may be known, whether the Youths will afterward be beneficiall to the Sophy, or no. For thenceforward, they are taken and maintained at his expences, to the number of two thousand, and are then called, Spiters Kieram Sophis, that is to say; Children of the Signior Sophy.

These people, whom we tearme barbarous, and their Kings, called Tyrants by vs; I feare shall find (at the latter day) more grace in the grace of the Soueraigne Iudge: then the Princes and people of Europe, who make no account, or verie little (at the most) of the Youth that is vnder their Empire, or the order and discipline Oeconomall of the State, which is much lesse observed with them. I will not I say then among the common people of Asia; but euen among the Toupinabons & Magistrats, who doe instruct their Children in the Historie of their Ancestours, the Father telling to his Sonne; what fights they haue had against their Neighbors; what victories were obtained; and the routes which they endured. All these things are deliuered with fatherly exhortations, hortations, to continue them in well doings, for publike benefit, and to shew themselves ielous imitators of their fore-goers, who (they tell them) are in Heauen, full of Glory and Triumph: because they continually maintained the cause of their Country, and defended their poore Cottages, from the inuasions of their ordinarie Enemies.

In former times, the Parthians had such diligent care, for husbanding the Spirits of their young Nobility, that the more part of their Lawes discouraged on nothing else. By which means they were inuincible, and euermore equall to the Romaine Empire, yet there was more Soueraignety, and lesse Barbarisme, in the commaundes of the Asiatics, their Kings: then in the Empire of the Cesars, who were (almost all of them) so abominable, as all the Vices of the World, did beget their most monstrous qualities, from the imperfections of those Tyrants of Europe.

Finally, they lost Europe at length, yielding it to the transport of the Mahometanes, who keepe it (at this day) more strongly, then we doe the rest. And, if we observe no better discipline, then that which now wee doe: it is to be feared, that before many yeares passe ouer our heades, the Rheme will scarcely serue for Frontiers to the Othomans Monarchie, who extend the Threds of their ambitious couerousnesse, not onely vpon Germanie, which can hardie defend it selfe; but on the rest of Christendomes happinesse; yea, ouer all that is further off from the East, then the East is from their felicitie, and the West from ours. Because it is impossible, yea, almost vniust, that the hand of God should bee succourable to such, as observe no Equity; but concerne his Lawes, despise Soueraigne Magistracy, making themselves in all, and by all, vtterly vnworthy of his diuine blessings, which must be fought for with humble and lowly harts. The Paganes themselves do confesse.

Ouer and beside all, the onely meanes to haue men valiant, is, to make no account of Cowards, and such as are but prating companions, nor to admit them (in any manner whatsoever) to any Offices and dignities of War: though (in these daies) the quite contrary is practised: for Regiments are given to simple Clearks, that surrender them againe the very same day; Treasurers places are bestowed vpon impudent persons, and the Princes lodging is kept by such, as scarcely are any found well-willers. All degrees are valued by Money, buying & selling are openly allowed, so that there is no recompence or respect made of true valor; onely hee that hath where-withall, may be a Governour in some place, which he may likewise set againe, to the most-giuer. In all the Empire of the Turke, which is more (by halfe) then the Romans had: there are but 216. Forts or Holds, which also are seated on the Frontiers, as well of the Sea, as of the firme Land. At euery three yeares end, the Governours are changed, or receiue new power to bee longer continued. They can receiue no other dead-payes, then the Soldiers of the old bands, who being ouer-spent in war, or laden with wounds, or crazed by age: are to be receiued into the Grand Signiors Fortresses, where an honorable pension is bestowed on them, which they tearme Timar. Hereby ensueeth, that all men are made vife of in this bright Monarchie, for such as are aged people, gouty, or lame, do keepe the walles, while the younger doe fortifie the Prince and his Lieutenants in the Field, hoping (one day) to haue entertainment in those Fortes. By this means, Souldiers are neuer in miserable quality in the great Turks iurisdiccions, which maketh them the more hardy & valiant: knowing, that (in their retreat from seruice) they shall neuer want, by any difcommodity (whatsoeuer) happening to them.

For, beside those Fortresses on the Confinnes of Asia, and Europe, there are five Mosques in Notolia, some whereof were builded by the Mahometane Emperors, and others by their Bashas, and the least reuenues belonging to any one of them, is forty thousand Ducats of annuall Rents. There is a publike Schoole, where the poore are instructed, and beside, there is a verie goodly House, well fitted with most exquisite Bathes, where,

All honourable charges of men for the Warres, are imparted to such, as haue best reputation among the Souldiours. If at any time some offence be committed, vnworthy of the former opinion conceived of mans valour, he is dismissed from his authority: yet without any infamous note, or desperate hope of being againe reintegrated, by course of time, which moderateth all things, and changeth the counsels and humours of Princes, who appeare (by an indifferent chastisement) to haue satisfied both the Law and their owne lenity, in one selfe same subiect.

Alra-Bashee repelled from his place, and Sinan-Bashee advanced thiereto.

Thence came it, that Bashee-Abra, hauing disordered himselfe in the Georgie, was repealed and disgraced, and Sinan-Bashee placed in his stead, who succeeding in the room, of a Man ill handled for his faults: stood bound (by all these considerations) to behaue himselfe to well, that the Great Signior could receiue no mislike in his cariage, for hee regained what his Predecessour had lost, beating and chasing the Persians with so large an vny of vengeance; that his Military seruices performed in the vpper Asia, were little indebted to the of Alexander the Great, although he was of no such temper. Longtime after, returning home with triumph and victory, in the Cittie of Constantinople: he was slaine by a Foole, that begd an Almes of him, and which Sinan made himselfe ready also to giue him. Wherein may bee obserued, that this great and fortunate Mirour dyed, in doing the Office of a Christian, and not of a Tuske, that is to say; in giuing an Almes, and rendering Iustice to the Porta. After his death, the other was admitted to his charge againe; and then hee redeemed the iniuries formerly received, by such worthy actions of seruice, as surmounted the obliuion of his first defects.

Sinan-Bashee being dead, Alra-Bashee was readuanced.

I referre now to your owne iudgements, if these people (which we call barbarous) may not iustly (and in good earnest) make vs blush, considering, that the greater part of them, which hold great charges among vs in these daies: doe declare themselves vtterly vnworthy of them, and because there is no punishment for them, men are as little regarded, as a Varlet of the Chamber. Hence ensueth it, that the Prince is miserable, and confusion is so great among his Followers, that were it not for the huge throng and multitude of Noblemen, which ardently accost and company him, to couer this imperfection: within short while we should be buried in the State ruines, which in the end must needs fall out, if no better order be prescribed for Souldiours, and some endeavour vsed, for maintaining daily a sufficient number, that may serue as a bound or banke, against the tempestuous billowes of Strangers, who doubtlesse will triumph ouer vs continually, vntill we haue provided for this important necessity, wherof (notwithstanding) no account at all is made.

Though it bee most true, that the Romaine Empire began to loose itselfe, from the day when Military policy was violated, for afterward, they that durst not so much as dreame of Italye: made no doubt at all to assault it, yea, and to force it, to the shame and confusion of them, that contemned the order religiously obserued by their Predecessours. The infamous corruption in State Councillours of Princes, was the only cause thereof: yet some others are perswaded, that the vniuersall generous ruine, ensued particularly to them; when they sold their Country to their enemies, as Ennas and Antenor did, of whom (I think) they are descended. For all was set to sale for Money, both the offices of Magistrats, and seats of Iudges.

And euén so it is in these daies, honours of Warre cannot be had, without such manner of commerce, so that (at length) publike commodity will be brought into a monstrous Chaos, the first Sepulcher of the Elements. Armes will be made subiect to Money, euén as they were among the Romaines, whose Prætorian troupes sold the Empire for good ready Money, as bringing it to the common Out-cry, fairest offerer, and latest latest Purchaser. So that, it may be said of France, as a Prince of Affrica was wont to do of Rome: Oh goodly City to be sold, if any man had Money enough to buy it. And very certaine it is, that if the King of Spain had neuer so little intelligence in this Kingdome, as hee hath had too much: he should not neede to desire it. He can forme Creatures enow heere, to be buyers for him, and (it may bee) that haue long since bought the Pillers of the State, with Monies meere for so glorious an exploit. We are all carried thither, the Market beginneth to open, the Traffiques hope is not a little, neither is there any danger in the desseign, for impunity raigneth generally. The wicked doe thrust good men out of all fauour, accounting them vnprofitable Members, and desirous of no Name, among such a number of strange Cabalists, who thinke France to be no better then a Mart or Staple; where gaine is preferred before Honor; Money before Merit; an Enemy before a Friend; a Seruant before the Son of the Family; and a Seruant, before a Domestick borne.

Behold what may be said, on the behalfe of perfect valour, and the solid or necessary means, for the gaining of worthy men: to make Kinges triumph, perpetuate their estates, and leaue eternitie to their Monarchies. My hearty wish and desire is, that some benefit may eniue by my poore trauaile (as infallibly will) to our French Nobility, if this may be communicated (how little focuer) to the eyes of their fouls, which hauing heretofore been eleuated to the honest search of vertue, and especiallie that which should be most familiar with them: will render them absolute in the perfection of this discourse, wherof I count more to be the God-Father, then the true Father indeed. Because all the wonders of honor, grace, and valiancy therein alleaged, haue bene selected from the Oracles and Miracles of the only renowned Princes in the World, of whom I haue figured the very fairest conditions. CHAP. IIII.

Of Wifedome, Prudence, and Policy; and what difference is betwene them. Also, a consideration of the difficulties & dangers, incident to masters of State.

Because our present intended discourse, may stand cleare from obloquy and detection: we wil first declare what Wifedome is, and wherein it consisteth. For Pollicie being but (as it were) a branch thereof; it shall therefore be conuenient, first to consider the nature of the root or Tree, that thereby we may know the property of the branch. And to this end, it is to be considered, first whence wifedome is, and afterwards, what it is: whereby it will appeare, that true wifedome, and (consequently) true Pollicie, can no way stand with wickednesse.

For the first, it is euident, by the doctrine as wel of the best Philosophers, as of our holy Scriptures; that wifedome is the especiall gift of God, which Plato taught, not onely concerning absolute wifedome (consisting in the speculation and knowledge of diuine things) but also of ciuill or political Wifedome and Prudence: which he saith. Is neither giuen to man by nature, nor taught by Philosophy, nor got by industry or experience. And therefore in his Book of Political Lawes, he craueth it of Almighty God as his especiall giue, acknowledging: That no humane wit can (without his particular inspiration and assistence) ordaine sufficient lawes for the gouernment of a Commonwealth, as partly hath bene elsewhere approved.

This also our Scriptures doe abundantly teach, deriuing all wifedome from Almighty God, as from the Fontaine thereof, saying. Omnis sapientia a Domino Deo est, All Wifedome cometh of the Lord. Et a Deo profectus est sapientia, &c. Wifedome came from GOD, and it shall abound in the mouth of the faithful man, and the gouernor or Lord of all will giue it thee. And againe, *Fons sapientia verbum Dei in excelsis. is the word of God on high. That is to say, the Son of God, who is therefore called Sapientia Patrie, The Wisdome of God the Father. For this cause S. James aduertieth vs. Si quis vestrum (saith he) indiget sapientia, postulet a Deo, & dabitur ei. If any of you lacke wisdome, let him aske it of God, and it shall be giuen him. And Salomon craved it of Almighty God, and obtained it. And Iesus the Son of Sirach laudeth of himselfe. Cum adhuc iunior sum, &c. When I was yet yong, or euer I went abroad, I desired wisdome openly in my prayer. And I profited by her, therefore will I ascribe the glory vnto him that giueth me wisdome.

Seeing then true wisdome is (according to the opinion both of Philosophers and Diuines) and especiall gift of Almighty God: it must needs follow, that it haue no communication with sin and wickednesse, or with any thing offensive to God. And therefore Plato (with all his followers) doe teach, that for as much as true wisdome is nothing else, but (as it were) The light of the chiefe and true good (that is to say, of Almighty God) reflected vpon the soules of Men: no Soule defiled with sinne, is any whit more capable of this light of true Wisdome; then the ayre (being ouer-cast with Clouds) is capable of the Sunne. And this Doctrine of Plato agreeth notably with our holy Scriptures, which teach, that In maleuolam animam, &c. Wisdome wil not enter into a wicked soule, nor dwell in the body that is subiect to sin. And therefore it is said, That God giueth wisdome to such as feare him.

This will be more euident, by the consideration of what Wisdome is, and wherein it principally consisteth. Therefore, first to speak of the Doctrine of our holy Scriptures, and after, of the opinion of Philosophers: Iob hauing asked, Where is wisdome found, and where is the place of vnderstanding? Answereth himselfe, saying; Ecce timor Domini, ipsa est sapientia, & recedere a malo intelligentia. Behold, the feare of Gods is wisdome it selfe, and to forsake euill is vnderstanding. Thus saith Iob; which the Preacher confirmeth, saying, Omnis sapientia timor Dei, et in omni sapientia dispositio legis. The feare of Gods is all Wisdome, and the performing of the Law is perfect wisdome. That is to say (as we read in the Greeke Text) Faciens operatio legis, The doing & working of the Law signifying: That all wisdome consisteth in the feare of God; and in the execution of his Law, which is as much to saie, as in the keeping of his Commandements, whereof three reasons may well be giuen.

The first, because hee which feareth God, & fulfilleth his commandements, hath the ground and principall part of wisdome. for in all his actions he principally respecteth two things: the one, the glory of God (for which; Man and all other creatures were chiefly ordained) and the other, the eternall good of his owne soule, which most importeth him. For, as our Saviour saith; What shall it profit a Man, though he should winne the whole world, if he loose his own soule. Therefore the Preacher saith well, Sapientis est anima sua sapientis: He which is wise, is wise for his Soule. The second reason is, for that he which feareth God, and keepeth his commandements, doth therein work wisely, not only for his eternall good, but also for his temporall and worldlie good: Seeing thereby hee consecrath himselfe, in the protection and fauor of him, who is the Author and Giuer as well of the one as other, and hath an especiall care of such as feare and serue him. For, as the Psalmist saith, Oculus Domini super metuentes eum; The eyes of the Lord are vpon them that feare him. Et aures eius in preces eorum, and his cares are open to their prayers. Such also is his loue towards them, and the regard he hath of them, that, as our Saviour saith; Hec numbreth the very haire of their heads. Et custodit (saith the Psalmist) omnis ossa eorum; he keepeth all their bones, to the end, that there shall not any one of them perish.

Therefore, as no man is, or can be counted wise or happy, who (by contempt of Almighty God, and breach of his Commandements) exposeth himselfe to his indignation, whereby both he and his may vtterly perish: so he likewise, that by the feare of God, and obseruation of his Law, obtained his continuall fauour and protection, is not only truly wise, but also truly happy. Vvich Aristotle himselfe acknowledged, who teaching, that true wisdome and felicity, doe chiefly consist, in the contemplation of God and heavenly things: affirmeth the wisest man to be the happiest of al other, because he is most gratefull to God, best beloued of him, and protected by him continually.

The third reason, why the feare of God, & the keeping of his commandements, is true wisdome, is: because the Law of God is the true rule, whereby al prudent actions are to be measured, for it comprehendeth in it selfe, and teacheth all true vertue and goodnesse, without the which, there can be no true Prudence, as shall appeare by the circumstances due and requisite thereto, according to the Doctrine of Philosophers. Wherein to be noticed, that though Wisdome and Prudence (in common speech) are commonly confounded: yet therein is betwixt them this difference, that Wisdome hath for her object, not only humane, but also Diuine things. And therefore is defined, both by Philosophers and Diuines, to be Scientia diuinorum humanarumque rerum, et eorumque illarum rerum sunt causa. The knowledge of things diuine and humane, and of their other causes. Vvheras the office of Prudence, is duly to consider, and well to direct humane affaires, and is called by Thomas Aquinas, sapientia in humanis rebus, Wisdome in humane things: consisting, as Cicero and S. Augustine teach, in the knowledge of Things good, bad, & indifferent, and is defined, Rerum expectandarum, fugiendarumque scientia, The knowledge of things to be desired or fled. Or as S. Basilie saith, Eorum qua agenda et non agenda sunt cognitio; The knowledge of those things which are to be done, or not to be done: whereto three circumstances are principally required.

The first is, that the end of every action bee truly good, which Aristotle teacheth, to be the first & principal circumstance requisite to Prudence. And he affirmeth, that whosoever applyeth his wit to worke for an euill end: although he haue neuer so good success therein, yet he cannot be called true wife or prudent, but crafty and subtil.

The second circumstance is, not onlie that the end of every action bee good; but also, that the meanes to attaine to that end, be correspondent thereto, that is to say, that they be all good and iust, yea, well and iustly done. To which purpose, Aristotle preferreth circumstances, of due time, place, and manner, to be considered in every Prudent action.

Teaching withall, that whosoever sayleth in any one of the circumstances: is not vertuous, nor (by consequent) prudent, because Vertue & Prudence are foiointed, that the one cannot possibly be without the other. Macrobius assigning (out of Plato) six parts of Prudence; ac-counteth circumspection for one, which (he saith) consisteth in consideration of the circumstances of every action, that the same be most lawful good, and iust.
Vvhereupon Saint Basilie saith, Quisquis prudenciam recte scitatus fuerit, &c. (Whosoever followeth the rule of Prudence truly, he shall neuer swerue from vertue, nor fall into vice.) The third circumstance to be considered in every prudent action, is;
that whereas there are certaine degrees of goodnes in things, some being good, others better, and one the best of all; (wherto all other things are to be referred, which is called by the Philosophers Summū bonū, The chiefe good; And also Finis bonorum, The end of al good things) it is (I say) especially required in Prudence, to make a true estimate of the worth of every thing, & not only to reiect things absolutely euill, or of euils, to chuse the least (as the Lacedæmonians said, he had done, that married a very little wife) but also of good things to chuse the best:
preferring those things which are absolutely good, before all other goods whatsoever, and making the chiefe good, the scope & end of all his actions.

Now then, seeing these three circumstances are requisite to true Prudence, to wit; to chuse a good end; to practise good & vertuous means; and to esteem every good thing in the degree that it deserveth: it is euident, that who feareth God, and keepeth his Commandements, performs all these three things, not only in every particular action, but also throughout the whole course of his life, tending in al things to goodnes and vertue, vying al iust & vertuous means, and esteeming every thing according to the true worth thereof. For, he preferreth the Soule before the body; eter-nall things before temporall; the goods of the body, before the goods of Fortune; and the goods of the mind before them both. Finally, he referreth and di-recteth all his actions, and the whole course of his life, to the seruice and glory of God, whom both diuines and Philosophers

lofophers do teach; To bee the beginning and end of all Creatures, as partly hath bin before declared.

But here (perhaps) some will say, that there are necessarily required to Prudence, certain other parts, which I haue not yet mentioned: As sagacity of wit,
a good memory, and a sound iudgment, whereby wise men do prudently confider, iudge, counsell, ordaine, and execute, and that these partes (as Aristotle teacheth) proceede partly of a naturall hability, and partly of long experience.
In which respect, he most approueth
the iudgement and counsel of old men.
Whereupon it followeth, that it sufficeth not to Prudence, to feare God, and keepe his Commandments: except a Man haue (withall) the other partes above mentioned, which many good & holy men want, either in respect of som natural defect of Wit, Memory, and Iudgement, or for lacke of experience.

For the better satisfaction hereof, one thing is to be considered, to wit, the naturall imbecility of mans wit, which is such in the wisest worldly man that li-ueth that he knoweth not what is conuenient for himselfe, and much lesse for others, whereby he seeketh (many times) that which turneth to his owne ruine.
Therefore, the most necessary part, for consummation & perfection of human Prudence, is some supernaturall and di-uine light, to illuminate the vnderstanding of men, to moue and incline their wills to make choice of that, which may be most conuenient for the and others.
Without which light, the wisest worldly men (I mean such as haue most excellent talents and parts of nature, and are wicked withall) are but like to blinde men, and go (as it were) groping in the dark. Wherefore the Preacher saith, Error and darkness are appointed for sinners:
that is to say, ignorance and blindness are committal to wicked men. And again. The way of the wicked is as the dark-nesse, and they know not where they fall.
Whereas on the contrary side, The way of the righteous (that is to say, of those that feare God, and keepe his commandments) shineth as the light, that shineth more and more vnto the perfect day. And for this cause, the Psalmist saith of the Law of God; That it is a pure and bright, and shineth light to the eyes. That is to say, the light of grace, whereby the naturall good abilities of Gods Seruants are en-creased and perfected: doth allo prosper their actions, so farre forth, as God Almighty thinketh it necessary for their good, his glory, and the execution of his will. Whereunto I adde, that also the defects of nature may be, and many times are, supplied by the light of Grace, in such sort, that Gods Seruants do many times, attaine to performe all the parts of Prudence, though they haue no natural ability for the same, such being the effectes of Grace, that it perfecteth humaine nature: which although it aspire and tend to perfection, yet it cannot possibly attaine thereto, without some supernaturall help. And for the better prooffe of the matter in hand, I will lay down some examples of Gods seruants, who, notwithstanding either their nat-urall defects & imperfections, or their want of experience: haue (by the conduct of Gods grace) most wisely behaved themselves, in most important maters. Who seemed more vnfit to vnder-take the iudgement of great causes, then Daniel, whiles he was a child of 12. years old (as Theodore testifieth) or, as other ancient Fathers affirm, not much older, and therefore no lesse vnripe in experience, then in yeares? And yet neuerthelesse, being assisted by the spirit of God, he confounded the adulterous Iudges in the cause of Susanna, which he most prudently determined. Besides, the Scripture witnesseth, that God gaue such profound knowledge and wisdom, not only to him, but also to Ananias, Misael, and Azarias, while they were all Children: that they far surpassed all the wise and learned Chaldeans.

And was there cuer any glorious enterprize, more wisely continued, more courageously attempted, or more heroically performed, then the ouerthrow of Holofernes: slaine by a holy Woman, no lesse timorous of nature, then weak of iudgement, and void of experience, through the infirmity of her Sexe?

Againe, what sufficiency was there in Moses, for the performance of so great a charge, as Almighty God laid on him:
first, in his ambassage to Pharaoh, and afterward in the government and conduct of his people, thorow so manie kind of daungers and difficulties? This was acknowledged by Moses himselfe, who conf. feth his owne insufficiency and weakness, saying to Almighty God; Quis sum ego, &c. Who am I to be Lord? That is to say, what is there in mee? Thou I should go onto Ithraab, and that I should conduct the Children of Israel out of Egypt?

And againe afterwarde, being vnder the discouragement, with the consideration of his want of eloquence and utterance, &c.
of his other infirmities; he desired to be excused, saying. Obsecro Domine, mitte quæ miserrunt es, & faccech thee, & Lord; send else whom it please thee. Whereupon God did not only promise him his owne continuall assistance: but also appointed Aaron to help him, and to speak for him to the people in all occasions: promising withall, to be the mouths of them both.
Besides, Iethro, Father in Law to Moses, did also afterwarde (by Gods great providence) teach him a notable point of pollicy, for government of the people. Wherein may be noted by the way, how sweetely Almighty God guideth his Seruants concurring with them, and mouing them sometimes immediatly by secret inspiration, and sometimes by the help and meanes of others. Whereby, Moses being (as it seemeth) altogether vnskillfull, and vnexpert in matters of State: did, neuertheless, many yeares most prudently and happily gouern the people of God, as well in warlike, as in other ciuill affaires.

In like manner, if we consider either the yeares of the education of David, when (being very young) he was called from the Sheep-coat to the Court, and shortly after appointed King. If we weigh withall, his wife, victorious, and glorious government for forty yeares together: we must needs confesse, that the same proceeded of Gods assistance, and not of his own sufficiency, whereof Almighty God aduised him by Nathan the Prophet, saying. Ego tu, ite, &c. I tooke thee from the Pastures, when thou followedst thy flockes, and made thee King of my people of Israel. And I was with thee and assisted thee in all things: whereoeuer thou didst go, I kild all thine enemies before thy face, and haue magnified thy Name among the great ones of the earth. Thus spake the Prophet Nathan in the person of Almighty God: and this David himselfe, (who best knew himselfe, & the fauours which God had done him) gratefully ac-knowledgeed: calling almighty God His Protector, his stay, his refuge, his buckler or shield, his strength, his hope, his glory, and humbly beseeching him in all his occasions; to illumine him, to protect, and defend him, to direct his course, & to guide his steps. I omit diuers other examples for breuities sake, seeing by these is sufficiently appeareth, how true that is which the Psalmist saith. Lex Domini: spem meam præstat paruum, The Law of God guideth wisdome to Children. That is to say, to simple and ignorant men, & the reason is, for that the Law of God containeth the precepts of all true Wisdome, and Prudence: teaching vs, what is our duty to God, to our Neighbour, to our Superiors, Inferiors, & equals: what we to command, how to obey, & how to direct our intents and our actions;

how to liue, how to die, & lastly, how to arrive (after the storms and tempests of this life) at the secure port of eternall felicity, whereto true wisdome direct-eth and addresseth her whole counsell.

And this is not only to be vnderstood of the written Law of God, that is to say, the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament (in which as Saint Chrysostome saith, Non est fides sine apu-culis, &c. There is not a fable, nor a speck as a title, wherein there is not hidden some great treasure) but much more it is to be vnderstood, of the Law of God vn-written, infused into the hearts of Gods Ser-uants. Whereof Almighty God said by the Prophet: Dabo legem meam, &c. I will give them my law in their bowels, and I will write it in their hearts: Which vnwritten Law, is (as S. Augustine saith) nothing else, but ipsa presentia Spiritus Sancti, &c.
The very presence of the Holy Ghost, &c. by whom Charity is spread and printed in our hearts, which charity is the consummation of the Law, and end of the Commandment.

Thus saith S. Augustine of the infused law of God, which doth not only teach men true wisdome (as doth the written Law) but doth also giue it them: making them the temples of God, and habitacles of the Holy Ghost. By whose Grace, the good Talents of many Ser-uants of God are encreased and perfected, their defects supplied, their infirmities cured, the eyes of their vnderstanding illuminated, and their iudgements directed.

The parts of true Prudence.

The first conclusion.

Eccles. i. 15. so. The feare of God is the beginning & perfection of Wifedome, and why,

All humane wifedome is not it selfe lame and vnperfect,

The wisest worldly man is a foole in that which most imports him.

How the seruants of God are wise.

Why the simplest seruant of God is wiser then the wisest wicked man.

directed. By meanes whereof, they are replenished with heavenly Wifedome, and enabled to performe all the parts of true Prudence, to wit; to deliberate maturely; to iudge soundly; to counsel securely; to ordaine and commaund exactly, and execute effectually. And so they worke in things, no lesse perfectly then happily, being moued and led by the onely Author of wifedome and happinesse: in whose hand ate the hearts of all men, and vpon whose wil, dependeth the successe of all actions whatsoeuer.

Therefore I will inferre hereupon certaine conclusions. The first, that, as the Preacher faith, the feare of God is not onely Initium & radix: The beginning and roote; but also Plenitudo sapientie; The consummation and perfection of Wifedome. For those that sincerely feare God, haue (consequently) the light and helpe of his grace, whereby they may, and many times doe arrive to the perfection of Wifedome and Prudence: whereas otherwise, there is no possibilitie of attaining thereto, all humane wifedome being (of it selfe) lame and imperfect, vncertaine, and subiect to infinite errors. So that, wicked men, though they haue neuer so good partes of wit and iudgement naturally, and may by the force and meanes thereof, doe many things prudently and wisely: yet, forasmuch as they alwaies play the Fooles notably, in that which importeth them most, to wit; in thinges pertaining to their eternall good or euill, and do also erre very blindly and absurdly (many times) in temporall affaires; they neuer haue any perfection of wifedome, nor can be counted truly wise.

Whereas on the other side, the Seruants of God, who haue alwayes good naturall partes, and the light and helpe of grace withall, do not onely worke most prudently alwaies, in matters that concerne their eternall good or euill: but also deale in all things whatsoever, with farre more light, certaintie and securitie, then wicked Men, of like good partes and Talents naturall. And althogether the Seruants of God haue (sometimes) some naturall defects of wit and iudgement; yet forasmuch, as such also doe alwayes discharge the partes of true Prudence, in matters which import the most, and may haue also, and many times haue (with the helpe of grace) such a supplement of their naturall imperfections, that all of them may, and many of them doe, performe the Office of prudent and Wise men in all affaires, which wicked men neither do, nor possibly can doe: I will therefore conclude, that the perfection of humane Wifedome, consisteth in Gods grace, and that the very simplest Seruant of God, may more truly be accounted Wise, then the wisest; I meane the subtillest and craftiest wicked Man whatsoever.

This the Royall Prophet acknowledged in himselfe, comparing the Wifedome and Prudence which God had giuen him, by the obseruation of his commandments; with the Wifedome and Prudence of his Enemies, and of the wisest Worldlings, saying, Super inimicos meos, &c. Thou hast made me (O Lord) wiser then mine enemies, through thy Commandments or Law, and I haue understood more, then all they which taught me. I am wiser then the aged, because I haue sought to keepe thy Commandments.

The second Conclusion is, that (as the Booke of Ecclesiasticks signifieth.) Non est sapientia nequitia disciplina, & non est cogitatus peccatorum prudentia. The knowledge of wickednesse is not wifedome, neither is there prudence whereas the compassell of Sinners is. For, seeing true Wifedome consisteth in the feare of God, & in the obseruation of his Commandments: nothing that is offensive to God, or contrary to his Law, can stand with true Wifedome. And againe, seeing in Prudence and Morall Vertue are so conioyned, that they cannot be separated; yea, and that not onely the end of euery prudent action, but also the meanes must necessarily bee good and virtuous: it must needs follow, that whatsoever is vicious, impious, or wicked, is excluded from true Prudence. In which respect, Prudence is called in the Scriptures, Scientia Sanctorum. And therefore Salomon faith, Principium sapientie timor Domini, & Scientia sanctorum Prudentia. The feare of God is the beginning of Wifedome, and the knowledge of holy things is Prudence. Hereupon also follow two other Conclusions, concerning policy. The one that no true policy can admit

The perfection of humane wifedome consisteth in Gods grace.

David's acknowledgement in himselfe.

Psalme. lxx. 3.

The second conclusion.

Eccles. 19. 11. Nothing that is offensive to God, can stand with true wifedome or Prudence.

Prover. 9. 10. Prudence called in Scripture the knowledge of holy things.

The third Conclusion.

No true Policy admitteth any impietie.

Policy a part of Prudence. Prudence divided into three partes. Personal Prudence. Oeconomical Prudence. Politicall Prudence.

Politie cannot disgiue from Prudence.

The fourth Conclusion.

All humane politie is vnperfect and defectiuous, without the light of grace.

The imprudence of those that presume to meddle in matters of State, without any regard of Gods assistance.

admit any impietie, wickednesse, or offence, of God. The other, that all policy humane (without the light and helpe of Gods grace) is vncertaine and defectiuous. And for the better vnderstanding hereof, it is to bee considered, that as Prudence is a part of wifedome: so Policy is a part of Prudence, and that Prudence also is diuided into three partes: The first, Personal; the second, Oeconomical; and the third, Politicall. Personal Prudence consisteth in the speculation and practise of such thinges, as belong onely to particular men. Oeconomical prudence, respecteth all thinges belonging to household affaires. And Politicall prudence is that, which considereth matters appertaining vnto commonwealth, and this kind of Prudence is properly called Policy.

Therefore, as Prudence (being a branch of Wifedome) cannot disgiue from the Nature thereof, no more then the branch from the Nature of the tree; so also, Policy being a part of Prudence, must needs bee conforme and agreeable together; in which respect, euery Politicall Art must needs bee prudent, and euery prudent Art (concerning Commonwealth) must needs bee Politicall. Whereupon it followeth, that seeing true Prudence excludeth all wickednesse and impietie, true Policy also dooth exclude the same.

And againe, seeing true Wifedome and Prudence are the especiall giuifes of God (as I haue shewed) and that without the light and helpe of Gods grace, all humane wifedome is full of imperfection, obscurity, vncertainty, and error, it followeth also by the like consequence, that the like iudgement is to be giuen of all humane policy, to wit: that it is (of it selfe) imperfect, vncertaine, obscure, and erroneous; and to be perfected, assured, rectified, and guided by the light of grace, which is the point that I haue especially laboured to proue thoroughout this whole discourse.

Therefore, to conclude this Chapter, I cannot but lament and wonder at the imprudence of two sorts of men. The one is of those, who make no doubt to deale in matters of Policy & State, without any care or regard of Gods help and assistance; yea, and with offence of god. V. hereby they expose not onely the matters (which they mannage) to dangerous errors, yea, and to all euill successe: but also, the Princes whom they Councell, and the Common-wealths where they gouerne, to Gods indignation, and consequently to viter ruine, as hath bene formerly proued.

The other sort of impudent men (in my fancy) are those, who are so far transported, eyther with conceit of their own wit and sufficiency, or with a desire to deale in great matters, that they aspire to nothing more, then to meddle in matters of State, yea, and boldly embarke themselves in the very greatest that doe occur, before they haue any experience or practise thereof in the world, or haue so much as reflected vpon the Naturall imbecility of mans wit; and the weaknesse of humane policy, or of the insuperable difficulties and dangers incident to matters of State, which are such, as do many times, ouerthrow & disgrace the most wise and expertest Negotiators.

And therefore it happeneth verie often to those, who so greedily and vnadvisedly feeke such employments, as it doth to man, that (in faire weather) putteth himselfe to Sea, in a little Boate or Frigot for his recreation; and vpon the sudden there ariseth a storme which carrieth him into the miene Sea, and so tofeth him too and fro: that he not onely loseth all the pleasure which he expected, but also escapeth verie hardly with life. And therefore, with many a sigh and heauy grone, he looketh back to the Land from whence he came; but neuertheles is forced to go whither the winds and tempest carry him, and perhaps perissheth in the end, by violence of the storme. Euen so I say, it fareth manie times vnadvisedly in matters of State: for, within a while, they find themselves so perplexed, that they desire to returne to their former repose and quietnes. But yet they are forced to goe, whither the course, streame and current of theyr affaires doth carry them; yea, and sometimes perish amidst the manifold dangers, which commonly doe accompany State-matters, the practise whereof may well be compared to the practise of Phisicke. For, although some Physitions exercise their Science, with more iudgement

The imprudence of those that presume to meddle in the greatest matters of State, without experience.

What happeneth to those which vnadvisedly feeke great employments.

Expectation of pleasure endeth often times in paine.

The danger of dealing in matters of State.

The practise of matters of State like the practise of Phisick.

Young Statists marre many matters before they make one.

He is the wisest that erreth the least, but he the least that erreth the most.

Dangerous for very young men, to deale in matters of State.

Plutarch in his Treatise, whether an old man should deale in matters of State.

ment and better successe then others yet none is so skillfull and fortunate, that he can alwayes warrant the cure of his patient, and young beginners many times kill three, before they save one. Euen so, young Statists, how expert soeuer they be, can neuer warrant the good successe of their plots and designments: but (for the most part) at the first do marre many matters, before they make one. Inform much, that I account him no lesse happy then wise, who can be the wiser not only by other mens errors, but also by his owne. And, as I hold him for the wisest man, which erreth the least: so I take him for the happiest & best at ease, who meddeth the least, or not at all in matters of State, seeing there was neuer any that dealt in many, but he erred in some. And sometimes we see, that the least error worketh both his ouerthrowe who committed it: and also, the ruine of whole Kingdoms and Commonweals. VVherefore, I conclude with the Spanish Prouerbe, Aquel Rey, que nunca vio Rey, fue a King that neuer sawe King. That is to say, hee is a happy man, who neuer had to deale with the affaires of Princes or State matters.

I speake not this, to debort or diswade all men from the dealing with matters of State, which is a thing so necessary for the seruice of God and Princes, and for the good of a Commonwealth, that it is both honourable, yea, and highly deserving, when it is done with circumstance conuenient and requisite thereto. But my meaning is to signifye with what great consideration and circumspection all men ought to vndertake such Negotiations. especially young men, who haue not had any experience or practise thereof, and therefore cannot haue the mature and ripe iudgement, which is necessary thereto. For which cause, the Athenians did ordaine, that no man (vnder fifty yeares of age) should bee called to giue aduise in the affaires of their Commonwealth. And although a man may be (as verie manie are no doubt) sooner ripe and able, to mannage any matter whatsoeuer: yet reason and experience teach, that the younger a man is, and the lesse practise he hath, the more he is like to erre. VVherefore I craue thy patience (gentle Reader) while I set downe heere a few general Rules for yong beginners, as well for their instruction: as also, for the discouery of the difficulties, which occurre in the gouernement of a Commonwealth.

CHAP. V.

Certaine general Rules or Aduises, no lesse pious then Politicall, for the instruction of such as desire to manage matters of State, and haue no experience thereof, to the end, that they may deal therein with lesse danger, and diffculty.

First, hee that meaneth to apply himselfe to matters of State, must see that his intention be cleare & pure, that is to say: that hee bee not moued thereto by vainglory, ambition, couetousnesse, or any vicious or vnlawfull desire, because they are ouerweake foundations to vpholde waighte affayres, being accompanied not onely with the offence of God; but also, with passion; whereby mans iudgement is blinded, and many times drawn to error. And therefore, the chiefe and principall intention of a Statist ought to bee, the seruice of God and his Prince, and the publicke good of his Country, whereto euery man ought principally to direct & leuell all his actions, which otherwise, cannot be truly vertuous and wise, nor yet haue the assistance and blessing of Almighty God, which for the good successe of all mens affaires, is most exquisite. For, as the Royall Prophet sayeth: Nisi Dominus adificauerit domum in vānum laborauerunt qui edificat eam. Except the Lord do build the house, they labor in vaine which build the same.

This foundation being laide, any Negotiation, be it neuer so waigthy and important, may be built thereon, for foure reasons. First, for that a mans reason and iudgement being free from passion and selfe loue, he shall the more clearely and soundly both deliberate and worke in all occasions. Secondly, for that it is most likely, that Almighty God (seeing his

A pure and good intention necessary for a Statist.

Whether the intention of a Statist ought to be.

Psalm. 127.

The commodities of a good intention in vnderstanding matters of State. Fewer effect all Reason.

good and holy intention) will concur & co-operate with him in all his Negotiations.

Thirdly, though it would not please Almighty God (for his secret iudgements) to blesse and prosper his actions: yet vndoubtedly, his good intentions shall not faile of their due recompence and reward.

Lastly, for that in case hee fall into the great difficulties and dangers, which are incident vnto dealing in matters of State, yet he shall haue the comfort and consolation of a good and cleare Conscience, which as the Poet could say, is Murus athenicus, A Brazen Wall, and the most assured Anchor in all the stormes and tempests of this life. Quae etiam obruta delictis, fidei Seneca, which euen when it is oppressed or ouerwhelmed, dooth then delight. Thus much concerning the first rule.

Secondly, it shall be conuenient for a yong Statist, well to weigh and foresee the difficulties and daungers, which he may (by all likelihood) incur by dealing in matters of State, either thorough the nature and condition of the matters which he is to handle, or thorough the treachery and perfidiousnesse of those, with whom he is to deale; or thorough the malice and emulations (either publicke or priuate) which in Courts neuer want; or thorough the jealousy of Princes, who (as Comineus well noteth) Do easily suspect and distrust their best Seruants, in matters concerning their State. Or lastly, thorough the vncertainty of the successe of businesse, which is in no mans hand to warrant, as hath bin sufficiently proued. Byall which meanes, we see (many times) most important matters miscarry to the great grief, disgrace, yea and vtter ouerthrow of the Negotiators, especially if they haue not foreseen the same. VVhereas, by consideration and foresight, they might perhaps haue preuented inconuenience; or, at the least, haue bin better armed, to beare theyr misfortune with patience.

Therefore, P. Narch worthily comparreth imprudent and vnadvised Negotiators, to one that should fall (before he were aware) into a Coal-pit or Mine; where, though perhaps hee escape with life: yet commonly hee receyueh some hurt, or (at the least) is wonderfully astonished and amazed, not onely with the fall, but also with the obscurity and horror of the place, which, to those that go in of purpose, and with resolution to endure it, is nothing so offensive or noyesome.

Thirdly, he ought alwayes to obserue three things. The first, is the imbecility and weaknesse of mans wit: the second, the vncertainty of the successe of all mens actions. The third, the prouidence of God, in the disposition of all humane affaires. These three things I say, euery Statist should haue continually before his eyes, to the end, that seeing his own infirmity, and vncertainty of the successe of all his designments, hee may consider his danger, as well of error in his determinations, as of euill hap in his actions; and consequently, haue recourse to the remedies ordained for the same, by the prouidence and mercy of God. According to the aduise which old Tobias gaue to his son, for the direction of his whole course of life, to whom (amongst manie other notable precepts) hee gaue this. Aske Counsel alwayes of the wise, and despye not any counsel that is profitable. Blesse thy Lord God alwayes, & desire of him that thy wayes may bee made straight, and that all thy purposes & counsels may prosper. Thus said Tobias, or rather the Holy-Ghost by his mouth, aduising notably two things, necessary to be practised of all men, for the remedy of their naturall imbecility, to wit; to aske counsell of wise men, and to craue the assistance of God. Because we are neither so absolute of our selues, but that we neede (in all things) Gods helpe and assistance; neither yet so gouerned and guided by Almighty God, that we ought to contemne the helpe of man, such being the course of his diuine prouidence in humane affaires, that hee doth his will not only in men, but also by them, and with their co-operations. In which respect, Saint Paul did not tick to call himselfe, and the other Apostles, Adiutores Dei, The helpers of God, in the conuersion of the Gentiles.

Therefore, as it were great folly, pride, and presumption in man, so to trust in himselfe, or in humane Wisdome or power, as to neglect the prouidence and assistance of God: so wer it on the other side, extreme negligence, yea, and a tempting of God, so to relye vpon him,

Three things to be considered of Statists.

The counsell of Tobias to his Sonne. Tob. 4. 18. 9.

Two things to be practised of all Statists.

1. Cor. 4. 9.

Extremely folly in man, to trust wholly in humane wisdome & power. A tempting of God, to contemne his prouidence & assistance.

The force of sudden leare.	accompanied with sudden terrour and feare : doth open the way to small force, and enable the fame to worke great effects. And therefore Ambrosius, one of the Tyrants of Sicily, hauing but a few Soldiers, and exhorting them vnto the speedie and sudden inuasion of Carthage, said: In repentino metu non modicum uictoria momentum. Sudden feare will be of no small moment and importance, for obtaining of the victory. Which was proued to be true by the event, and is daillie seene by the experience of surprizes, camifadoes, and all other sudden enterprises of warre.	in another. Now then, it is conuenient for every one, as well to weigh his owne Talents, and how they fort with the businesse in which he is to be employed. As if he be to perfwade, whether hee haue the gift of vtterance and eloquence. If he be to pacifie Couenants and Conuentions of Leagues or Marriages; whether he be a Lawyer. And if he be to treat on matters of warre, whether hee be a Soldier, and so in like cases. For otherwise, hee shall prouue, Asinus ad Liram, An Asse ut an Harpe, as the Prouerbe saith, and not only disgrace himself, and them that vse him: but also, loose his labour and businesse.
In what cases delay is necessary.	To conclude this aduise, one generall rule is to be held, that to temporize or delay time is neuer good, but in three cases. The first, when matters are not maturely consulted, and well digested: wherein (neuertheless) al due diligence is to be vsed, least time and opportunity of action, bee lost and spent in consultation.	Who they are commonly that undertake greater matters, then they can procure.
The first case.	The second case is, when there is some iust and important impediment of the execution. The third, is in cases of extremitie, which surpasse a mans power and wisdom to helpe; for then the only remedy is to temporize and win time, which produceth many accidents, that could neuer be foreseen or imagined, and discouereth foueraigne remedies, for the most desperate diseases. And therefore Pericles was wont to say, Time is the wisest Councillor that is. Thus much for the fourth aduise.	A young Statist should not make his selfe Iudge of his owne sufficiency.
The 2. case.	Fiftly, let every young Statist consider, and measure his owne ability, to the end, that he do not undertake any matter about his reach or capacity: for no man (how excellent soeuer he be) is so perfect, that he excelleth in all things. And therefore the Poets faigned, that the Goddes themselves had not all gifts alike; but that some excelled in one, and some in another. And the Apostle saith, that God distributeth his gifts vnto men, diuersly. Diuidens singulis prout uult. Distributing them to euery one as pleaseth him, to the end we may haue need one of another. And this also, common experience teacheth; for some excell in depth of iudgement; others, in sharpnesse of wit; others, in eloquence; others in memory; others, in Science and learning; and of them, some in one kind, and some	Better for a Statist to acknowledge his owne defect, then to accept a charge which he cannot perroume.
The 3. case.	to the end we may haue need one of another. And this also, common experience teacheth; for some excell in depth of iudgement; others, in sharpnesse of wit; others, in eloquence; others in memory; others, in Science and learning; and of them, some in one kind, and some	Exod. 31. 1.

Instruction both to Princes and Subiects.	gaue him an assisstant, to wit; his brother Aaron, who being verie eloquent, might speake for them both. Whereby, not onely Subiects, which are to be employed, may learne to consider and acknowledge their owne defectes: but Princes also may learne so to employ their Subiects, that one may haue the partes another wanteth, and supply each one the defectes of another.	miner notheth of Lewes the eleventh King of France, that he was wont sometimes when hee sent a great Ambassadour, to giue secret Commission (apart) to some meener man in his company, vising the other for a shew, and for matters of complement; or perhaps to the end, that he should beare the greatest part of the embassage charges, as commonly greaten do, rather then for the dispatch of important affaires. And the like of both these examples may well be practised by Princes, when they send great Ambassadors, and especially when he that is chief in commission, is raw & vnexpert. And therefore, it shalbe conuenient for such a one, to consider the fame, to the end, that hee may the better looke and regard his owne carriage, and procure (as I haue already said before, to haue about him, wife and assured Friends: least otherwise, his owne assisstants, may let him commit some grosse and absurd errors; and so handle the matter, that all the Negotiation, shall turne to their owne Honour, by the discouerie of his inbecility.
A yong Statist ought to begin his practise with small matters.	Sixty, it shall not be amisse (in mine opinion) for a young beginner to enter into his first practise, with matters of small importance, and to proceede vnto greater by degrees, as his experience and ability shall growe and encrease. Like vnto the wife Phytition, who when hee begetteth to practise, taketh easie cures in hand, and medleth not with inueterat and dangerous diseases, vntill hee hath got both experience and credit. And so would I with a young beginner in matters of State, to flye businesse of great weight and difficulty; and rather to procure at first, some honorable Commission or Embassage of congratulation, or condoling, including some ouerture of an important treaty, rather then to deale in the treatie it selfe, which requieth great practise, Experience, and Wisedome.	The danger of associating in Commission, when they are not sincere friends.
A yong Statist like to a Philosopher.	And, if hee be employed in any such treaty, I would with him to be contented, rather to be a second or an assisstant, then chiefe in Commission, and so to growe (for a while) like the Vine or Iuy, by the support of another tree. Or, if his dignity be such, as cannot admit a seconde place; then, to procure (so much as may be) to haue such assisstants, as are not only men of founde iudgement and Wisedome, but also his sincere friends. Such being commonly the emulation and ambition in Courts, that he may otherwise make account, that his owne associates and Companions, will curiously obserue euery little error of his, and take advantage thereof for their owne better credits.	And this hee may feare, not onely in his associates and fellows in Commission, but also in his followers and Seruants: among whom, some one of more spirit and talent then the rest, may seeke to make aduantage of his matters weakness. As chanced to an Ambassadour (whom I knew) whose Secretary noting in him some negligence in the dispatch of aduises; when occasion required, presented commonly his Masters Letters with his owne. Besides, being employed by his Maister, to procure aduises and intelligences, he concealed the most important matters from him, and wrote them himselfe to some principall Councillours, whose good grace hee gayned so farre thereby, that they procured his aduancement at his home returne; whereas, the Ambassadour himselfe, was helde altogether vnworthy of further honor and preferment, and liued euery after in disgrace.
A yong Statist compared to the Iuy Tree.	To which purpose is to be considered that the Lacedemonians vsed to choofe such to send on their Embassages, as were either publicke, or at least of secret enemies: to the end that one of them might serue as a spie ouer the others actions. And the like may still be vsed, and is (no doubt) many times. And Phillip de Ca-	Seauenty, I would aduise a young beginner, not to charge himselfe with many matters at once, as some do; that that cannot endure to see any man employed; but themselves, vvhich are not so lowly, that some one or two busineses succeeding it (as commonly among many some do)
The practise of the Lacedemonians in great importance, being a businesse, as in the 1. b. Polit. 1. cap. 7.	gave	Many matters not to be undertaken at once, by a yong Statist. in Hist. Aug.

Secrecy in matters of State, most necessary.

do) they receive more disgrace thereby, then reputation or thanks for all the rest, though they succede neuer so well. Therefore, it is wisdom for anie man (especially for such as be Nouices in affaires of State) to take but few matters in hand, and to dispatch them well. Like to a man that hath but a weak Stomack, who is to take heede, that he neuer overlay it with quantitie: nor yet to peller it with diueritie of meates, because one thing willer and hinder the digestion of another.

And this I wish to be considered especially, by such as are the fauourites of Princes, who (manie times) desiring to haue al in their owne hands, do not like to charge themselves with much more, then they can attend to dispatch in due manner and season, to the exceeding great detriment, as well of particular men, as of the State ingeneral. Whereby also, they expose not onely themselves, but their Princes likewise, to such hatred of the Nobilitie and people, that thereon doth follow (manie times) commotions, and rebellions, insumuch, that their Princes are either forced to abandon them to their enemies, or else to perish with them. As to omit forraigne examples, we haue scene by experience in England, in the times of King Edward the second, and King Richard the second against whom, the Nobilitie and Commons did take Armes, for the hatred they bare to their fauourites, Pierce Gausson, the two Spencers, Robert de la Vere, Earle of Oxford, and others their Adherents: vpon whose persons they discharged their fury, euersing all kind of cruelty on them, except vpon the Earle of Oxford, who laued his life by flight into Holland, and ended his dayes in banishment. And heere to also may partly be ascribed, the vnfortunate endes of both those Kinges, who were afterwards deposed, and cruelly and Treacherously murdered.

Eightly, nothing is more necessary in handling matters of State, then Secrecy, I meane matters intended and consulted, before they come to execution: for, they are like to a Mine, which luying any vent, is wholly frustrate, and of no effect. Therefore, Ieter King of Arragon, being demanded of Pope Martin the fourth, what hee meant to do with the great Fleet, wherewith hee afterward recouered Sicily from the French, made this aunswere vnto him: That if he thought his Shirts did know it, hee would burne it.

But, because I am to speake of this point of Secrecie hereafter, I will heere onely giue a generall rule to be helde and practised by yong Statists: which is, not to communicate anie important matter of State, to any man whatsoeuer; except he is to be employed, or his counsell to be vfed therein. For, whoeuer sayleth in this point, is not fit to handle any matter of importance, nor shall euer haue credit with Princes, who esteeme nothing more in their Seruants, then Secrecy. Insumuch, that a Prince in these dayes (whom for some respects I forbear to name) caused a faithfull seruant of his (whom he also loued dearly) to be killed, for feare he should reueale a secret, which (by chance) hee came to know: whereby we may perceiue, howe dangerous a thing it is, to be pertakers of Princes secrets. And therefore, Plautus the Comedian, being willed by King Lysimachus to aske some fauour of him, beseeched him to doo him what fauour else he pleased, so that he imparted none of his secrets vnto him. And thus much for this point.

Ninthly, a yong Statist is to haue especial care, to auoide all kinde of vnlawfull employments, as to be an Instrument: fany wickednesse for his Princes seruice: for, beside the offence to God, (who will assuredly punish the same sooner or later) he may well thinke, that his Prince also will neuer after trust him, howeouer hee be satisfied with the seruice for the present. For, Princes manie times are contented, to take the benefit of a seruice done by euill means, and yet (euer after) holde suspected, and hate the enuious and malicious nature and disposition of him that did it: for, they make vfe of such men, no otherwise then as of poyson, onely to scue theyr turne, though they detest the malignitie of it. And therefore, Augustus Cesar was wont to say, I hate the Treason, but I hate the Traitor. And all wise Princes hold it for a rule, that where there is no bridle of Conscience, and feare of God, there is no fidelity towards man to be expected.

A generall rule to be helde concerning Secrecy.

Gods iustice vpon euill instruments.

Isidore in his 11.

Isidore in his 11.

We read, that Constantinus Cesar, father vnto the Emperour Constantine the Great, hauing commanded, that all such christians as would not adore his Gods, should depart from his seruice: did (neuerthelesse) banish all those that denyed their Faith, and retained the others in his seruice and fauour. Whereof hee gaue this reason: That those who had so little Conscience as to be false vnto their GOD, could not be true to him. And Henrie the first, King of England, presently after his Fathers death, banished from the court all such as had bene Councillours, Instruments, or Companions of his ryots before, perswading himselfe, that they were not to be trusted about his person. And so it commonly falleth out, when Princes are wise, and enter into due consideration of themselves, and of their consciences.

But such other Princes, as giue themselves ouer vnto detestable Vices and sinnes, and maketh no Conscience of anie thing, do not onely disauowe theyr owne Commissions, after that some Wicked acte is committed by their order: but also vfe to picke quarrelles, or to take verie small occasions, whereby to make away the Instruments of their owne Wickednesse, eyther to rid themselves of the suspicion, reproach or infamy thereof, or for the ialousie which they haue of the maligne Natures of their Instruments; or for feare they may discouer their practises if they liue; or sometimes for some other respects, God so disposing (by his most iust Iudgements) to make them onely seruie for the Executors of his Iustice vpon those, who preferred their owne seruice before his.

So did Alexander the Great at his fathers Obsequies, command publicke Iustice to be done vpon those, whom hee himselfe had secretly employed for to kill him. So did Tiberius the Emperour, disauow his Commission giuen vnto a Soldiour, to kill Agrippa, telling him, that hee should aunswere the matter before the Senate: As hee did also put to death Seianus his great fauourite, and Instrument of much mischief. And in the like sorte, dealt Cesar Borgia with a fauourite of his. And so also haue some in these our dayes, by diuers and sundrie deuises, bene made awaie in many seuerall Courtes and Countreyes, when they had serued the appetites of some great personages, whome (for iust respects) I will heere forbear to Name. Vvhich may serue for an aduertisement and warning vnto all men, to take heed how they suffer themselves to be employed by any man, in matters which are vnlawfull and offensive vnto GOD, Es felix quem faciunt aliena pericula cantum, Happpie is hee, who can take heede by other mens harmes.

The tenth aduise which I giue vnto a yong Statist, is, that if his Prince doo him the honour, to make him of his Council, to consider well, what is the dutie of a Councillor, to which purpose, I will also set downe some Rules. Wherein neuerthelesse, I meane not to frame an exact Councillor, as Cicero did an Orator, and Xenophon a Prince, and Castiglione a Courtier; neyther yet do I take vpon me, to aduise old Councillours, whose experience must needs surpasse mine. But onely to giue some aduertisements, vnto such as haue not anie great experience or practise in matters of State. And forasmuch, as it requireth some larger discourse, then were fit and conuenient to prosecute in this Chapter, it shall serue for the subiect of the next.

into manie members, yet may be well reduced to three heads. The first, concerning himselfe; the second, concerning his Prince, and the third, touching the matters that are to be consulted. Of all which I will say somewhat, with such per-spicuity and breuitie that conueniently I may.

As for that which toucheth himselfe, he is to regard chiefly eight points. The first, that he procure by all good means, not onlie to haue the reputation of ver-tue and religion: but also to be (indeed) truly vertuous and Religious, for two causes: The first, to obtain thereby the assistance of Gods grace, which howe necessarie it is, for the illumination of mans vnderstanding: appeareth in our former Chapter of true Vifedome, Prudence, and Pollicie, to bee the ef-peciall giuistes and graces of Almighty GOD, and no otherwaies to be obtained, but by the obseruation of his com-mandements.

The other cause, why it behooueth a Councillor to bee truly Religious and Vertuous, is, for that such is the force of Vertue, that it giueth credite to the possessors thereof, and dooth make them more easily to bee beleued: and their counsell the better accepted. And therefore wee see, that all men of discretion and iudgement, do demaund Councill rather of those that are reputed wife and vertuous, then of wicked men, who onely haue a reputation of Wifedome.
For, as Saint Ambrose sayeth; *Where Wifedome and Vertue are conioyned, Magna erit confistorum salubritas, There is all good and whole some counsell to bee had.
And all men (saith he) are willing to heare the wife and vertuous man, as well for the admiration of his wifedome, as for the loue of his vertue.* In which respect also he saith, that men addresse themselues commonly for Counsell, to those who are more vertuous then themselues. For no man (saith he) hath reason to thinke him who is inferior vnto himselfe in manners, to bee his superiour in Wifedome and coun-cell.

Furthermore, such is the dignitie and authoritie of Vertue, that euil men beare a reuerend respect thereto, and stand (as it were) in awe of good men. Wherof we haue an example in Herod, who although he held Saint Iohn Baptist in prison, and would not followe his counsell in the matter of his Diuorce: yet, for the reuerence which hee bare vnto his Vertue, hee consulted many other things with him, and followed his aduice therein. And, as the Holy Scripture sayth also, Metuebat eum, Hee feared him.

And no doubt but wife and Vertuous Princes, much more esteeme and respect the counsell of wife men that are vertuous; then of others, of equal wit and iudgement, that are vicious and wicked; knowing that, as Salomon sayth, Confusio impiorum fraudulenta, The Coun-cels of the wicked are fraudulent. And that hee who hath no care of his Conscience, and dutie towards God, will haue no lesse care of his dutie towards men.

The second point, is, that hee also giue satisfaction vnto the worlde of his wifedome, by the good and wise government of his family. For no wife Prince can thinke him a fitt man to Councill him, or to gouerne vnder him, that cannot gouerne himselfe and his owne Family. And therefore, Basilisse the Em-perour aduised his Sonne, to choose those for his Councillours, who hadde giuen proofe and experience of their Wifedome, in the good conduct and direction of their owne priuate affaires.

Whereuppon also, Saint Ambrose sayeth, Audoncum putabo, quimibi con-fissum, qui non dat sibi? Can I thinke him fit to counsell me, that cannot counsell himselfe? For, hee that is a Foole in his owne businesse, can neuer bee wife in the businesse of other men. And therefore Saint Paule declaring the dutie of a Bythop, requireth, that hee bee such a one, as gouerneth well his owne family.
For, quis (saith he) domui sue pacem necit, quomodo Ecclesia Dei diligenter habebit. If a man cannot gouerne his owne house, how shal hee gouerne the Church of God.

The third point is, that in all his speeches and Conference with his Prince, hee vse all sincerity, truth, and playne-nesse, without Flatterie. For, although the common Proverbe say; Obsequium amicor, Veritas odium parit; Flattery getteth

Princes.

8. de rebus Alexand.
Vnto a reasonable liberty of speech odious to Princes

neither friends, and Truth hatred: yet, as there is nothing more pernicious to Princes the flattery; so (by consequent) there is nothing more vnfit to be vied of Councillors. Whose office is, and especiall care should bee, to vindicate their Prince in all things, wherein he is any way deceived, and to labour therein so much the more, by how much the lesse other men do it. Seeing one of the greatest infelicities of Princes, is, that all, or most Men flatter and soothe them in all things, and few or none dare deale sincerely or plainly with them. In which respect Seneca saith; *Quid omnia possidentibus desit? Ille qui verum dicat.
What wants he that hath all? A Man to tell him the truth.* Which therefore the faithfull Councillor should doe, for otherwise, the Prince shall liue in continuall error and ignorance of his owne Estate, and especiall of his imperfections, yea, and in great perill of ruine. For, as Quintus Curtius saith. Regum opes, &c. The States of Princes are oftener overthrowen by flattery, then by force.

Neuertheless, if the Councillor
haue occasion to admonish his Prince, in any error or fault of his: he ought to doe it with great discretion and moderation. Vling (as Parisatis, Mother to Cyrus, was wont to say) words of Silke, and launcing the fore (like a good Chi-rurgion) with such dexteritie: that hee may cure it, and not exasperate his Prince, and make him lesse capable of his good counsell. Those that offend in this kind, are commonly such, as presume ouer-much, either on their owne wits and power; or on their Princes weakenesse; or on his ouer-great fa-uour and familiarity; or on the neede that he hath of them: or else perhaps,
are of nature seuer, insolent, and passionate, for such sometimes doe forget themselues, yea, and take a pride in contradicting or admonishing their Princes, with lesse duty and respect, then were conuenient.

Such a one was Calisthenes, of whom Arrianus writteth, that he made himselfe odious to Alexander the Great:
Tam ob intemperatiam liberatam, tum ob superbiam suam. Both for his vnreasonableness of speech, as also for his proud folly.

Such a one also was a Philosopher that liued in the Court of Dionysius the elder, a Tyrant of Sicilie. For, whereas the Tyrant (being delighted with his owne Poems) was wont to impart them publickly to certaine Philosophers, which liued in his Court, to haue their opinions: there was one among the rest, who could not flatter, nor endure the vanitie of the Tyrants humour; but told him plainly, that his Verses were nothing worth, and that it was a shame to heare them. Where-with the Tyrant was so offended, that he commanded his Guard to take him presently a way, and to carry him to the Mines, to worke there among other condemned persons.

Afterward, the same Philosopher being released, & returned to the Court, at the suite of his Friends: it chanced, that the Tyrant caused a certaine Po-eme of his owne, to be read againe in the presence of him, and all the other Philosophers, commanding them to speake their opinions thereof. All the rest extolled the worke to the Skies;
some praying the inuention, and others the vaine and grace of the Verse, euery one striving who should commend them most: vntill it came to the turne of this Philosopher, who, in stead of giuing his censure, called suddenly to the Guards of the Tyrant, saying;
Come Masters, carry me away to the Mines, for I cannot endure this extreme folly. The Tyrant being (as it chanced) in a good humour, tooke it not ill: but was content to put it off to a sile, and laughed well at it.

But this Philosopher seeking to auoid Silla, fell into Charibdis, for, by flying bale flattery, he fell into another extremity, to wit, impudent insolency, which is no lesse vnfit and absurd for Councillors: who are to imitate the discreet & prudent modesty of Hephæstion, Councillor to Alexander the Great. For, although he alwaies admonished Alexander discreetly and freely, as occasion ser-ued; yet he euer did it in such sort, that it seemed rather to be Alexanders will and pleasure he should so do, then that hee challenged any such right to himselfe.

The like stile ought a Councillor to vse, in contradicting or admonishing his Prince.

In what manner Princes are to be spoken too and admonished.

All speech proceeding of passion, insolency, or of contempt, is odious to Princes. A wound at a friends hand better then the kisse of an enemy. Prover. 27. 6.

How a Counsellor ought to speake to his Prince, and of the kisse of an enemy.

Counsellors by consultancy, are pertakers of their Princes faults.

Plutarch in The misse.

A Counsellor ought to be constant in his opinions.

Prince, observing exactly his disposition and humor, because no man is always disposed alike, either to receive contradiction, or to hear of his faults, especially in the presence of others. And therefore, fit time and place is always to be chosen for that purpose, and some plausible preamble to be used of the Princes praises, for some good parts of his which (in such case) is no flattery, but a spur to Vertue, and may serve for a preparative to the pill of admonition, which hee meaneth to give him. So that hee deliver it in so good times, and with such dutifull respect, that the Prince may perceive, it proceedeth not of passion, or of a spirit of contradiction, or of audacious insolency, or of contempt (all which are to Princes most odious, but of intyre love and affection, for so will hee (if hee be wise) take the admonition in good part, and say with Salomon, A wound at a Friends hand, is better then the Kisse of an enemy.

To conclude, a Counsellor may hold this rule, to speake alwayes in this manner freely unto the Prince himselfe, although it be of his errors, but neuer to others of him, otherwise then in his honour and commendation. And though the Prince bee neuer a whit the better, for the admonition, yet it may suffice his Counsellor, to haue done his dutie, and not to be pertaker of his Princes fautes, as otherwise he should be, if he should not (in all dutifull manner) advise and admonish him, as occasion should require. And therefore, though he should feare to incur his displeasure for his plainnesse, yet he ought to discharge his conscience, and to say as Themistocles did to Euribades, who took vp a staffe to strike him from his free speech: Strike mee so, that you heare me hereafter.

Finally, a Counsellor should not expect, that his Prince should alwayes follow his advice, nor assist himselfe much if he do not. For, though Princes give unto their Counsellors great libertie, to say what they will: yet they do reserve a greater to themselves, that is to do what they list. And thus much for the third part.

The fourth point that a Counsellor is to consider in himselfe, is that it behooveth him to be graue and constant in his opinions, for lenity and inconstancie is a most euident signe of folly. And to this end, it shall be necessarie for him, maturely to deliberate, and fustly to consider the matter propounded, before hee deliver his opinion. For, as Seneca saith, Sunt duo contraria consilio, festinatio et inertia, Two things are contrary to Councell, Haste, and Anger. And againe, Deliberandum est diu (saith he) quod statimendum est semel. The thing that is once to be determined, is to be deliberated by Iessure. And to the same purpose Aristotle saith, That a Iust man ought to councell slowly, and to execute speedily. Therefore, hee excludeth verie young men from councell in matters of State. For that (saith he) their naturall heat maketh them over-haste and headlong, in giving their opinions. Besides, by reason of their want of experience, there doth not occur to them many reasons or difficulties to be considered: in which respect, they resolve easily and speedily, and with lesse judgement. Whereas ancient men, both by reason of their colder humour, and also of their greater experience (which minisheth vnto them more matter of discourse, and more doubts to be resolved) do determine slowly, and with far more judgement. So that speedy resolutions, are arguments of weaknesse of witte, or want of iudgement; and therefore, to bee shunned of all Counsellors, as one farre more proper vnto Women: whose Councell (men commonly say) is neuer to be taken, but vpon a suddaine, whereof I shall declare the reason hereafter.

The fift point, is, to auoyde the other extremitie opposite to lenity, to wit; Obstinacie and Wisfulness, which is no lesse vnfit for a Wile Counsellor, then the other. For, obstinacie is euer more accompanied with contempt of others mens Opinions, and contention, and is therefore a verie great Enemy vnto Resolution, which can neuer be taken, where Obstinacie and Contentious men, do meete together in a Council.

This Defect, proceedeth commonlie, either thorough great Pride and Presumption of a mans owne witte, or else, of a false conceite, that manie men haue, that it is a shame for a Wile man to change his opinion, which is farre otherwise. For although a wife man ought

While the chief and fundamentall reasons of the designement doe stand, the councell is not to be changed.

Time alwayes affordeth new difficulties.

nor to doe it lightly, and without great reason; yet, when there is sufficient cause, it were great shame and folly not to do it. And therefore Seneca the Stoick, who, according to the opinion of those of his Sect, held; That a wife man neuer changeth his opinion: expoundeth it in such sort, that hee includeth in the opinion of a Wife Man, a necessary exception, to wit; if nothing happen that may alter the case. And therefore hee also saith, that, It is the property of fooles, to assure themselves (ouer-much) of their counsels and determinations. And that a wife Man knoweth, what sway error beareth in the affaires of Men; How vncertain all humane things are; And how many accidents hinder good and wise designements. Whereupon hee concludeth; That it is no shame for wife men to alter their opinions when occasion requireth. And Plato compareth a wife man to a good Gamester, Who doth accommodate his play to the chances of the Dice. And so (saith he) should a wife Man accommodate his counsels and course of life to the occasions, which changing and varying with the time, doe often require new deliberation.

Neuertheless, it is heerein to be considered, that this change (with the occasions) is conuenient only, when the occasions change the fundamentall and chiefe reason of the first resolution. For whereas in all matters of councell, many reasons may concur to one end, whereof some may be more important then other, and some one (perhaps) the ground and foundation of the rest: it falleth out other-whiles, that change of times and variety of occasions, doe alter some considerations and circumstances, and not the grounds and fundamentall reasons of the matter, in which case, the resolution is not to be changed. For otherwise, men should be like Weather-cocks, which change with every winde: seeing time alwayes produceth some new difficulties, and changeth some part of the reasons in all matters, that require any long time for the execution. Whereupon, there may follow some alteration of circumstance in the designement; though the resolution may stand good for the principall.

Wherefore, it were great reuerence and lenity in any Man, to condemne other mens counsels, because some of the Motiues that induced them thereto, haue failed, or because the successe hath not (in the beginning) answered their expectations. As may appeare by the wife Phocion of Athens who hauing dissuaded the Athenians, from a certain enterprize which succeeded well, and being reproached therewith by some of his Adversaries, said: I am right glad of the good successe, yet nothing repenteth me of mine opinion. This he said, partly, because he fore-saw a bad sequell of their good beginning (as after it fel out) and partly, because a wife man dishateth his part and duty, if his councell be wel grounded vpon good and sound reasons, although the successe be not so good as he expected. Considering, that the cunct of all mens counsels is onely in the hands of God, and cannot assuredly be fore-scene; but much lesse warranted by the wisdom of Man.

To conclude this point, a Wife man ought alwayes to ground his opinions and counsels vpon reason, conscience, and Iustice: that whatsoeuer succedeth, he shall haue no iust cause to repent or retract the same. And therefore Aristides, hauing said to Dionysius the Tyrant (who demanded one of his Daughters in marriage) That he had rather see her burned, then married to a Tyrant: would neuer retract or recall his words againe, although it did cost him the life of his Sonne. For, when the Tyrant had slaine his Sonne, and asked him, whether he was still of the same minde, concerning the marriage of his Daughter? He answered. Although I am sorry for that which hath happened to my Sonne; yet I doe not repent me of that which I haue said. Which constancy of Aristides, Plutarch greatly commendeth: As proceeding (saith he) of a notable and compleate vertue. And thus much for this fift point.

The sixth point necessary in a Counsellor, is Secrecy, whereof I haue said somewhat before, and heere add: That Counsellors must vnderstand, that their mouths are sealed vp by their Princes, as Hephestions mouth was by Alexander the Great, who hauing shewn him a secret Letter, said nothing else to him, but tooke off his sealing Ring, and put it to his lippes. This (I say)

Plutarch in Timoleon.

The constancy of Aristides.

Secrecy most requisite in a Counsellor.

Plutarch in Alexander.

(say) a young Councillour must understand, to passe betwene his Prince and him, when his Prince doth him the honour, to make him of his Councillor, or to treat with him of matters of State. Whereof secrecy is (as Valerius Maximus faith.) Optimum & tutissimum vinculum, the best and surest bond. And therefore it was so much esteemed among the Persians, that they honoured Silence for a God. And such was the care and respect that the Romains had thereto, that when King Eumenes came into the Senate, to demand assistance against King Persus: it was neuer understood (as Linus witnesseth) either what he said, or what any answered, vntill the warre (which the Romans made at his request) was ended. Such being the secrecy of the Romaine Senators (though verie many in number) that, as Valerius faith, it seemed, that Not so much as one Man heard, that which was committed to the eares of so many.

Neuertheless, great discretion is to be vsed herein: for a Man may as well be ouer-secret in some cases, as too open. I haue noted sometimes, that some great Princes and Councillors, for fear of discovering their designements, haue eyther forborne to take sufficient information and instruction, of such as could best informe them, and might haue bene trusted, whereby they haue gone blindly to work: or else they haue sought to inform themselves in clouds, by such darke and obscure questions, that they haue bene falsly and ill informed. For the parties with whom they conferred, making a false coniecture of their drift, and answering them according to their owne sense (for otherwise then they would haue done, if they had knowne their meaning) haue abused them against their wils.

Again, some there are, who intending to be very secret, play, as a man may say, wily beguile the eies. I knew a Councillor, who being commanded by his Prince, to giue him his opinion in a matter of exceeding great importance and secrecy: thought to informe himselfe of some circumstances so cunningly, that his meaning should not bee so much as guessed at. But the party with whom he treated, being of an excellent iudgement, presently vnderstood it, and though he answered him to his great satisfaction: yet, not thinking himselfe any way bound to secrecy (because the Councillor neither had taken his oath, nor his word, nor had shewne any confidence in him for that matter) wrote it to a great personage, with whom he had correspondence, by which means, it was (within a month) to be published, that it came into the Gazetta of Rome, & from thence was published throughout Christendome, as the Councillor himselfe hath since told me. So that, in seeking information by Riddles, & obscure questions, two inconueniences may be feared: the one, to receive a false information; and the other, to discover the designement against a mans wils.

Therefore, to prevent these inconueniences, that when information must needs be taken (as in some cases it is absolutely necessary, especially for enterprises to be made in forraign countries, unknowne to him who would lay the plot) it shall be conuenient, if a sufficient enformer may be found, who is knowne to be of sincere conscience: to deale plainly with him, & to shew confidence in him, taking (neuertheless) his oath for secrecy, to binde him the more, and to vse other meanes of courttesie and benefits to oblige him; yet to do this with the leaue of the Prince, for the Councillors better discharge. But when such a confident and sincere enformer cannot bee had; my opinion is, that although it shall be good, to vse all possible meanes, to vnderstand what may be learned, without discovering the intention: yet neuertheless, no great foundation is to be made of an information taken by such a meanes, except it be of a matter of fact, wherein, no man (that knoweth the truth) can falsly enforme, except he will willfully lye. For, in matters of discourse, depending vpon the iudgement of the enformer, be hee neuer so wise: small reckoning is to be made, while he doth not fully vnderstand the intention of the propounder. Thus much concerning the first point.

The seauenth point, which a Councillor should consider in himselfe, is, that in the deliberation of all matters whatsoever: he be cleare and free from all passion and peticular affection, that is to say, from all respects, eyther of loue, hatred, or enuy to any. And this I say, for wise Princes are wont, exactly to obserue the humours and dispositions of their Councillors, & to make small account of the aduise or persons of such, as they finde to be subiect to any of the foresaid imperfections. And with very great reason, for, as Salust faith. Non facile animus, &c. The mind doth not easily see the truth, where passion and affection beareth sway. Beside, passion not only blindeth the vnderstanding of Man, but also dooth so corrupt his will: that although he see the truth, yet he will not embrace it. Which Iustine obserued very well in King Antiochus, for, when Hanniball had counselled him to invade Italie: his Councill (faith Iustine) was reiected, partly, because the chiefe Councillors and Fauourites of Antiochus feared, that if it were admitted, Hanniball might grow in more credite and fauour with Antiochus, then they; and partly, because Antiochus himselfe doubted, least his owne glorie might (in some part) be obscured, if he should be thought to doe any thing by Hannibals aduise. So pestilent is the passion of enuy and emulation; that it maketh a Man (sometimes) Enemie to his owne good, no lesse then of the publique.

Therefore Aristides of Athen, being sent Ambassadour with Themistocles, who was his Enemy, willed him at their departure out of the Cittie: that they might leaue all their emulations behinde them at the Gates, least their priuate passions might hinder the publique good of the Common-wealth. And so in like manner, all Councillors that haue any peticular quarrels, or disgusts among themselves: should leaue them at the Councill Chamber doore, when they enter in. And the like may also be said, of therespets of priuate friendship, or of other mens greaues and fauour with the Prince: which respects are (many times) no lesse hurtfull in Councils, then Enie or Hatred. For they make men conceal their owne iudgements, because they will not disgust some Friend or great Man, that holdeth a contrary opinion. In so much, that it falleth out many times, that some fauourite of the Prince, hauing once vttered his conceits, albeit none of the wifest: carryeth after him all the rest without contradiction, and to the best opinions are either concealed, or not so well debated as were conuenient.

For the prevention and remedy of this inconuenience, the wise Cosmo de Medices, Duke of Florence, and Phillip the second, last King of Spaine, vsed to propound their most important matters to their Councillors, first by Writing, commanding them: to set down their opinions also in Writing, with their reasons, and not to communicate the same with any other. Afterward, if they thought it needfull, they assembled them in their presence, to heare them debate and defend their owne opinions; which proceeding (in my fancy) was very prudent. For so, every Councillor gaue his opinion freely, without passion, or respect to any other. & (for his owne honour and reputation) defended it so far as reason would baire him, whereby, matters were thorowly debated and discussed.

To conclude this point, Councillors must say of all peticular respects, as Popilius the Romaine (being sent Ambassadour to King Antiochus, his old friend) saide vnto him of their former animity: Facessis priuata amicitia, &c. Forswell priuate friendship, when publique matters are in hand. This (I say) should Councillors, when they come to the Councill-Table, both say and practise, laying aside all priuate and peticular respects, eyther to one or other, or vnto themselves. As hauing nothing else before their eyes, in all their deliberations; but the publique good; to wit, the seruice of God, their Prince, and their Countrey.

The eight and last point, which I would with a young Councillor to consider, concerning himselfe, is: the daunger of punishment, both humane and Diuine, which he shall incur, if he seduce or corrupt his Prince by euill Councill. Because the Prince himselfe, if euer he haue the grace to see his owne error: cannot but hate and detest the Author and Councillor thereof. As did King Henrie the first, who repenting the riotous course of his youth: banished from the Court, all those which had had misled and seduced him, as I have partly noted before. And though he escape the disgrace and punishment of his Prince: yet he may justly feare the hatred of the people, and his owne destruction to ensue thereof, as I have also signified before (vpon another occasion) in Pierce Gauslone, the Spencers, and other Councillours of King Edward the second, and King Richard the second.

To whom I may adde Emson and Dudley, put to death by King Henry the eight, in the beginning of his raigne, to satisfie the importunity of the people: who demanded Iustice against them, for the euill counsell they had giuen to King Henrie the seauenth, in matters of exactions, impositions, and pecuniarie penalties.

And Plutarch also noteth, that the Councillours and Favourites of Apollodorus, Phalaris, Dionysius, Nero, and other Tyrants, were racked, slayed, burned, and other-wise most cruelly tormented by the people. And Isidore (saith he) for that he which corrupteth or seduceth a Prince, deserueth no lesse to be abhorred of all men: then one that should poison a publique Fontaine, whereof all Men must drinke.

Seeing, that vpon the Princes example and authority, dependeth on the good or euill estate of all his Subjects. And therefore, hee which misleadeth the Prince, doth notable iniurie to the Common-wealth: and oweth the penaltie therof, as well to the people, as to the Prince himselfe. In which respect, Plutarch also noteth of Tigellinus, a wicked Councillor and Corrupter of Nero, that the people (after the death of Nero) made continuall instance for his punishment: as for publick debt due to the Common-wealth, which at length they obtained of Otho, Succellour to Galba.

But though neither the Prince nor the people, doe exact this debt of a wicked Councillor: yet hee shall be sure to pay it eternally to Almighty God, if he respect not, and satisfie his Iustice otherwise. For, if Net one; they which doe euill, are worthy of death (as the Apostle saith) but also those, Qui consensunt facientibus, which consent thereto: much more guiltie are the Councillors of euill, who are either the principall Authours thereof, if they inuent it; or abettors and associates in the highest degree, if they approue and ratifie it. And therefore, how hatefull such are to Almighty God, it appeareth by the examples of Achitophel and Haman, the one Councillor to Absolon, and the other to Ahasuerus, whose wicked counsels God did not onely Frustrate and Infusate, as the Scripture speaketh: but also punish most exemplarily in this life, making the one of them his Instrument, to execute Iustice vpon himselfe, and turning the wicked counsell of the other, to his owne destruction. Also the like may be obserued in Gods iust punishment, vpon Cardinal Wolsey, and some other Councillours: of latter times.

And Phillip de Commines seriously noteth, how a Councillor vnto the Duke of Bourguinde, called Monsieur Contay, having giuen cruell Counsell vnto the Duke to put to death certaine Hostages of Liege lived not long after. Which some (who were present, and heard him) did in a manner prognosticate, saying; That they would warrant him, he would not live a yeare to an end. Which (saith he) fell out to be true, for he dyed within a short while after. Thus then it appeareth, how true the Latine Proverbe is: Consilium malum consuli perisimum. Euill Counsell is worst to the Councillor. This shall suffice for those points which a yong Councillor ought to consider in himselfe.

CHAP. VII.

What a Councillor ought to consider in his Prince: Namely, his Conscience; his Commodity; and his Reputation.

Councillor is to consider in his Prince, (principally) three things: his Conscience, his Commodity, and his Reputation. Of which three, I place a Commodity in the midst, because it is to be ballanced and weighed with both the other:

other: seeing, nothing can bee truelie commodious, which is not agreeable to both, and no temporall commoditie can recompence the losse of eyther of them.

And first, to speake of Conscience. The word Conscience is diuerly understood, and commonly taken for an Act, consisting in the application of our knowledge to our actions. For that, Conscientia is Scientia cum alio, Knowledge with another thing. In which sense, Conscience may erre, when we erre in Knowledge, or apply our true Knowledge erroneously to our actions. And therefore I will not treat of Conscience heere in this sense; but onely as it is the first natural habite in the Soule of man, which neuer erreth. And so Conscience is the purest and highest part of reason, whereby we doe naturally discern betwixt good and euill, reiecting the euill, and approving the good. Wherevpon groweth remorse and repentance in our Soules, after an euill act; and contentment, after a good. In which respect, Origen saith, that Conscience, is rector & pedagogus animæ, &c. The Governour and pedagogue of the Soule, whereby it is diuerced from euill, moued to good, admonished, reproofed, and chastised.

Saint Basil, as Thomas Aquinas noteth, called it Naturale indicatorium, The Natural facultie of iudgement. Whereof S. Augustine speaketh, when he saith, that there are in the Soule of Man, Certaine infallible rules, true and incommutable lights of vertue, whereby every one conceiveth and iudgeth truly, of the general principles of the office and dutie of Man. S. Christostome, speaking of Conscience, saith. Almighty God hath placed it in the Soule of man, as a Iudge, which is ever vigilant, and attentive to his actions, incorruptible, inexorable, inflexible, and searching into his very cogitations and intentions. Whereupon it followeth, that after any sinne or offence is committed, a mans owne Conscience iustly iudgeth and condemneth him, without any other Accuser or Witnesse, then himselfe.

Lastly, Thomas Aquinas calleth it Lex naturalis, A naturall Law, or the Law of Nature, by the light whereof, the verie Painims know those things which are commaunded by the Law of God, as the Apostle testifieth, saying: The Gentiles who haue not the Law (that is to say, the written Law of God) doe by nature the things contained in the Law, they haue not the Law, are a Law unto themselves. Which shew the effects of the Law written in their Hearts, their Conscience also beeing witness, and their thoughts accusing one another, or excusing in the day of iudgement. Thus saith the Apostle. Whereby it appeareth, that those which liue according to the rule of reason, the Law of God, and the Law of Nature (which are alwaies conforme one to another) doe according to Conscience: and on the contrary side, those which decline and swerue from any of them, do against conscience.

Now then, forasmuch as eternall felicity dependeth, vpon the integritie & purity of Conscience, in which respect our Saviour saith; Beati mundo corde, &c. Blessed are the cleane in heart, for they shall see God: it followeth, that nothing can be truly commodious, which is contrary to Conscience. For, whatsoever hindreth our greatest good & commodity, that is say; our Salvation, and draweth vs also to the greatest miserie that can be, to wit; to eternall damnation: the same is not good and profitable, but mischieuous and pernicious. For, as I noted (else-where) out of our Saviours words; What doth it profit a man to gaine the whole world, if he loose his soule? And therefore Saint Augustine saith very well, that hee which counselleth a Man contrary to his Salvation, hath Pallium consulentis, & venenum perimentis; The Cloake of a Councillor, and the poison of a Killer.

Whereupon it followeth, that the first and principall thing, which euery Councillor ought to regard, is, that his counsell be so grounded vpon Conscience: that God be not offended, nor his Princes conscience wounded therewith, which latter were (of it selfe) no small infelicity, though God should not otherwise punish the euill act. For, as on the one side, There can be no greater happinesse in the life of Man, then the tranquillity and quietnesse of Conscience, as S. Augustine saith: So, on the other side, there can bee no greater miserie or torment, then Noctæ, deque sum gestare in peccatoressem, To carrie day and night, the

And although Princes do not alwaies (at the first) feele the pricke of Conscience, while the pleasure or commoditie of wicked counsell is yet fresh: neuertheless, afterward they are stung, and vexed therewith at one time or other. Such being the Nature of the Worme of Conscience, that though sometimes it seem to sleepe: yet otherwhiles it gnaweth and biteth bitterly, as Saint Chrysostome witnesseth. Leuit. if it were continuall, it should not bee supported, and if it were not frequent, it might quickly be condemned or forgotten. But howsoever it may seem to sleepe in prosperity, it neuer faileth to prick and sting in adversity, giuing testimony to wicked men, of Gods iust iudgement vpon them.

For, as S. Gregorie saith; Culpam claudis oculos, & pena aperit: Offense, or sin shutes the eyes, and punishment openeth them. To which purpose also, Job saith; Cum reddiderit Deus, tunc scietis: When God shall reward him, according to his desires, then he shall know it, that he hath sinned. The Children of Jacob, being taken for spies, and detained in Egypt: fell presently into account of their sin, in telling their Brother Joseph, saying; Mérito hoc patimur, &c. We suffer this worthily. And Mauritius the Emperor, seeing his Children slaine before his face, and himselfe also designed for the slaughter, acknowledged Gods Iustice, saying; Iustus es Domine, &c. Thou art iust & Lord, and thy iudgement is right, and full of equity. The like may be noted in Alphonsus King of Naples, of whom I haue formerly spoken, and infinite others, whom I omit for breuities sake.

And this alwicked Councillors ought well to consider and feare, in respect of the hurt that may ensue thereby, as well to themselves, as to their Princes: because the worme of conscience breedeth not onely remorse, & repentance of the euill act; but also hatred, both of the council and the Councillor. As it did King Adiliane, the first Monark of England, after the entrie of the Saxons, who being seduced by the bad council, and false suggestions of one of his fauorites: banished his Brother Edwin vniuilly, commanding him to bee sent to sea, with onely one Seruant, and in a Boat without Oare or saile, wherein he perished. Which when King Adiliane vnderstood, he fell into the account of his owne offence, and so much repented it, that he not onely tooke vpon him seuen yeares hartie contrition: but also grew by little and little, to detest and abhorre his fauorite, who had counselled him thereto, in so much, that in the end, he did cut off his head, taking occasion vpon certaine words of his. For he being his Cup-bearer, and coming one day to giue him drinke, in a sollemne publique Feast: chanced to stumble with one foote, and yet to recouer himselfe with the other, saying; So one Brother helps another. Whereupon, the King remembering the losse of his Brother, was so moued therewith: that hee caused him presently to be taken and executed.

Furthermore, a Councillor is to consider, that counselling his Prince against his conscience: he endangereth not onely his Princes Soule, but also his temporall state, exposing him and it to the iust punishment of Almighty God, vpon whose will dependeth the States of all Princes, as I haue largely proued already. Beside, no man knoweth, for how small an offence, in the sight of man; God may punish a Prince in his person or State. Moses, for a little distrust in the promise of God, dyed before he entred into the Land of promise. King Saul was reiectd of Almighty God, and dispossessed of his kingdom; for refusing some part of the spoile of Amaleke, at the request of the people, contrary to the commaundement of the Prophet. Dauid was punished with the losse of 70000. of his Subiects, for numbring them. And Ezechias for his vaine glory, in shewing his treasure to the Ambassadors of the King of Babylon: was threatened by the Prophet, with the spoile of his Pallace, and captiuitie of his posterity, which afterward was fulfilled.

But of al other acts against conscience, for which God punisheth Princes and their States, none are more pernicious to State: then such as are committed, with intention and hope to benefit the State. For, how little soeuer some of them may seeme to be in their owne nature: yet they haue one circumstance, which doth greatly aggrauate them, and maketh them very haynous in the sight of God, seeing that wicked policies do commonly proceed, of distrust or lacke of beleefe in the prouidence of God. For no man, who sincerely belieueth; that all States depend vpon Gods will and prouidence; can with any reason perswade himselfe: that any thing which is offensive to god; may be good for it. And therefore no man will, for any thing God, who of his iustice punisheth him many times, when by the same means whereby they offend him: God doth often turne the wicked policies of Machiavellians to their owne overthrow, ordaining that (as S. Iohn saith) Quis timet impiam veritatem infernam; Tunc et ipse in uicem manifestabit, in uicem suam.

So it fell out to Pharaoh, who fearing least the Children of Israel might multiply ouer-much, to the daunger of his State: oppressed them wrongfully, and commanding that their Male children should be cast into the Riuer, as soone as they were borne. Neuertheless, the more they were oppressed, the more they encreased and multiplied: and, through the special prouidence of God; Moses was saved downing, and nourished by Pharaohs owne Daughter. And by his ministry, the Children of Israel were deliuered, Egypt spoiled, and Pharaoh himselfe with all his Army drowned. So it also fell out to the Ienes who fearing least Christ (if he should haue any time) would draw for many to beleefe in him, that the Pharisees might easily destroy their Nation and temple, for want of people to defend it: the Ienes refused to kill him, and to deuy vpon themselves & their temple, the contradiction which they sought to prevent. God so disposing, for punishment of their wickednesse, that the Pharisees afterward vterly destroy their Temple and Countrey, as I haue amply related before. And Hecyporus saying thus notably saith; That while for feare of losing their temporall State, they continued the eternal; they lost both.

Also, the like Iustice and iudgement of Almighty God, may be noted in King Attilas, who fearing that his Daughters illue might depine him of the Kingdom: thought to prevent it, by the marther of her Sonne Cyrus, commanding Attilas to destroy him as soone as he was borne. But God so disposed, that the Child was saved, contrary to the expectation of them both, and that afterward, he dispossessed Attilas of his Kingdom, with the assistance of Harpagus, whom Attilas had made the Instrument of his wickednesse. So also it happened to Amulius, who thinking to assure his owne State, by the murder of his two Nephewes, Komulus and Remus: caused them to be layed forth in the Woods, when they were new borne, to the end, that they might be deuoured of wilde beastes, or perished in the water. Whom (neuertheless) it pleased God to preserve them, and by the means of Numulus to dispossesse Amulius of his Kingdom.

But to speake of Christians. In the time of the Emperour Valentinian the third, Attila, the Scythian, and King of the Huns (who called himselfe Flagellum Dei; The scourge of God) invaded the Romaine Empire, with an Army of eleauen hundred thousand Men, and haue already possided himselfe of Pannonia, (called Hungaria our first) passed thorough Germany into France, vntill all kindes of cruelties vpon all sortes of Christian people, threatening vnto ruine and destruction, as well to Christian Religion, as to the Romaine Empire. Whereupon, the famous Capitaine Attila, being assailed with Theodorice, King of the Goths, and chiefti other Princes; presented him battaile in France, not farre from Orleans.

In which battaile, there were slain an hundred fourescore thousand on both sides; and Attila ouerthrowne in itselfe; so that he had no meanes to saue his owne person, but by retreating himselfe into his Campe, where hee fortified himselfe. Neuertheless, hee night haue bene either slaine or taken, and Christendome thereby deliuered of a most potent Enemy, if Attila would haue done his endeuour thereto. But hee preferring reason of State, before true Christian zeale, and Gods seruice (spared him, fearing lest if he were vterly ouerthrowne: the Goths (who had already conquered all Spain, and a great part of France) would be far more dangerous to the Romaine Empire, being then freed from the feare of Attila, who was comon enemy to both. For which respect, hee suffered him to escape with the Reliques of his Army into Hungary: which (by the iust iudgement of God) turned as well to the destruction of Ætius, as to the great danger of the Empire. For Ætius being returned most triumphant to Rome, fell shortly after into the disgrace of the Emperor, who suspected that he had spared Ætius, to the end, to make himselfe Emperor by his assistance, whereupon he slew Ætius with his owne hand. And Attila having (within a while) repaired his Army: was more terrible and noisome to the Roman Empire, then he had bin before. For he came into Italy, putting all to Fire and sword: he razed Aquileia to the ground, tooke Pavia, sacked and destroyed Milaine, and marched towards Rome to besiege it. Which he had done; if he had not bene diuerted from it by Pope Leo the great: who going himselfe in person to him, perswaded him to desist from his enterprise, and to retire himselfe into Hungary, which he did presently. But to return to Ætius; we see here in the bad success of his policy, & how it turned to his owne destruction, when he preferred reason of state, before conscience, and the seruice of Almighty God.

Here to I may adde some others of latter time, of whom I haue also spoken before, vpon other occasions; as Cæsar Borgia, the Mirror of Machiavels Prince: who determining to poyson Cardinall Cornetti, poysoned his own Father and himselfe. In like manner, the Queen of Hungary, thinking to maintain her selfe and her Son, in the vniust possession of that kingdom, against Ferdinand, then King of the Romains, and afterward Emperor: craued ayde of Solyman the great Turke, by whom, both she and her Son were depriued thereof. Here by it may appeare, how dangerous and pernicious all Councelles or attempts against conscience, are to State, in respect of the offence of him, on whose will depend all States, and who, as Iob saith; Apprehendit sapientes in astutia eorum, &c. Overtaketh the wise Men of the World in their owne craft and subtilty, and the counsel of the wicked is made foolish. Therefore it may be truly said of Machiavellian Princes, and their wicked Councellers, as the Prophet said of the King and Councellers of Ægypt. Stultii Principes, &c. The Princes are Fooles, and their wise Councellers haue giuen foolish Counsel; the Lord hath cast among them the Spirit of giddinesse, and hath made them stagger and erre in all their works, like a reeling and vomiting drunken Man.

As for reputation, which is also called Honour, Estimation, Fame, Good Name, or Credit, no small regard is to be had thereto, when there is any question of the Princes commodity: considering, that of all externall goods, it is the principall and most precious, and (as Thomas Aquinas affirmeth) Most like to the goods of the minde. Wherevpon Salomon saith: Melius est bonum nomen, quam diuitia multa, A good Name is better then great Riches. Which is most euident in matter of State, for that reputation conferreth the States of Princes many times, no lesse (or rather more) then wealth and force.

In which respect, Tiberius Cæsar was wont to say, as Tacitus noteth. That although the deliberations of all other men, doe commonly consist in the consideration of utility and profit: yet the State of a Prince is such, that he ought principally to respect Fame and Reputation. And the reason is, for that the losse of reputation, is not only the signe, and (as I may say) the preamble of a Princes fall: but also the occasion thereof many times. Because, therewith decayeth and falleth (commonly) the affection of friends, and the respect, feare, and obedience of Subjects, whereupon followeth the subuersion of States.

Now then, whereas the reputation of Princes consisteth especially in foure things, to wit: Wisdome, Valor, Vertue, and Power: all counsell (tending to commodity) is to be weighed with the estimation thereof, for nothing that may impair the honour of the Prince in any of these, can be accounted truelie commodious for him. Therefore Phillip de Comines aduiseeth, touching the Princes Wisdome, that if he be not verie wise, and of good partes: great care be had, that Strangers be not admitted to his presence, especially to treat with him, least the discouerie of his imperfection in that behalfe, may blemish his Reputation, and animate his Enemies to contemne him. For the French Historiographers affirme, that that the opinion which men had, of the Wisdome of Charles the fit, King of Fraunce, called the Wise: auayled him more against the English, then his force, in so much, that the dispatches which he made in his Chamber, were more feared then his Armies in the Fielde.

The like also is to be said, of the opinion of Valour in a Prince, which maketh him no lesse redoubtable vnto his Enemies, then beloued of his Friends and Subjects. Whereas the opinion of his effeminacy or baseness of mind, maketh him contemptible to all men, and often causeth the depoultion and destruction of Princes: as it did to Sardanapalus, the great Assrian King; to Chilperick, King of Fraunce; to Wesigotus, the Emperor, and to many others beside.

And as for vertue (wherein I include Religion also) Aristotle teacheth, that the onely reputation and opinion thereof, is a notable stay and prop to a Princes State. In respect, that all Men commonly conceiue, that a vertuous and religious Prince, is in the fauour and protection of Almighty God. And therefore Achior, chiefe Captaine of the Ammonites, counsell'd Holophernes, when hee made Warre vpon the Children of Israel: To informe himself, whether they had committed any great offences towards their God, whereby they might loose his fauour. Assuring him, that otherwise it would bee in vaine to assault them, because their God would defend them. And the like conceit it seemeth, that Leolin, Prince of Wales, had of Henrie the third, King of England, for when certaine Bishops (who were sent to treat with him, to reduce him to his obedience) threatned him with the Kings great power and forces: he answered. That he feared more his Prayers and Almes giuing, then his Armes. Meaning, that hee doubted, least in respect of his Piety and Charity, God would protect and assist him: and that otherwise, he would little esteeme his force and power. So much it importeth a Prince, to haue the reputation of vertue and Religion, which serueth for a Bridle to his Enemies, both Domestical and Forraigne, to with-hold them from all attempts against him. Beside, it causeth that his faults and errors are eyther not beleued; or more easily excused, and the blame thereof laid vpon his Councellers.

And for these causes, Machiavell also counselleth his Prince, to procure (by all means) to haue the reputation of a religious, iust, and veruous Prince: though he teach him withall, to bee a most wicked Tyrant. Wherein I cannot omit by the way, to note the absurditie of his doctrine, notably repugning and contradieting it selfe. Seeing, he will haue his Prince to seeme a Lambe, and be a Wolfe; and to make shew of a Saint, and yet to be a Deuill indeede. Which is more possible, then, as the Comical Poet saith; Camurratione insaniure; To bee made with reason. For all feigned things (saith Cicero) fade and fall away like Fleuvers, and nothing that is dissembled, can long last. Where our Sauour himselfe also confirmeth, saying expressly of Hypocrisie. Attendite, &c. Beware of the Leauen of the Pharises, That is to say, of Hypocrisie. For nothing is secret that shall not be reuealed, nor any thing hidde that shall not bee knowne.

And this is more euident in dissembling and hypocriticall Tyrants, then in any other sort of Men. Because, so violent is the staine of tyranny; that it breaketh through the weak and cloyen Walls of Hypocrisie, and discouereth it selfe to the World. Such being the State of publike persons, and especially of Princes (whose actions are subiect to the eyes and censures of all Men) that their least fautes cannot passe, eyther vnknowne, or vncontrouled of the people.

As Plutarch affirmeth, notably aduising Princes, to haue an especial regard vnto all their actions: because their very least defects or imperfections are noted. Which he confirmeth with examples of diuers Princes; as of Pompey the Great, noted of singularity, for scratching his Head with one Finger; Lucullus, censured to be ouer delicate in his Dyet; the famous Scipio, blamed for much sleeping; and Cæsar, for going ill guarded. oaths, frauds and deceipt, and all kind of in-Iustice can any man of reason think, that the same can be covered with any Cloak of Hypocrite? Or can a people be so simple or senselesse, as not to know and see a tyranny, when they behold the manifest effects, and see too heauie a weight thereof in themselves? Therefore, what else can follow of Hypocry in a Tyrant, but that his Subjects shall hate him much more, and the sooner conspire his ouerthrow, as of one no lesse odious to God then to man? where by the Scripture shall be fulfilled, which saith; The heauens shall reueale the iniquity of the Hypocrite, and the Earth shall rise against him.

Now, concerning the reputation of Vertue, which is necessary for the conseruation of a Prince: it must be grounded vpon true vertue, and not vpon vain shewes, & hypocritical dissimulations. For, as true Religion, Iustice, & Vertue (ioyned with princely power) do engender in the Subjects admiration, respect, reuerence, & loue towards their Prince: euen so impiety, in-Iustice, and intemperance in him, do breed in the Subjects either hatred, or contempt of his person. For of the crimes of impiety and in-Iustice (as perjury, deceipt, and crueltie) proceedeth hatred; and of the vices of intemperance (as lasciuiousnesse, drunkennesse, and such like) is engendered contempt, whereof I purpose to discourse more at large hereafter. Neuerthelesse, I think good to say somewhat more in this place, concerning one speciall vertue, very requisite in a Prince for his reputation: to wit, truth, fidelity, and constancy, in the exact obseruation of his oaths, promises, and word. Whereof I am the more willing to treat, because Machiavell alloweth and commendeth all manner of falshood, deceipt, treachery, and perury in a Prince, when he may hope to gaine, or to benefit his state thereby. But how impious and absurd his doctrine is in that behalfe, yea, and how pernicious to Princes & their States: it will the more euidentlie appeare, if we consider, how dangerous and damnable all falshood and deceipt is to any Common-wealth, for the conseruation whereof, nothing is more necessary then truth and fidelity, as well in the Prince, as in the people.

Therefore Cicero teacheth, that Fidelitas, which we may call Fidelity (consisting, as he saith, in Veritate, and constant performance of wordes, Promises, and Covenants) is Fundamentum Iustitie, The Foundation of Iustice, which is the effectual prop and stay of State. In which respect, he calleth it; Commune omnium pradium; The common defence or refuge of all Men. And also saith, that Nulles vehementius rempublicam continet, quam fides. Nothing doth more firmelie vnitte and hold together the Common-wealth, then Fidelity. And Valerius Maximus calleth it; Venerabile nomen, & certissimum humana salutis pignus; A venerable and Diuine power, and the most sure pledge of humane securitie. And the Romaines so much esteemed it, that they builded and dedicated a Temple to it, as to a Goddesse, in which Temple, all Leagues, Truces, Couenants, and important Bargaines, were publically made and sworne: which were so religiously obserued, that whoeuer brake them, was held for a cursed and damned Creature, and unworthy to liue in humane societie. And with great reason, for, if falshood and fraud were permitted to haue course in Common-wealths: what Traffique or Commerce with Strangers or Friends? What assurance in Leagues with Foreign Princes, in Contracts and Marriages, in Promises and Bargaines, and in buying and selling? What Loue? What Society? What Common-wealth? Which consisteth in the communication of Commodities one with another; and flourish so much the more, by how much euery one tendereth, and desireth the publique good, more then his owne: in which respect, it is called Respublica, that is to say, Weale-publique. And therefore, if trustie and faithfull dealing should faile among Men: there would beno more ciuill society amongst men, then amongst Tygers and Beares, Foxes and Wolves, Cats and Dogges.

Which the Apostle insinuateth notably, when he exhorteth the Epheſians, and (in them) all other Christians, to vie all Sincerity and truth one with another, because wee are all combined in one Mystical Bodie. Propter quod (saith hee) deponentes mendacium, &c. Therefore, laying aside all lyes, let euery

If falshood & fraude were permitted amongst men, no Common-wealth could stand.

Respublica, the Common-wealth or publique good.

euery one speake the truth to his Neighbour; Quoniam sumus inimici membra; Because wee are all Members one of another.

Hereupon it followeth, that fidelity is not only necessary in the Subjects, but also in the Prince, for the conseruation of the Common wealth. For, seeing nothing is more requisite, for maintenance of the Politicall body, the vniou of the head with the members thereof, that is to say, of the Prince with the people, and nothing more necessary thereto, then their trust and confidence one in another, which cannot be, where there is no fidelity: It followeth, that nothing is more requisite, for conseruation both of the Prince and people, then fidelity in both; without the which, neither can the subjects assure themselves of their Princes protection, nor the Prince be satisfied of his Subjects Loyalty.

And to speake here particularly of the Prince, it is to be considered, that the want of fidelity and sincerity in him, is most dangerous: not onely vnto the Common-wealth, but also to himselfe. As it will be euident, if we weigh the force and effect, of the good or bad example of the Prince, and how potent a Motiue it is, to induce his Subjects to vertue or vice. Seeing, as Salomon saith, Qualis est Rextor Civitatis, tales sunt habitantes in ea; What manner of Man the Ruler of the Citie is, such are they that dwell therein. Therefore (I say) that as the example of the Princes fidelity, doth redound both to the good of the Common-wealth, and also to his owne security (because the people doe learne thereby, to be not onely faithfull vnto one another, but also dutifull and loyal towards him) euen so, the example of perfidious and double dealing in him, doth worke the contrary effect, and teacheth his Subjects to be no lesse faithlesse and treacherous toward him, then fraudulent and treacherous one to another, which may turne as wel to his destruction, as to the hurt of the Common-wealth.

But perhaps some Machiavellian will say, that although the Prince (for his owne commodity) do vse sometimes to violate his faith: yet he may so severely punnith it in his Subjects, that no in-conuenience shall followe of his example, eyther to the Common-wealth, or to himselfe. Whereto I answer, that the Prince cannot (with reason) expect that the severity of Lawes, or other politike means, shall repleate any vice in his Common-wealth: which shall be anie way Authorized by the example of his owne practise. For as the Poet saith.

Totus componitur or his Regis ad exemplum, necesse est utere sensus Humanos edicta videntur vna regentis.

That is to say, All the world is framed after the model of the King, and no Lawes or Edicts can so much moue the minde of men, as dooth the life of the Governour. Which Plutarke confirmeth notably, saying: That euen as a Squire or rule may be straight in it selfe, before it can make other things straight: So the Prince, who is (as it were) the ale of his Subjects, ought first to rectifie himselfe, before hee go about (by Lawes or other meanes) to rectifie his Common-wealth. For, be that is falsling (saith Plotarch) is not fit to upholde others, nor hee that is ignorant, to Teach; nor he that is incorrigible, to Correct; nor he that is himselfe disordered, to put others in order.

Thus saith he, giuing to vnderstand, that a vicious Prince, who seeketh to make his Subjects vertuous by rigor of Lawes, laboureth in vaine, like to one, that buildeth with one hand, and pulleth downe with the other, and so destroyeth more in one day, then he can builde in many. For so do the bad example of the Prince, corrupt more in a day, then his Lawes can correct or amend in a yeare.

This the ancient Romans so well considered, that their Magistرات & Senate were most exact and punctual, in the obseruation of Oaths and promises due to their very enemies: for the regarde they had, not onely to Iustice, and to their owne reputation: but also the consequence of their good example in the Common-wealth, as vpon other occasions; I haue formerly promoued, by the examples of Marcus Cato, Regulus, T. Fabricius, & Sparticus Postumus, Consuls, and of T. Mutius and Q. Emilius, Tribunes of the Temple.

severe punishment, not onlie in the world to come, but also in this life, if he repent not?

This may appeare by manifold examples, whereof I will alledge some out of approved Authors, both ancient and Moderne, to shew the impious absurditie of Machiavels doctrine, allowing perfidiousness and perjury in a Prince, as necessary sometimes for the benefite of his State.

Gen. 49, 7, 8.
Simeon and Levi cursed by their Father Jacob, for violating their league with Sivims and Hemors.

But first, to speake of our holy Scriptures. We read in Genesis that Simeon and Levi, the Children of Jacob, were cursed by their Father at his death, because they had violated their league made with Sichem and Hemor, whom they destroyed with all their City, contrary unto their promise and covenant. Maledictus (saith Jacob) Juror eorum, quia peritiam, &c. Cursed be their furie, because it was obstinate. And prophesying further of the temporal punishment, which God would inflict upon their posterity for the same, he added, Dividam eos in Jacob, & dispergam in Israel. I will divide them in Jacob, and disperse them among the Children of Israel. Which was fulfilled afterward, as Saint Ilierom witnesseth, for that their Tribes had not their habitation apart, as the others had: for the Tribe of Levi was distributed in divers Cities, amongst the other Tribes, to bee their Levites and Priests. And the Tribe of Simeon, had their dwelling with the Tribes of Juda, &c. (as the Hebrews affirm) served for School-Masters in all the other Tribes, and got their living only by teaching Children.

1 Reg. 11, 7.
Iosabab, 12. Swore posterity punished for his breach of league with the Gabaonites.

In like manner, the punishment of God was notable vpon King *Saul*es posterity, for his breach of League which Iosabab made with the Gabaonites. Wherein it is to bee noted, that although the Gabaonites craftily circumvented Iosabab, and induced him by fraud and deceit to make league with them, putting on their olde shooes, and torne cloaths, and affirming, that they were a people dwelling in a farre Country, and that being moued with the fame of his victories: they were come so many dayes journey to meete him, that they had worne out their shooes and cloaths in their voyages whereas they dwelt not farre off, and in the very Land of promise, which GOD had giuen to the Children of Israel. Nevertheless, when Iosabab discovered their deceit, he had such regard to his Oath, that hee would by no means violate it. But answered to the Children of Israel, when they murmured against him. Iuramus eis (saith hee) We have sworn unto them, in the name of the Lord God of Israel, and therefore wee may not touch them, lest the wrath of God fall upon vs, if wee breake our Oath.

The great reward that Iosabab had of his Oath and league with the Gabaonites.

This faith Iosabab: whereby we may learne, how great is the Obligation of all iust and lawfull Leagues, or other Covenants passed by Oath, and how daungerous is the breach thereof, in respect of Gods iust and severe iudgements, vpon the offenders in that behalfe. Whereof the experience was scene, about three hundred yeares after Iosababs time, in the breach of that league by Saul. For the which, the Children of Israel were afflicted with three yeares famine in Danids time, and seauen of Sauls Children and family, were deliuered into the hands of the Gabaonites, and hanged by them in punishment of Sauls offence.

Furthermore, we read in the Booke of Machabees, that Andronicus a Favourite of King Antiochus, was by the iust iudgement of God, and the commandment of Antiochus himselfe, shamefully put to death: euen in the verie same place, where he had killed Onias the Highpriest, who had rendred himselfe vnto him vpon his promise of security. Also the examples heereof, are verie notable amongst the Ethiops, who obserued (diligently) the iudgements of God, vpon traitorous and perfidious persons. And therefore when Tissaphernes the Persian, made war against the Grecians, and brake Truce, which he had made with them for three months, Agessilaus reioyced greatly, saying, We are beholding to Tissaphernes, for making the Godes his enemies, and our friends, therefore let vs boldly giue him battell. And so he did, and gaue him a great overthrow.

Plutarch also recounteth a notable historie, of C. Cominus King of Lacedemonia, who hauing made truce with the Argians for seauen dayes: set vpon their camp in the night, and taking them vnprovident by reason of the truce, made great slaughter of them. But being reproched with his breach of promise and oath, he iested at it, saying, That hee swore Truce for the dayes, but not for the nights. But so it fell out (saith Plutarch) in punishment of his falsehood and periuery, that it serued him to no purpose. For whereas, he assailed the Cittie presently, hoping for to take it with all facility, hee had a shamefull repulse by the women which dwelt therein. And afterward falling furiously mad, he tooke a Knife, and ripped vp his owne body, from the very heele to the heart, and so dyed laughing.

The same Author also signifyeth, that one Calpurnus, being iustly charged with a conspiracie against Dion of Sicilie, and hauing denied it with manie solemn Oaths in the Temple of Ceres, was (by Gods iust iudgement) slaine with the same Dagger wherewith Dion was killed before by his consent. I omit diuers other examples, which might be alledged out of prophane Historiographers, to adde a few out of Christian & more Moderne Authors.

The severe iudgements of God vpon men, for the sinne of periuery, haue been alwayes so incident among Christians: that the custome was in the Primitive Church, to decide matters in Controversie by Oaths, at certaine holy places, and the Tombs of Martyrs, where Almighty God did ordinarily extend his Iustice vpon periured persons. Which Custom (as Saint Angustine witnesseth) was in vire in his time, at Millan, whereof he saith, Nos nominus Madio'ani, &c. I my selfe haue knowne in Mil'ane, at the Monimories of Saints, certaine Theefe, who went thither with intention to decieve by periuery, was compelled to confesse his Thefe, and to restore that which hee had stolne.

But of this matter, we haue a most famous and authentick example in our owne Histories. Elfred or Aelfred, a Nobleman of England, in the time of King Adelstane, conspired against him with certaine others: and being accused thereof, sto. vpon the deniall, and because the prouers were not sufficient to conuince him, he was sent to Rome (as the Custome was then) to make his purgation by Oath, at the Altar of S. Peter, where he swore contrary to his Conscience, and presently fell down before the Altar, and dyed within three daies after. Vpon aduertisement whereof, King Adelstane gaue all the Lands of Elfred, to the Church of Saint Peter in the Abbey of Malmesbury, by his Letters Patents; wherein, after the graunt of the sayde Lands, he declared the whole matter as it passed.

Also some yeares after, in the same age, Lotharius King of Austrasia, which contained all Lorraine, Flanders, &c. some part of Germany, Burgundy, and Francia came to Rome, accompanied with his Nobility, in the time of Adrian the second, because he had bin excommunicated, for his diuorce fro his lawful wife Theutperga, and married with W. I. rada his Concubine. Now he was content, for his purgation thereof, to receive the blessed Sacrament at the hands of Pope Adrian, together with his Nobility, which he did, protesting for his part, that he stood cleare of those things wherewith he was accused, which also his Nobility affirmed. But, as they departed from Rome homewards, there hapned such a strange disease among them, that Lotharius (hauing scene the death of most of his Noblemen) before he came to Lucca, fell sicke there himselfe, and died within a few dayes after at Placentia, so that of all those that receyued the Sacrament with him, there liued not any one to the yeares end.

And nowe to returne vnto our owne Country. Earle Godwin, Father to King Harold, hauing procured the vntimely death of Alfred, Brother to King Edward the Confessor, denied it continually with solemn Oaths; and especiallie once, when he dined with the King. At what time, occasion being offered to speake of that matter, he took a piece of bread, and prayed to God, that the same might be his last, if he were any waye confensing or priuy thereto. And so eating the bread was choaked therewith, and died there in the Kings presence.

It is also obserued and testified by most of the old Historiographers of our country, that the overthrow of King Harold by William the Conqueror, was a iust punishment of God vpon him for his periuery, the Story is briefly thus. Harold being in Normandy with Duke William, in the time of King Edward the Confessor, promised for to assis him after the Kings death, in his pretence to the crown of England, which he also confirmed by solemn Oath. Whereupon, Duke Wil- liam affianched his Daughter to him, and because he was not then of yeares to be married: he tooke Harolds oath, to performe the marriage within a certain time after. But when the time appointed for the mariage came, and Harold shewed no care to perform any part of his promises, the Duke sent Messengers vnto him, to request of him the accomplishment thereof. But he, in stead of giuing satisfaction to the Duke: derided his Messengers, causing some of their Horses tails to be cut off, and others to be lamed. Also, afterward, when King Edward dyed, he practised not onely to exclude the Duke from the Crowne: but also procured it for himself, pretending that his promise to the Duke, was made for feare, & therefore it could not binde him.

When the Duke was entred into England with his Army, and solicited him by Messengers, to haue care of his conscience, representing vnto him the seuerie iudgements of God on perjured persons, offering to come to some reasonable composition with him: he made no account thereof, neither yet of the admonition of his owne Brother Guth or Girth. Who aduised him seriously before the battaile, to retire himselfe, and leaue the conduct of the Army to him and others, who were not bound to the Duke vpon any oath or promise: least otherwise, GOD might suffer them all to bee quite ouerthrowne for his cause.

Whereto hee answered; That he would put it in venter, and that God should be the iudge thereof. And to giuing the battaile, was slaine himselfe, and all his Army ouerthrowne. And although the said Conquest might seeme to be a punishment of God vpon the whole Realm, for the peoples sinnes: yet the particular disgrace, which happened to King Harolds person, may well bee thought to haue proceeded (by Gods iust iudgment) for his perjury, and so the English Chroniclers, which wrote in that age, doe signifie: As iugulphus, William of Malmesbury, Henry Huntendon, Mathew of Westminister, Matthew Paris, and Roger Houedon, who speaking of the victory, saith. Vere & absq. dubio, Dei iudicio a scribenda est, qui pueniendo, scelus perijurij, ostendit se Deum nolentem iniquitatem. Truly and without doubt, it is to bee ascribed to the iudgement of God, who punishing the sin of perjury, declared thereby, that hee is a GOD, who doth not like nor allow of iniquity.

But to come neerer to our time, Phillip de Comines noteth the manifest Iustice of God, in the disgracefull death of Charles, the last Duke of Bourbondy, thorough the treason of Compagnio, an Italian, shortly after that the laide Charles had betrayed the Count S. Paule, and sent him Prisoner to Lewes the eleauenth, King of France; notwithstanding, that he had giuen him safe conduct to come into his Country.

Furthermore, I cannot omit Caspar Borgia, though I haue spoken of him diuers times before. For, as Machiuanil worthily maketh him a Mirour for his Tyranny, in respect of his manifold vices: so he may as worthily be proposed for an example of Gods Iustice, in regard of the manifold iudgements of God diuersly extended vpon him. And particularly, in the punishment of his perfidioussesse and perjury, whereby hee had deceived and ruined diuers other principall personages: As Liuerotto, Vite Iocco, Pagolo Priso, and the duke of Grauma, whom he caused to be strangled; after they had rendered themselves to him vpon composition, and employed themselves faithfully in his seruice. Wherein Gods Iustice may bee noted, (by the way) in Liuerotto, who (a little before) had cruelly and trayterously murdered his owne Vnckle, and diuers other principall Citizens of Fermo; hauing inuited them to a banquet in his owne house.

Which perfidious treachery of his, God punished (as it seemed) by the treachery and perfidioussesse of Caspar Borgia: who also receiued the like measure himselfe, by others. For, whereas he had taken an oath of forrie principall personages, to assist him after his Fathers death: he was forsaken of them all, and putting himselfe (afterward) into the handes of Henando Gonzales, Governour of Naples, vpon his safe conduct; he was also betrayed by him, and sent Prisoner into Spaine, as cleare where is signified.

Martin du Bell. lib. 1. 1579. The Duke of Bourbon slaine at the siege of Rome in punishment of his perjury.

The like Iustice of God may bee noted also in Christen, King of Denmarke and Norway, who married a Sister of the Emperor Charles the first, in the time of Henry the eighth, King of England. This Christen besieging Stockholme in Swetia, took it by composition, binding himselfe to certaine conditions, not onely by Oath, but also by receyuing the blessed Sacrament. Which conditions, he obserued for some few dayes, till hee had the Caste, and all the strongest places of the towne in his owne hands, and that hee had furnished them with men and munition. But then, inslitting all the Noblemen and Magistrates to a Banquet, to the number of ninety foure persons: he imprisoned and after kild them, with a great number of the Citizens. And finding, that verie manie escaped him, by hiding themselves, he promised (by Proclamation) life and libertie to all those which were left aliue, whereupon they all shewed themselves, and were all miserably slaine. But within a while after, he was driuen out of his kingdom by his owne subjects; and when hee hadde wandered from Countrey to Countrey in all poverty and misery for the space of ten yeares, he was receiued again by some of the chiefe Nobility, who although they promised him obedience and assistance vnto their handes and scales, yet they tooke him prisoner vpon his entrance, and (within a while) paysoned him in prison: thus was his perfidious falshood iustly repayed with the like. After whole depodition and death, his Vnckle Fredericke a worthy Prince, was chosen King of Denmark.

About the same time, the Duke of Bourbon, being fled from Frances the first King of France, so the seruice of the Emperor Charles the first, Emperour, and made by him Governour of Milaine: he so exasperated the people by his exactions and crueltie, that they rose against him.

Infomuch, that to pacifye them, he bound himselfe by Oath to certaine conditions, praying withall to Almighty God, that in case he did not exactly performe them, he might be slaine by a bullet, in the first occasion of warre which he offered. Neuerthelesse, hee fell afterward againe to his former course, without regard of his Oath, and being within a while after) made Generall of the Emperors Army in Italy, he was tumultuously carried by his Souldiers (against his will) to the siege of Rome, where he was presently slaine with a peece of Artillery of his owne, negligently discharged by his Souldiers, and so payed the penalty of his perjury, according vnto the iudgement and sentence which hee had (prophetically as it were) giuen against himselfe.

Now then, I with all Machiuanilians to consider heere three things, which are euident by these alledged examples. The first, how detestable all perjury and perfidioussesse is in the sight of God. The second, how dangerous it is to Princes, in respect of Gods wrath, which may fall vpon them and their states for the same, through the feuerity of Gods Iustice; against which, no humane policy or power is able to defend them. The third, is a necessary consequent of these two; to wit; that all Machiuanian remedies (consisting partly in humane prudence and diligence, and partly in force, and strength of Guards, Garrisons, Fortresses, and such like) are most fruitles and vaine when God is offended, and will punish for sinne: Whereupon it followeth also, that the aforesaid remedies are (in like manner) insufficient to protect a perfidious Prince from the danger of humane punishment, which is comely but a sequel and effect of the iust iudgements of God. In whose hand are the hearts and willes of all men, and wherewith hee slaine his Instruments, to execute his Iustice vpon Princes, when they deserue it.

Besides, it is euident enough in true reason of state, that although there were no danger at all of Gods wrath: yet these and such other Machiuanilian policies, are not only insufficient to prevent or remedy the inconueniences, which Wicked Princes incur by the hatred of Men, but also do (many times) encrease their dangers, and helpe to precipitate them to the vtter destruction, wherof I shall haue better occasion to speake hereafter.

In the meane time, this shall suffice, for so much as concerneth the Vertue of fidelity in a Prince, with this conclusion. That because the danger which growth vnto Princes by fraud and deceit, proceedeth pose: therefore the trouble (in this case is to bee borne with patience, in respect of the benefit that he may reap thereby.

The other thing necessary for a counsellors better information, is to procure frequent aduises and intelligences, by Letters from all parts, of the State, humors, and disposition of forraign Princes; of all changes and innovations in their Courts and Countreys : Of the Mariages and Alliances of them, their Children, and their most powerful subiects : Of Ambassages too and fro, and their Treaties : Of prouisions and preparations for warre, both by Sea and Land, and their intentions therein : Of all Taxes and impositions laid vpon the people, or other leauies of Monies : Of the diuisions that fall out amongst the Nobility or common people, and of their discontentments: Finally, of all matters that may tend to the establishment and strengthening, or to the weakening and innovating of our Princes States. For, although a Councillor shal by this meanes, heare manie vntruths : yet hee shal verie often receiue aduise of important matters, whereof he may make good vse and benefit.

30 And being a man of iudgement, and having intelligence with manie, he may easily discern truths from falshoods, by conferring their aduises together, especially, if hee take order that his Intelli-gencers doe not know of one anothers employment.

40 Finally, he shal by this meanes, not only iudge better and more clearly of all matters occurring for his Princes seruice, but shal also make himselfe much more grateful to his Prince, by his diligence : and be more intrinsical with him, by occasion of his frequent aduices of forren newes, which Princes are alwayes most desirous to heare. And thus much for the first point.

Secondly, a Councillor is to consider, that in all matters of Council, 3, things are especially to be respected, as Thomas Aquinas (following Aristotle) noateth. The fyrst, a due end. The second, convenient means. And the third fyr time and season, that is to say, that the end and means be not only lawfull, iust, and honorable in themselves, and in their owne Nature: but also to the person, state, and power of the Prince. any inconuenience or disproportion in any of these, I meane, if the meanes bee not contented for the obtaining of the end, or, if the end or meanes be impossible, or about the might and power of the Prince, or base, or any way vnfit for his state and person, or if the councill be giuen out of due time and season, especially too late: it looseth all grace, & cannot be accounted either good or prudent.

To this purpose I say, that according to Platoes rule, he who is to give his opinion of any matter, ought first to understand & know fully the state of things at the circumstances. For mans judgement is grounded on his knowledge, and guided thereby, Some one little circumstance winnowe may wholly alter the case. Inasmuch, that a simple man may iudge more wisely thereof, than a far wiser man that knoweth lesse. And the reason why wifemen do not alwaies iudge with like wisdom and prudence in all causes, is, because they do not understand them like

But to proceed, the state and circumstances of the matter being once fully knowne to the Councellor, he is then to passe to the consideration of the inconveniencies, difficulties, dangers, discommodities, & commodities therof, which may minister different arguments, Pro et contra, in the discussion wherof, the prudence of a Councellor is especially seen.

And here I note by the way (though perhaps I may seeme to digresse from the matter) that some men, who haue great viuacity and sharpnes of wit, to find out inconueniences to foresee dangers, and to propound obiectiōns, doubts, and difficulties, haue no maturity of iudgement to clear and decide them, or to find out remedies. And some others, who are of more found iudgement, are lesse sharpe of wit. Again s^r. me who are of good capacity, haue so lecke charge, that they are dismaid with euery difficulty, and therefore cannot easily resolve on anye thing.

¶ Whereas some others of lesse capacitie and more courage, resolve more easily in any occasion. So that we may say with the Poet, Non omnia possumus omnes, we cannot al do al things. And therefore Phil. de Commes obserueth very wel, that it is conuenient for Princes to haue many counsellors, to the end, that one of them may supply the defects of another. For the wisel (saith he) erre oftentimes either through passion, or through hate or affection, or through the indisposition of the persons, especially after dinner. And if any thinke, that such ought not to be made Councellers; it may be answered that we are a men. And whosoever will have none to be of a Princes counsell; that erre at any time in speech or opinion; or are otherwise mooved, and led with passion or affection; hee must seek them in the same; for in each none such are to be found. Thus said he, who was himselfe at graue and wife Counceller, which I note herebye by the way to the end, that young Councellers may learne, neither to assure themselves much on their owne opinions, nor rashly to condemne others of their fellow Councellers, if they erre and be deceived sometimes.

And to prosecute this digression yet a little further, I also adde, that it is necessary for a Prince, to haue his Councell compos'd like mans body, that is, of men of different complexions & humors, to the end, that the Chollerick heate, and hasty fauor of some, may be tempered with the Flegmatick coldnesse, and slow resolution of some other, and that the pinacy of some ruens anguine spirites, may be somewhat deprefsed and counterpoized with the maturity of some others meancholy iudgements, which Aristotle holdeth to be the founde in matters of State. Whereby the whole bodie of the Councell, may be reduced vnto a perfect temperature, so that the predominant qualitie therein be found in most, or in some at the least, which may helpe to correct the peccant and offensive humors of the rest, restrain the superfluity of ouer flowing conceits, cleare doubts and difficulties, and satisfie Obiections which proceedeth (manie times) from them who are not able to resolve them, yet ferue to great purpose in Councels, to whet the wits, and open the vnderstanding of men of iudgement. This I haue thought good to touch by the way, that the young Councell or whom I aduise, may vnderstande somewhat, as well of the Nature and Condition of a Councell, as of the Office and duty of a Councillor.

But now to return to the consideration of matters to be consulted, it is requisite, that a Councillor do prudently weigh and compare the discommodities with the commodities, & inconueniences with the remedies, the difficulties & dangers, with the possibility and probability to overcome them. And not to rectify a verie commodious and honorable designement, because it is costly, or some way difcommodious or difficult and hard, or some way dangerous. For as the proverbe saith; There is no commodity without difcommodity, nor any thing honorable, which is not difficult. And therefore, it is to bee foreseene and provided, that the commodities may outweigh the damages, that the gaine quite the cost, that euerie inconuenience haue a due remedie; that euery difficulty be some way facilitated; that euery important danger may be probably prevented or escaped; that of commodities (which cannot be had together) the greater be chosen; and of inconueniencies (when all cannot be auoided) the least be admitted. All which being foreseene, and probably provided for, anie important action whatsoeuer, may be determined, counsell'd, and vnder-taken, notwithstanding some dangers may be incident thereto. For he that will not take paines to cracke the Nut, cannot eat the kernell, and he that will hazarde nothing, shall win nothing: for nouit venter (saith the Prouerb; nouit haue.

Yet this is to be vnderstood, that the danger bee not ouer-great, which may partly be provided for, if it be foreseene, that the greatest danger rather doth concerne some circumstance of the matter, then the principall partes, or the whole body of the plot; that the benefit expected, exceede the losse which may bee feared; that no certaine thing of moment be aduantaged, for a thing vncertain. For better one Bird in the hand, then two in the bush; that of matters doubtful, which cannot fully be resolved, the lesse doubtful, or more assured be preferred. And finally, that the hope of benefit be grounded vpon probable reason, and sufficient meanes to attaine the same, and not vpon chance, which is so vncertain, that no man may safely build any important matter thereon. And therefore, Tiberius Caesar helde it for a ground, as Cornelius Tacitus witnesseth, Non omittere caput verum, neque se in casum dare, Not to let slip the first opportunity, nor to adventure himselfe or his estate vpon chance. That is to say, not to hazard himselfe or his state in any enterprise, when he hath not sufficient probability of good successe.

For, although the euent of all plots that are put in execution, is casual, depending vpon the will of God; yet it is a wise mans part, to do that which lieth in him, to assure it by all probable and conuenient meanes, and then to leaue the rest to Gods disposition. For otherwife, hee should tempt God, and offend him by his negligence: and therefore, without this probability of assurance, no matter of importance ought to be attempted by a wise man. Except in desperate cases, when the necessity is great and so sudden (as sometimes it falleth out to be) that there is no time or place for discouise. For, then there is no remedy, but to trust only to God and a mans good fortune, which falleth out many times better, than by humane discouise can bee expected or imagined. As it did to Tullius Caesar, who finding himselfe vnable to giue battel to Pompey, because his forces were not arrived, and being (in the meane time) constrained to go to sea in a litle Frigate, in such stormy rough seas, that the Pilot would not passe forth, discovered himselfe, and bad him set sail and go forward in any case, because he carried Caesar and his fortune: which succeeded well, for thereby he escaped at that time, and afterward ouerthrew Pompey, and became Emperor of the world. But this he did, because he had no other remedy, thinking it better to put himselfe to the mercy of the seas, then of his enemie.

And in such desperat and sudden exigents, when there is no time and place for wisdom and discouise, the counsel of some woman or simple fellow, may be better then of the wisest man. For that (as Aristotle sayth) som such being by the gift of God, born fortunate, and following the impulse and motion of nature, may aduise or execute more happily, than men of great wisdom, who pondering all things in the ballance of reason and discouise, do not followe many times, a fortunat motion in themselves, nor happily couise of others, because they see not some good and probable or reasonable ground for the same whereby they forgo and loose their good fortune. And this is the reason, why the common Prouerbe saith, That a Womans Counsel is neuer good but vpon the sudden. For when Women counsel according to their first motion, they

they may counsell fortunately, either by chance, or by some naturall impulse or motion: whereas, falling to discouise of reason, or to deliberation, they liidom or neuer counsell wisely, through the infirmity and weaknesse of their iudgement. And to this purpose, Aristotle allegeth the old Prouerb, Fortuna fauet stultis, fortuna fauoreth fooles, as I haue signified before, concerning this point.

Heerupon I conclude two things. The one, that except in case of necessity, a wise-man ought to leaue nothing vnto chance, that may be any way assured by reasonable meanes, in respect of the danger that may ensue thereby. For, although dangerous counsels (grounded vpon hope of good fortune) please well sometimes by meer chance, yet they proue most commonly pernicious. And therefore, the Wiseman sayeth wisely: Qui amat periculum perit in illo, He that loveth danger, shall perish therein.

The other Conclusion is, that seeing men are many times put to such sudden extremities, that they haue no time or opportunity to aduise themselves, or to consult with others: it is most necessary that they arme and provide themselves against the same, by frequent Prayer, and by daily recommending all their actions to almighty God, the author and giuer of all good successe. To the end, that he may (in such cases) guide, protect, and prosper them: and this I hold to bee the soundest aduise, that any counsellor can giue to his Prince. Thus much for the second consideration.

The third, shall be to ponder and examine diligently, not onely the present state of the matter, and the immediate or next sequel thereof: but also, what may be like to succeed from time to time: and especially, what may be the conclusion, or (as I may terme it) the vpper of the whole. For many times it falleth out, that designments prosper well for a while, and yet ouerthrow the authors or attempters in the end: not so much by Fortune or chance, as by ouer-sight in the counsellor or contriuer thereof. For hee being deceived with the appearance or hope of some present, or neere commoditie, fore seeth not, or else neglecteth some future and finall disgrace. Much like vnto the sick-man, who following his owne appetite, eateth or drinketh some one thing, which refresheth and contenteth him for the present, yet augments his disease, or killeth him in the end.

In this point, all wicked and Machi- willian Counsellors faile for the most part, which do often succcede well for a time, thorough Gods permission, for secret causes best knowne vnto his Diuine Wisdom: but in the end, do destroy Princes and their States, partly thorough the iustice of almighty God, and partly by the error and negligence of the Counsellors: in true reason of State as shall be more at large prouoed hereafter.

In the meane time I adde for the present, a fourth Consideration to the same purpose, to wit, that a Wise Counsellor ought to weigh the Commodities of euery thing, with the stability and security thereof: and not to aduise his Prince with a fewe yeares present pleasure or benefit, to purchase manie yeares future paine or difcommodities. But, rather to endure some disadvantage or damage for a time, when thereby he may attaine to some stable and permanent good afterward.

And this he may learne by the counseil that Nature holdeth in human affaires, ordaining Motion for rest, business for repose, Labour for ease, and payne for pleasure. In which respect, a Wise-man laboureth when he is young, to rest in his Olde age, and taketh a loathsome Potion, or bitter Pill, to recouer health, and willingly endureth all Temporal misery, to attaine in the end to eternal Felicitie. This (I say) not onely Nature, but also true Wisdom (which always followeth the course and steps thereof) doth teach us no lesse in matters of State, then in all other humane affaires.

Therefore by the same reason, a counsellor ought also to preferre a certain and durable commoditie, though it be lesse, before a greater, that is (short and vncertain). To which purpose, Theopompus King of Lacedaemonia, answered the Queen his wife very well, when she lamented to him, that he would leaue his royal authority lesse to his children, than he had received it, because he had obtained a greater Controller of Kings, called Agrius, (a quack-hee) than he had the greater.

become it shall more firme and sure. Thus sayd he. wisely measuring the benefit of Princely Authority: was so much by greatness, as by surety and stabilitie; whereto all the Councelles and endeauiours of Wise Councellours and Statists ought chiefly to tend: yet with this consideration, that although of worldly things, some are more stable and permanent then others: yet there is no true stability in any of them; and that therefore; all Wisemens Councelles are especially directed, to the attaining of Heauenlye things, wherein is true stability and eternity. Thus much for considerations to be had in generall, concerning matters to be consulted.

And, forasmuch as sufficient Rules cannot be given in particular, concerning the same, in respect that the affaires of State are infinite and variable, by reason of the infinite occasions & accidents which fall out daily to be considered (all which may require different considerations, according to the different Nature and quality of the matters, and the sundrie circumstances of times, places, and persons) I haue therefore thought good (for examples sake, and the instruction of young Statists) to handle and debate heere, some one matter of State, by way of discourse. And because occasion is offered oftentimes, to deliberate about the maintenance of a Ciuill Warre in a forraigne Country, I will set downe mine Opinion, what aduise a yong Statist may safely giue, concerning the same.

CHAP. IX.

For the better instruction, and more particular information of a yong Councellour, concerning matters to be consulted: a matter of State is debated, so wit; What is to be considered in a deliberation, touching the maintenance of a Ciuill Warre, in a forraigne Country.

Whoever shall giue aduise concerning the maintenance of a Ciuill warre, in a Forraigne Country, it shall be convenient for him (in my fancy) for to consider principally these points following.

First, the Equity and Iustice of the cause, as well on his Princes part, to wit; whether it may be iust and lawfull in him, to giue the assistance demanded: as also, whether their quarrell, which demand the same, be lawfull and iust, or no. For, if Iustice and Equitie want in eyther of both, no commodity that a Prince can receiue or expect, can counteruail the dishonor, danger, and damage which he shall assuredly incur by the offence of Almighty God. Quasi spiritum Principum; & terribilis est apud Reges terra. Who taketh the spirit of Princes away is terrible to the Kinges of the Earth. And will assuredly exact the penaltie thereof on him, or perhaps on his state, or on both, sooner or later. Which is the chiefe and highest point of state, to be considered in all deliberations of princes, seeing the utter destruction and ruin of them and their estates, proceedeth principally from the offence of God, as hath bin more at large before discussed.

It is also to be considered, what good and iust motives his Prince may haue on his own part, to giue the succours demanded, which may be reduced to four causes. The first, when he may thereby do some notable seruice to God, which is alwaies in it selfe not only honorable but profitable, as it were money put to interest, in respect of the reward which hee shall assuredly receiue at gods hands for the same howsoever it succeed for the present.

The second case is, when he is bound by Oath, promise, or gratitude, to succour the party that craueth his aide. For in such case, the omission thereof (when it may iustly and conveniently be done) were both offense to God, & also, dishonorable and dangerous to a Prince, as well in respect of Gods punishment for his periury as also for the bad example, and iust occasion he should giue vnto others his Allies and confederates, yea, and to his owne subiects to forsake him in his necessity.

The third case is, when the Prince of whom the succour is demanded, hath a iust pretence vnto a forraigne Crowne or State, for the obtaining whereof, he may hope to haue a party, by maintaining a iust quarrell in the same State or Country. Wherein respect is to be had, that that the Princes own forces be sufficient for the execution of his enterprize, that he shall not neede to relie. further vpon his partie; then onely to facilitate the same. For, if his hope of good successe, eyther in obtaining his pretence, or in conferring or maintaining it afterward, doe chiefly depend vpon the good will, fidelity, and strength of such a party: he buildes (as a man may say) vpon the Sand, and puts in aduenture his labour, charges, and reputation.

Hereof wee haue had a lamentable example not many yeares past, in Sebastian, King of Portugal, who hoped to make himselfe King of Marocco, vnder colour to restore thereto Muley Mahomet, whereof he made so sure account; that he carryed a Crowne with him, to crowne himselfe King there. Not considering, that his aduersary Muley Alucuo (who was in possession of that kingdom) was not onely most valiant for his person; but also able to put into the field for his defence, about 100000. Horse and foote.

Against whom neuertheless, King Sebastian undertook the enterprize, with an Army of 13000. Souldiours, or there about, the most of them vntaunted: beside, neither he himselfe, nor any that did commaund the Army vnder him, had euer borne Armes before. In so much, that he trusted (as it seemed) to the conduct and forces of Muley Mahomet his Confederate, who when hee came to tryall, was not able to bring to the field 2000. men. So that, aduenturing with so few, to fight with about 40000. Horse, and 20000. Foote, and (as some say) a farre greater number: his Army was presently enclosed on all sides, and so oppressed with multitudes, that he lost both the battaile, and his life. So perillous a thing it is for a Prince to ground any designment of a forraigne Warre eyther on the weaknesse of an Enemy, or on the strength of a Confederate, and not vpon sufficient forces of his owne. But to proceede.

The fourth case is, when to auoide some imminent danger, or inuasion or Warre at home, or other great vexation: a Prince is forced to holde his Enemy occupied in his owne Countrey, by supporting there a iust quarrell against him. Wherein, though he spend largely, without fear of loss, in respect of the present security which hee purchaseth, and exemption from greater expences and danger at home: neuertheless, it shall be Wise to doe for him, (in my iudgement) to practise the counsell which Alcibiades the Athenian gaue to Tissaphernes in like case, to wit. Not to giue greater succor, then may suffice to keep the warres in a foote, as well to gain time, which often remedeth the greatest inconvenience; as also to extenuate and weaken both parties, in such sort, that whether the warre end by victory or composition, they may haue no ability to assaile him. Which he may well feare, though the party which he assisteth should prevail.

For this purpose, it is to be considered, that Ciuill diffentions end many times, to the cost of the Forraigne Prince who maintained them: whether they end by victorie of the enemy, or of his Confederate, or else by their composition. For, his enemy, if hee overcome, remaineth more irritated, and more obliged to seek reuenge then before. And his Confederate, if hee vanquish the other, and succeed him in his State: is more like to prove an enemy then a friend, especially, if the quarrell of the other was not personall (that is to say, proceeding of some petticular iniurie done to his person) but a quarrell of State, as commonly it is, for in that case, whoeuer shall be Governour of the same State, will be his enemy, notwithstanding, any benefit receiued. For experience teacheth, that respect of gratitude for benefits past, lieth inuileth, when it is any way encountered with reason of State.

Which (as Guicciardin saith) finde ogni partito, North (with Princes) overweigh all other considerations. And is so variable, according to the variety of occasions, and successe of affaires: that it changeth daily, and of a Friend this day, maketh an enemy to morrow. In which respect, the Leagues & amities of Princes, is commonly very vntrue, bee the obligation neuer so great.

Moreover, it commonly falleth out, that the party whom a forraigne Prince helpeth to aduance, remaineth his debter for the charges bestowed in his succour: wherevpon it followeth many times, times, that the Creditour looſeth both his Friend and his Money. For, if he truſt to bare promiſes of repayment, he is in danger to be ſerued, as was Edward the Blacke Prince, who going in perſon (with a great Army into Spaine) to ſuccour Peter the King of Caſtile, vpon his promiſe to repay him all his expences (was after the victorie) ſo delayed and deluded by him, that hee was faine to returne without any ſatisfaction. By meanes whereof, hee was conſtrained to lay ſuch impositions vpon his owne Subjects in Aquitaine, for the payment of his ſouldiours: that they rebelled, and hee loſt the greateſt part of that Country.

And put the caſe, that hee haue any places or Towns deliuered him, in conſideration of his expences, or his better ſecurity, which any Prince that giue ſuccour to Forraigners) hath reaſon to ſeeke: then his friend many times (for reaſon of State) becomes his Enemy, to recover thoſe places which he gaue him before. And ſo it falleth out commonly, when ſouereign ciuill wars and diſſentions come to end, by composition of the parties deuised who willingly agree, and ioine themſelves againſt the Forraigner that maintained their diſunion. Eſpecially, if he haue any hold or footing in their Countrey, though it were at the firſt with their owne conſent, whereof I wil allege a few examples, as well Antient as Moderne.

In the Barons wars in England, in the time of King John, Lewes the eight, then Son to Phillip the ſecond King of France, aſſiſted the Barons againſt their King, and being called by them into England, and proclaimed King thereof: was ſhortly after (by common conſent, as well of them, as of al the other Engliſh) driuen out againe.

Alſo Phillip, Duke of Burgundy, to be reſented on the Duke of Orleans, & on Charles the ſeauenth, while hee was yet but Dolphin: called Henry ſixth, King of England into France, & aſſiſted him firſt to make him Regent, & after to crown not only him, but alſo Henry the ſixth his Son, King of France in Paris. Yet in the end, he made his peace with King Charles aforeſaide, and helped him to depriue the Engliſh of all that, which either they had got by his meanes, or otherwile.

In like manner, Charles the eighth, King of France, was moſt earnestly ſollicit to the Conqueſt of Naples, euen by the Neapolitans themſelves: who, neuertheleſſe ſhortly after helped to expel the Garifons and forces which he had left ther, notwithstanding they had receiued great benefits of him.

In this age alſo, the late Queene of England, of glorious memory, gaue ſome ſupport in the firſt troubles of France, to her great charges. But when peace was made in the year of our Lord 1562. they all ioynd againſt her, to recouer Haure de Grace from her, which they had before giuen her, for aſſurance of the Mony, by her lent them.

And laſtly, notwithstanding the coſtly ſuccours of Men and Mony, that the French Catholikes receiued from the Catholike King of Spaine: yet they forſook him almoſt all in the end, and ioined with his and their aduerſe partie, and made War againſt him, to recouer of him ſome few Towns in the frontiers of Flanders, which they had giuen him before, for his and their ſecurity.

Therefore, although theſe things doe not alwaies ſucceed in this manner, yet ſo farre as moſt commonly they do, and that nothing is more vncertaine, then that which dependeth on the will, affection, or gratitude of other men, or vpon reaſon of ſtate, which varieth and changeth daily, according to the variety of occaſions. I hold it for a ſpeciall point of prudence in a Prince, to take the ſureſt way, to wit, not to engage himſelf too far, nor to adventure more, then he careth not to looſe, in the maintenance of a ciuill Warre in a forraigne Country: except, when either the ſervice of God, ſome juſt obligation, or the conſeruation of his own ſtate doth neceſſarily require it. Thus much concerning the behaue of the Prince that is to giue the ſuccour. Furthermore, great conſideration is to be had, of the State and condition of the parties which demand it: as, whether they be able to ouercome their aduerſaries, or (at leaſt) to ſtand and maintaine their quarrell, with the aſſiſtance which they craue, or may be giuen them. For otherwiſe, it were great impudence in any Prince, to vndertake their maintenance: but rather to endeavour by way of treaty ty (betwixt them and their aduerſarie) to compound the quarrell, and thereby to make himſelfe gratefull to both parties.

And for as much as it many times falleth out, that the ability and power of the party which craueth aſſiſtance, conſiſteth not in the ſtrength of ſome one potent and absolute Prince, but in the force of many Princes, Townes, or States, confederated and leagued together: it is in ſuch caſe ſpecially to be conſidered, how, or vpon what reaſons, the ſaid partie is vnitd.

To this purpoſe it is to be noted, that in all confederacies and leagues, where in many do vnit themſelves: the confederacies are moued thereto, either with one motive or end (as in the Cantons of the Switzers, or in the League which the Pope, the King of theomaines, the King of Spaine, the Venetians, and the Duke of Aulaine, made againſt Charles the eighth, King of France, for the defence of Italie.) Or elſe they are moued thereto with diuers and ſundry motives, ſome with one, and ſome with another.

As for example, in the late French League or vniſon, ſome entered onelie for conſeruation of the Catholike Religion (which was the common and pretended end of all that partie) others entered for particular reſpects: as either for paſſion or ambition, or for the friendſhip of ſome one Man on the one ſide, or hatred of ſome one on the other, or for hope of future gaine, or for preſent profit and commoditie, or ſuch like.

Now then, thoſe that are led by particular reſpects, doe not (for the moſt part) remaine any longer in any league, then they may hope to obtaine their deſires. And when they are perſwaded, that they may ſooner obtaine the ſame, by adhearing to the aduerſe partie; they are eaſily induced thereto: and hereupon followeth commonly, the diſſolution of ſuch leagues and confederacies. For which cauſe, the ſtrength and power of any leagues, is not to be meaſured ſo much by the multitude of confederates, be they neuer ſo great and potent: as by their concurrence and agreement in one and the ſame end. For, as a few vnder one head, are ſtronger then many, vnder many and different heads; as Phillip de Communes noeth very well: ſo a few principall perſons or Townes, vnitd together for one and the ſelfe ſame cauſe, are to be repared far ſtronger, and more like to ſtand; then verie many (though much more potent) if they haue many and different ends.

Therefore it much importeth a Prince, that ſhall ſupport a Forraigne League, to diſcouer (as much as hee may) what end or motive induced the Heades and principall Confederates, to make their entrance. Whereby he ſhall the better diſcerne, what their force and ſtrength may be, and how they are like to ſtand, and to maintaine their quarrell. For, if they haue al but one end, they may be repared the ſtronger: but if then ends be diuers, they cannot long ſtand. As wee haue ſcene lately in the French League, which, notwithstanding the great ſuccours (both of Men and Mony) giuen them by the Catholike King: diſſolved rather of it ſelfe, then by any forces of enemies, by reaſon that many of the Gouvernours of Townes, and chiefe Pillers thereof, conſidered not in one end with the whole league.

And therefore, when they receiued ſatisfaction for their particular deſires, or ſaw themſelves out of hope thereof, they eaſily changd their party.

To ſuch Leagues (I ſay) vnitd onely in exterior ſhew, and not in one common end: I hold it not ſecure or conuenient for a Prince to giue ſuccour; except he be moued thereto by ſome imminent danger of inuaſion, or other great damage. Which he may feare to receive from the enemy occupied, as I haue ſignified before, while he neither prepares for his better defence at home, or at leaſt may winne time; which in all extremities is to be fought; and often remedie the very greateſt diuiniens.

Moreouer, ſo farre as theſe ſuccours demanded or giuen, conſiſt commonly either in Money, Men, or in both, and that it may import a Prince (for the furtherance of ſome juſt pretence, or obligation of his own, or for ſome publique good) to employ not only his forces, but alſo his Mony largely, to maintain and ſupport a Forraigne League: I wil adde ſome what concerning the ſame, to the end, that a young Statist may or in both.

may the better vnderstand, both what to aduise, and also how to deale therein.

Therefore, first concerning the bestowing of Money, I say, that although it cannot be denied, but that Money may doe very much in all busineses of this quality. (For, Quidnam mortalia peccata cogit auri sacra fames? What doth not the desecrable hunger of Gold compell Men to do?) Yet ordinarily, the effect that Money can worke, is but to dispose the wils and mindes of Men to the desired end. Which disposition (neuerthelesse) in some that receiue the Money, is none at all, in others very little, and in most very doubtfull, and to be suspected. For those to whom thou giuest thy Money, either are thine enemies, or thy friends, or else neutrall. If they be thine Enemies, commonly they take thy Money, to impouerish thee, to enrich themselves, and to employ thine owne Money against thee, when they shall see time.

If they be thy Friends, thy Money worketh little; because their own good will and friendship, bindeth them more vnto thee, then thy Money can doe. If they be neutrall, & become thy Friends for the profit they haue by thee: their friendship will last no longer then the profit continueth. And when they may think to get more by thine enemy, then by thee: they will be his friends for the same reason, that they were thine. And although they shall haue neuer so great benefit by thee; yet they will periwade themselves, that thou seekest thine own Commoditie, and not theirs, and that thou art beholding vnto them, for that they doe vouchsafe to take any thing of thee.

And forasmuch, as the hunger and desire of Money, doth encrease with the possession and vse thereof: the more thou giuest them, the more they will desire. For, as Cicero saith; Fit deterior quis accipit, & ad idem semper expectandum parator; He which taketh or receiveth Money, is made worse thereby, and alwayes the more ready to expect the like. So that, if thou doe not euer giue them, when, and how much they shall expect or demand of thee: they will hate thee more for that which thou dost not giue them, then they haue loved thee for that which they haue receiued already. For, as Seneca saith. Pecunia nota ingratus est, dati immemores meminisse negati, adeoque rara & repentes gratias ferunt da & frequentes querela. It is an old and notorious ingratitude, to forget a benefit receiued, and still to remember a benefit denied. Whereupon it followeth, that thanks are rare and cold; and Complaints, feruent and frequent.

I speake not this, for that I thinke it not conuenient to negotiate with Money, to gaine and entertaine the affections of men: but to signifie, that it is to be done with great consideration. For, as Pliny saith. Inconsiderate largitionis comes penitentia est. Repentance euer accompanieth the inconsiderate imployment of Money. Therefore to say some-what of this point, my opinion is, that it is conuenient for any man, that doth negotiate with Money in a strange Country: to haue his Purse alwayes open, for such as are true Friends to him and the League, as well to gratifie them, and to recompence their good wils and good Offices; as also to helpe their necessities, and to enable them to uphold their partie.

And those may be accounted true Friends, whose end is eyther the common end of the whole League: or fo dependant thereon, that it cannot be otherwise obtained, but by the good successe of the League. And to such, Money may euer bee securely giuen, when their necessities, or the publike good of the League shall require it. But vnto others, little or nothing is to be giuen (in my fancy) except it bee to buy of them some important places; or to recompence intelligences, or seruices already done. And therefore it shall bee conuenient, to vse all diligence (as before I haue signified) to discouer the true Motiues, that induced euery one to whom Money is to be giuen, to enter into the League.

And in case it may seeme needfull, to aduenture some what, to entertaine some few principall men, though neutrals, or suspected, to diuert them from compounding with the enemy: it shall bee conuenient (in my fancy) to giue them largely, and more then the Enemy is like to giue them, and precisely to accomplish what else shall be promised. For

A man corrupted with monie, will be faithfull to no man.

For otherwise, they will acknowledge no Obligation, and when the Enemy shall giue them more, they will follow him: and if promise bee not kept with them, they will esteeme themselves to be mocked, and (for very disdain) will passe to the Enemy: and of all this, I saw daily experience in the time of the League in France. There the Catholike King bestowed many Millions, in Pensions, in entertainments, which many receiued, and after became his open Enemies. Some of them, because they were not punctually paid their entertainments; Others, because (as they pretended) promise was not kept with them in other things; And some others againe, either because they could not haue whatsoeuer they demanded, or because that others had more then they.

But how much soeuer shall be bestowed vpon one or other, there is no security or assurance, in negotiating with Money alone: except the same bee eyther accompanied, or shortly seconded with sufficient forces, which concurring therewith, may worke great effect. And therefore the Oracle saide to Philip of Macedon: Habitu pugna argentatis, & omnia vincies: Fight with sinured shields, and thou shalt ouercome all: aduising him thereby, to imploy Money and Forces together. For, as for negotiation with money alone, the longer it continueth; the more danger there is, both to loose the Money and the businesse. For no trust is to be had in affection bought with Money, and not grounded on reason & vertue. In which respect Philip King of Macedon, saide very well to his Sonne Alexander, who sought to gaine from him the goodwils of the Macedonians, with guits and bribes. What mischief (quoth he) persuadeth thee to thinke, that those will bee faithfull to thee, whom thou hast corrupted with Money?

This much for this matter, wherof much more might be said, if the question were reduced to peticular persons and Countreys; which might minister other important considerations of difficulties, according vnto the Nature, strength, or weaknesse of the places, and the conditions and abilities of the persons, who were to bee succoured or impugned. Which I forbear to prosecute any further, to passe to another matter meaning to debate, whether the remedies which Politiques reach, against the daungers and inconueniencies growing of wickednesse be sufficient (in reason and true policy) to assure the State of a wicked Prince. By occasiō whereof, I will examine diuers principles of Machiuiilian Doctrine, and shew the absurditie thereof. To the end, that the young States, whom I labour to informe, may vnderstand as well what to auoyde, as what to embrace in matter of policy, and that a Princes State cannot be assured by wickednesse.

CHAP. X.

Another Question is debated, for the further enstruction of a young States, to wit: whether a Princes State can be assured by wicked policy? By the occasion whereof, many principles of Machiuiilian, and of the Politiques his followers, are examined and confuted by reason of state without the consideration of Gods Iustice.

O Man that is endued with reason, will denie, that wickednesse in a Prince, maketh him hatefull to his Subiects, and (consequently) endangereth his Estate. Which all Machiuiilians and Politiques knew so well; that the greatest part of their policy, consisteth in deuising remedies against the same. To the end, that their Prince may bee securely wicked, that is to say, that he may purchase and enjoy all Worldly pleasures and commodities, Pecunia & uicis, By right or wrong: without danger of any reuenge of Man, and not fearing the wrath and Iustice of God, because they beleue not, that there is a God, (or at least that he medleth not with the affaires of Men.

First let vs see some of their Remedies. One of the principall (according to the Doctrine of their Maister Machiuiilian)

Machiavell is, extremity of all mischief and wickednesse, which Machiavell teacheth to be far more secure for a Prince, then mediocrity betwixt vertue and vice. Therefore he would have his Prince to be, either the best man living, or the worst: that is to say, either to be a Saint or a Deuill. Whereof his reason must needs be (if he have any) that he which Machiavell would have a Prince to be either a Saint or a Deuill.

Excessive wickednesse expoleth a Prince to excessive hatred Cicero in Offic. Lib. 2.

No force or power can sufficiently resist the hatred of many. Politiques seeke abundantly to remedy hatred by feare.

Feare concurring with hate makes it more dangerous to him which is hated, and why.

both hate and feare, do deliberate, and execute with much more maturity and consideration, and (consequently) with lesse danger to themselves, and more to their enemy. So that, while the Prince doth adde feare to the hate of his Subjects: he redoubleth both his own feare, and also his owne perill. Whereupon the Tragical Poet saith.

Qui sepra duro laeus imperio regit, Timet timentes, metus in autorem vedit.

That is to say. He which governeth by severity and cruelty, feareth those which feare him, and the feare turneth upon the Author or cause thereof. And, as Seneca the Stoick saith. Nesse est ut multos timeat, quem multo timet. He must needs be in feare of many, whom many feare. Also Cicero, following Ennius the Poet, saith notably thus. Quem metunt odervnt. &c. Men hate him whom they feare, and every one desireth the destruction of him whom he hateth: And no force or power of Empires bee is new so great as can long stand, if it be prest with continuall feare of the Subjects. Thus saith Cicero, declaring the danger that groweth to a Prince by hatred & feare, which are the most forcible and vrgent Motives that may be, to move a people to conspiracies, as well among themselves, as with forrainers: both to deliver themselves of the feare, as also to discharge their hatred & ire upon their Prince. Wherefore Aristotle doth reckon hatred and feare, among the principall causes, of the destruction of Monarchies and tyrannies.

But heere say the Machiavellians. For, this cause hath the Prince his Guardes, Armies, and Fortresses, to defend himselfe from all attempts, both Forraigne and Domestical: besides the vigilancy and pollicy which he useth, for the prevention of conspiracies; disarming and impowering his Subjects; forbidding their assemblies and publike conventi- ons; and all other meanes, which may breed love, trust, and confidence among them. Terrifying the (oftentimes) with the frequent shew of his Guardes and Garrisons, to make them servile & base minded; suffering them to be vicious & dissolute of life, to make them effeminate: nor permitting them the use of Schooles, or other meanes, whereby they may become learned, wise, & pollicke. Employing his spies every where, for for the discovery of every mans intention. Nourishing divisions among the greatest, to counterpoize one with another. Suspecting all men, be they never so much bound to him. And finally, cutting off (by one means or other) all those whose power, courage, or wit, he may thinke to be dangerous to his State: whereby he (shall be secure from the dangers which may grow to his person or State, by the hatred of his Subjects.

Whereto I answer, that if Machiavell, or some other Politicke in these our daies, had bin the first inventors of these policies, and that they had never bin yet tried it might with more reason be supposed, that there were, or might be some assurance therein for a wicked Prince. But seeing all this, or whatsoever else Machiavell, or any Politicke doth teach, for the conservation of a Tyrant, hath bin practised in all times & ages, by Tyrants and wicked Princes, who (nevertheless) have al, or the most part of the perished by the hatred of men: who seeth not the insufficiency thereof, for the assurance of a Prince in wickednesse?

Can Machiavell or any other Politicke, teach more to this purpose, then we find written above 2000. yeares ago by Aristotle in his Politiques? Who shewing the meanes, whereby Tyrants seeke to preferre themselves and their states: minimalist to Machiavell and his fellows, al the matter and substance of their wicked policies. Which nevertheless, were not approved by Aristotle, as sufficient for the conservation of tyranny: but venterily rectified by him. In which respect, he declareth how vniuersal tyranny is, and exemplifieth the same in all tyrannical state, which had bene before, or in his time.

Shewing how speedily they all perished, excepting only four: whereof the first continued 100. yeares, the second 73. and sixe months; the third, 33. and the fourth, 22. yeares. And the cause of the long continuance of the first and second, he ascribeth to the moderate and iust government of the Tyrants, who though they got their States tyrannically, and held them by usurpation (in regard whereof they are called Tyrants) yet they governed with such moderation and Iustice, that they were greatly beloued of their Subjects.

To which purpose Aristotle also obserueth, that the state of a Tyrant is so much the more sure: by how much more moderate it is; and nearer to his iust government of a King. Wherein al Machiavellians may note, both by the doctrine and experience of Aristotle: that the extremity of wickednesse and tyranny, is the high way to carry a Prince headlong to his destruction, notwithstanding all their preventions aforesaid. Whereof some part are most necessary for the conservation of any Princes state: as Guardes, Garrisons, Fortresses, vigilance of Councellers, diligence of Spies and Intelligencers, as also such other parts of those policies, as are conformable to reason, Iustice, & conscience. But the rest, I mean those points of hindring love and confidence among Subjects, immoderate pillaging and poulling them, making them effeminate, ignorant, & base minded, nourishing debate amongst great persons, and cutting off such as are more eminent in credit, power, courage, and wit, then the rest: these I say, and all such as are against charity, Iustice, and Conscience, are against all true pollicy, and to farre from helping a Tyrant, that they help to ruine him, as heere in this Chapter shall appear, concerning some of these points in peticular, and some in general.

And now to speake of some of them. What can be more contrary to the reason of State: then to hinder trust, confidence, and love among the people, without the which there can be no Commonwealth? For, without love & confidence, there can be no fidelity; & without fidelity, no Iustice; and without Iustice, no Commonwealth, as you have read in the necessity of fidelity in the Prince. For this cause, all ancient Lawmakers, and founders of commonwealths, have ordained in all Countreys and Cities, publike Feasts, Playes, and assemblies, where the people may meet together: not onely for recreation, but to make them also known one to another. To the end, that of their conuincation, may grow love and friendship, and the same redound to generall unity, for the conservation of peace in the whole Commonwealth. And therefore Aristotle saith, that friendship is: Maxima bonum ciuitatis. The greatest good: that can be to Commonwealths. For saith he, by means thereof, they shall be free from sedition. Also, so an esteemed this amity and vnion of minds, to be so necessary for the conseruation of humane Society, that, being demanded, what Common-wealth was best, and most like to continue: Such a one (saith he) wherein euery Man doth take the injury which is done to another, to be done to himselfe. And to the same purpose he made a law in Athens giuing leaue to euery one, to take vpon him the iust quarrel of any other, and to demand reparation of the wrong, as if the matter concerned himselfe. Which constitution of Solon, Plutarch commendeth greatly. As a means (saith he) to accusom the people, to feele and redresse the grieues & injuries one of another, as being all members of one body. Whereby he may vnderstand, that the vnion and loue of the political body (that is to say, the Common-wealth) is no lesse necessary; then the combination of the parts in the body naturall. Which Seneca teacheth notably in these words. Ut omnia inter se membra, &c. As all the members and parts of mans body, doe agree together for the conseruation of the whole, which also redoundeth to the good of euery part in particular: So all men ought to agree to the benefits one of another, because we are borne to liue in societie, which cannot be conserued, but by the agreement and loue of the parts thereof. Thus saith Seneca.

How then can it stand with true pollicie, or reason of State, to hinder this vnion and loue of the people, or to sow and nourish factions among them, and especially among great personages; whereby feditious, tumults, and garboyles may grow in the Common-wealth? Yes, say the Machiuiillians, it standeth notably wel with the reason of our Princes State, who seeketh not the generall good of the Common-wealth: but his particular benefit. And therefore, forasmuch as the vnion and friendship of subiects, may enable them the rather to conspire against him: it is good pollicie & reason of State for him, to maintaine factions among them, according to the old saying. Si vis regnare, diuide. If thou wilt reigne, make diuision.

Thus say they. Of whom I wold gladly learne, how they can (in this case) seperate the perill of the Common-wealth, from the perill of the Prince, to make this good pollicie for him? Can the body be in danger, without the perill of the head? Hath it not bin seen many times, that some priuate quarrell, growne at first betwixt meane personages: hath after passed further to a multitude, and (from them) come to be general to the ruine of a whole State? And therefore, Plutarch wisely comprehend feditio to a little sparke of fire, which falling into straw, or other dry matter in some corner of a houle: setteth the same on fire, whereby (in the end) a whole Towne is burnt. In which respect, he counteth it for one of the most speciall pointes of political Science: to take away all occasion of feditio, and when it groweth, to appeale it quickly.

Aristotle also teacheth the same verie seriously, affirming, that Sedition is the chiefe cause, of the mutation and subuersion of Common-wealths. Shewing how many waies it may rise, and how it may be remedied, & that it is alwaies dangerous, but then most pernicious, when it groweth among great personages. And therefore he aduiseeth, to remedy the same (if it be possible) in the very beginning, because: Principium dicitur esse diuisionis. The beginning is saide to be the one half of the whole. And little feditious at the first, grow after to be great, especially among great men: Whose discord (saith hee) draweth the whole Common-wealth after them. Whereby it may appeare, how dangerous and absurd is the counsell, which Machiuiillians giue to their Princes, to norish factions in their Common-wealth, & especially among great personages: as if Princes were omnipotent, and had the harts and wils of all men in their hands, to moue, sway, incense, or temper in such manner and measure, as it shall please them, which only is in Gods hand and power to do. So then it is euident in this case, that the Machiuiillians expose their Prince to manifest danger, without any assurance, or sufficient probability of remedie, which in matter of State is most absurd.

The like may also be said, of their other pestilent pollicies before mentioned, consisting in all kind of cruelty, iniustice, and wickednesse: whereby they make their Prince most odious to all men, and (by consequent) do draw them into manifest dangers, from which they are are notable to warrant or defend them by all their pollicies. As it may appeare by the experience of all ages & former times, vnto this wherein we liue, seeing all Histories doe testifie, that the more wicked and tyrannical Princes haue bin, and the more they haue incurred the hatred of men: the sooner they haue bin ruined; some by open rebellions of their subiects; some others, by their general description in fauour of strangers; others by secret conspiracies of a lew; and others also, by the desperate attempt of some one man, notwithstanding all their pollicies, power, force of Guards, Armies, Fortresses, or other humane meanes.

This point Cicero proneth, by the examples of Phalaris a most cruell Tyrant, whom all the people of the Agriguntines oppressed in a general tumult: and of Alexander, the Tyrants of Pharis, killed by his owne craft: And of Demetrius, King of Macedon, forsaken of all his subiects, in fauour of King Pyrrhus. To whom we may adde Romulus, the first founder of the Romain Empire, who hauing made himselfe hateful to his Senators: was murdered by them in the very Senate house. As L. Tarquinius Priscus, his third Succesor, being odious to the people for his In-iustice, and fraud towards the Children of Ancus Martius, whom he deprived of their Kingdome, though he was left their Tutor by their Father: was slaine by two Shepherds. In like manner, Tarquinius Superbus, the seventh and last King of the Romaines, who vsed all the tyrannicall pollicies aboue mentioned, violated all Lawes humane and diuine, for the conseruation of his estate: was neuertheless driuen out of his kingdome by his subiects, and the name of King and kingly authority, abolished among the Romaines (in hatred of him) for the space of 500. yeares.

And if wee looke into the Romaine Empire after Julius Caesar, we shall finde, that neither pollicie nor power, could defend many Emperors of Rome & Constantinople, against the hatred of Men. As, to omit many others, who perished vpon other occasions: it may appeare by (a) Julius Caesar himselfe, (b) Caligula, (c) Claudius, Nero, Domitian, (d) Commodus, (e) Digius, Iulianus, (d) Caracalla, (e) Opilius Maerinus, and his Son Diadumenus, (f) Helioabalis, Alexander Severus, Iulius Maximus, (g) Gabeus, (h) Philippus, (i) Aurelianus, (k) Constantine the first, (l) Gratian, Valentinian the third, Basiliscus, Zeno, Mauritus, Phocas, Heraclion, with his Mother Martina, Constantine the second, Justinian the second, Philippicus, Constantine the sixth, Nicephorus Stauratus, Leo Armenius, Michael the Son of Theophilus, Nicephorus, surnamed Phocas, Iohannes Zimisces, Michael Calaphates, Stratioticus, Michael Parapinacius, Andronicus Comnenus; and diuers others, who hauing incurred the hatred, either of their Subiects in general, or of some particular persons, were some of them paylozed, and others violently slaine, either by the fury of the people, or by their Nobility, or by their own Guards and Soldiers, or by their wives, Concubines, or seruants, or by other particuler men. Besides some others of them were deposed, and eyther confined into Monasteries, or deprived as well of their eyes and noses, as of their Empire. And one among the rest, to wit, Zeno, a most cruell and crafty Tyrant, was put into his Sepulcher alive (by the consent of his Wife) while he was drunke, or, as some write, taken with a fit of the falling sicknesse. Being also so hated of his owne Seruants and Guards, that when hee came to himselfe, and cried for help out of the sepulcher: no man assisted or pittied him, and so he died raging, and tearing his flesh with his teeth, as it appeared afterward when the Tombe was opened.

And although euery one of these was not so subtile, nor so pollicitic, nor yet so wicked, as Machiuiill would haue his Prince to be yet: it is euident in them all, that the hatred of Subiects is most pernicious to Princes. And in some of them it appeareth manifestly, that no humane power, or wicked pollicie, can warrant and assure them the State of a Prince generally hated: seeing that diuers of them before named, excelled not only in imperiall power, but also in subtile craft, perfidiousnesse, perjury, deepe dissimulation, cruelty, and all such kinde of wickednesse, as Machiuiill requireth in his Prince. med with receiving the blessed Sacrament. And being then Emperour alone, and finding himselfe to be hateful to his people: he practised all the tyrannicall Pollicies, that could be deuised for his owne conseruation. He guarded his Pal-lace and person, with strong Guards of barbarous Strangers, and the most deperate Fellows that could be found, who could neither speake nor under-

he had (beside) every night at his cham-

that he feared, that either their credit ny need or pretence to take bribes. And such as were proued to be corrupt, he punished so exemplarily: that (within a while) no Magistrate durst take so much as a present of any man, though it was neuer so voluntarily offered. He shewed himselfe affable and courteous vnto the poore, and seemed full of pity and compassion, whensoever hee heard their complaints, and did them exact Iustice.

Furthermore, he tooke such order, for the reliefe of the necessities of the common people: that all kinde of victuals were most plentifull and cheape; the ground well tilled and mannured, the Countries well inhabited; Villages and Citties much augmented, & the Common-wealth greatly enriched.

Such was the care hee seemed to haue of Iustice, and of the publique good, which (neuerthelesse) he respected no further: then it might turne to his own perticular benefit or pleasure, whereof he preferred the consideration, before all things else whatsoever. For, as he provided the Common-wealth of notable Magistrates: so he furnished his Court with wicked Councillours and Iudges, voyd of all conscience, who executed his will, vpon all such as incurred his dislike or suspicion. Some they banished, spoiled others of their goods; deprived others of their ciies; murdered others secretly, and condemned many publickly, vpon false pretences, of whom (neuerthelesse) hee himselfe would seem to haue great compassion. As for example, vnderstanding that one Iacius, a Noble-man, had taken Armes against him in the Island of Cyprus: hee picked a quarrel against two of his own trustiest Seruants and Fauourites, because they were great friends to the other, causing them to be accused of Treason, condemned, and executed. And when suite was made vnto him, after their deathes, that their Bodies (which were hanged vp) might be taken downe and buried:
hee seemed so much to pittie their case,
that hee shed abundance of teares, lamenting that the sentence of the Iudges, and the feruencie and authori-tie of Law, must needs ouer-weigh his his desire, and the affection that he bare them. And when they were touched with any sort of offension: not onely they themselves, but also all the whole kind and families: were condemned and due-ned, to the end, that none should be left of their race to reuenge it. The which (neuerthelesse) hee seemed rather so permit, and suffer to be done, then himselfe to ordaine it. For he caused his Iudges and Magistrats, to giue those sentences by publique Edict; with plausible preambles: shewing their care of the Emperours person, and referring it not to his commaundement; but to diuine inspiration, as a thing necessary for the seruice of God, and the good of the Common-wealth.

Heere now I appeale to any Machiuillian, whether Andronicus had not the Quintessence of Machiavels Pollicy, long before Machiuel was born? And whether he wanted eyther desire, wit, or wickednes, to conserue his state against the hatred of men, if it had beene possible to haue done it by wicked meanes?
Therefore, let vs see the end, which was such, that it may well serue for an ex-emplare warning, to all Machiuiilian Politicques.

While Andronicus gouerned in this manner, his cruelty and in-Iustice did purchase him more hatred, then the good that he did for the publique, could recompence. Which filled him every day with new feares, suspitions, and ielosies: especially, after that he was pressed with warres by William King of Sicily. Who hauing ouerthrowne some of his armies, and taken Thessalonica, and other townes of importance: marched towards Constantinople, wherewith the people began to take courage, and to discouer their hatred to Andronicus daily more and more. This did put him in such feare of Conspiracies, that hee consulted with Sorceres and Witches: especially with one Sethus a Magitian, who deined by a Balon of Water. And one day, when Andronicus desired to know the name of his Successor, Sethus shewed him in the water, the two Letters, I and S, whereby he & his Councillors coniectured, that it should be Iacius, who had rebelled against him in the Island of Cyprus, as before hath bin declared. Neuerthelesse, forasmuch as there was another Iacius

(first named Angelus) at the same time in the Court, a man of so quiet a Spirit, and so small courage, that Andronicus himselfe did no way suspect him: one of his speciall Councillours suggested to him; that it were good to commaund the said Iacius Angelus, to be taken and put into prison, to preuent the worst. Left (saith he) we may seeke the Piper abroad in the field, when perhaps we haue him in our bosome. And although Andronicus seemed (at the first) to contemne Iacius, as a man no way to be feared: yet at last it was resolued by him and his Councill, that he should be taken. And for that purpose, Stephanus, one of his chiefe Councillours and worst Instruments, went himselfe (with certain of his catch-poules) to the house of Iacius, who defending himselfe: killed Stephanus, & re-presently (with his sword bloody in his hand) through the Market place, to take Sanctuary in the chiefe Church: the towne, imploring (as he went) the aid of the people, declaring what hee had done, and why. The people flocked after him to the Church, pitying greatly his case, and commending his act, and at length, their courage encreasing with their multitude: they began to embolden one another: first to defend Iacius, and afterward to make him Emperour.
Which being propounded to the whol assembly, was accepted of them all:
thogh hee himselfe neither desired it, nor so much as dreamp of it, but thought himselfe well payed, if he could saue his life. This resolution being taken among them, they proclaimed him Emp. first in the Church, and after in the Streets: which was approued with generall consent of the Nobility, and all the people of the City, who came to yeild him obedience, and to assist him. Andronicus seeing himselfe forsaken of all his Subiects, durst neither trust to the strength of his Pallace, nor of his Guards, nor of his great Dog: but fled away in a Boat, and was shortly after taken, and brought backe laden with Iron Chaines. Hee was scorned and reuiled by the people;
his haire of his head and beard pulled away; his teeth stricken out; his right hand cut off; and (a few daies after) one of his eyes pulled out of his Head.
Then was hee vtpon a scabb'd Camel, of Westminster writeth, Exosum se prauit, &c. Made himselfe baselul to them, as well for the murder of his Nephew Arthur, as for his adulteries, tyranny and exactions, the continual seruitude wherein he kept England, and lastly, for the war which his desires procured. In respect whereof, Vis alenius meruit lamentatione deplorari: He deserved not to be lamented for a little of any man. Thus saith he, I forbear to alledge many other notable histories vnto the same purpose, because I do holde it needlesse in a matter so euident.

What then shall we say of Machiavell pestilent Precepts, for the preservation of a Prince already infected and poysoned with wickednesse? Can wee saie ought else, but that while he seeketh by one poyson to expel or remedy another, hee poysoneth him double, and killeth him our right? For, a wicked Prince, adding (as Machiavell aduise) wickednesse to wickednesse, and cruelty to cruelty, doth accumulate vpon himselfe, hated vpon hatred, which, as I haue declared, will breake out sooner or later to his ouerthrow.

Neither can the Machiavellian help his Masters cause, by saying, that such wicked Princes as haue perished by the hatred of men, haue committed some error or other, which they shoulde or might haue foreseene and auoided. For, the imbecility of mans wit and power is such that no man liuing, is able to foresee and prevent all the dangers and accidents, which may occur in the affairs of men, to the ouerthrow of their designments. As hath bin already proued by the examples of the absurd errors, as well of the wisest Senates and Councelles, as of most politticke men. Whereupon, it followeth, that the Prince which exposeth himselfe vnto the generall hatred of all men, incurrth many notable dangers.

For, euen as Townes of Warre, or Fortresses which haue no enemy neere, do, or may commit many errors (in matters appertaining to their defence) without danger; but being besieged by their enemies, are sometimes surprized by occasion of their least ouer sight or negligence. Euen so, it fareth with Princes, who so long as they are generally beloved, are little or nothing preiudiced by many errors which fall out in their Go-uernment, but being once (as I may terme it) besieged with the hatred of their Subiects and Neighbours, they are ruined sometimes with the least error, which they or their Magistrats do commit.

For, the hatred of men when it is generally, may bee compared to a swelling Sea, which enuironing a Ship on euery side, dooth otherwhiles ouerwhelme it with the impetuosity of Waues, and sometimes againe entereth in at euerie leake or rift, and so sinketh it. In like manner, the generall hatred of men, doth not only ouerthrow a Princes state, by potent and powerfull attempts: but also by taking aduantage of euery little error or accident, which may helpe to ruine it.

And therefore, forasmuch as the weakness of mans witte, and the varietie of times and occasions, do produce alwaies some dangerous accidents in the States of Princes, either by their errors or otherwise: whereupon their industrious & watchful enemies (especially at home) may take aduantage: it followeth, that no Prince generally hated, can liue long in securitie, bee he neuer so Diligent, vigilant, or suspicious of all Men, as Machiavell would wish to haue his prince to be.

Who could vse greater vigilancie or diligence for his owne conseruation; or be more suspicious, then Alexander the Tyrant of Phares? Vho though he loued his Wife Thebes verie dearly, yet neuer came he to her chamber, but he caused both her Coffers and her selfe to be searched, to see whether she had any weapon hid in her Garments. And yet neuerthelesse, hee was killed by her, in the end.

Could any man bee more proud for his safety, then was Claudius the Emperor? He would neuer goe to any banquet, but where his owne Guardes and Souldiers seued the Table; and neuer visited any sicke man, whose Chamber was not searched before by some of his Guardes, euen to the vetric beds and bedstraw, and yet he was poysoned at last by his owne Iaster, whom he neuer suspected. What should we say of Domitian the Emperor? Hee was so fearefull and suspicious of all men, that hee made the walles of his Galleries where he vsed to Euery little error of a Prince generally hated, is very dangerous.

Idem in Domitiano.

walke, to be set full of bright and cleare Stone, cald Phengites, wherein he might see whatsoeuer was done behinde him: and neuerthelesse, he was murdered by his owne Chamberlins.

Many such other examples might be alledged of Princes, who besides their great Guardes and Armies, for defence of their person, vsed all human diligence also, being ialous and suspicious of all men: and yet neuerthelesse, were overreached, sometimes by those whom they most feared; and sometimes by those whom they least suspected, or best trusted. Where to I adde (as I haue elsewhere noted, and cannot repeat too often) that sometimes the most proud and politticke Princes, are (through the imbecility of humane wit) ouerthrowne by their owne policies, that is to say, by the verie same means whereby they seek either to benefit themselves, or to hurt and destroy others, as hath sufficientlie appeared by many feuerall famous examples.

But what securitie can a wicked prince haue by Guardes, or other humane providence and diligence, seeing sometimes, that the wisest and best guarded, being aduertised of some imminent danger, either haue not the hope to vnderstand it, or the wit to beleue it? So it happened to Julius Caesar, who, as he was going to the Senat, receiued a memorial, wherein the Conspiratours against him were discovered, and being willing to read it presently, because it import ed him greatly: was so troubled with the presse and importunity of suiters, that he could not attend vnto it, and so was slain the same day in the Senate house. Archias also, a Tyrant in Thebes, being invited vnto a Supper, where his death was conspired, receiued a Letter from a Friende of his, containing an aduise of the Conspiracy. And being requested (by him that brought it) to read it out of hande, for that it concerned matters of great importance: made aunswere, that it was then no time to negotiate, and so laying it aside, was slain within two houres after.

In like manner, Charles the last Duke of Burgundie, who, as I haue declared before, was slain at Nancy, by the treason of Campobachio an Italian: was aduertised and fore-warned thereof, by Lewes the eleuenth, King of France. Neuerthelesse, perswading himselfe, that his aduertisement proceeded either of malice to Campobachio, or out of a desire to deprive him of his most necessary and trustie seruant, he would not beleue it, but loued him the better for it. Beside, one that was priuie to the conspiracy, being condemned to die for another matter, and determining to reueale it vnto the Duke, thereby to obtaine his pardon, made sute vnto him to speake with him, promising to aduertise him of some thing, which it imported him greatly to know, but the Duke would not bee treated so much as to heare him, for the man was executed, and the Duke slaine within a few daies after.

Now then, I would gladlie knowe of Machiavell and his followers, what securitie they can promise their Prince in wickednesse, seeing it is euident by the reasons and examples alledged, that the extreme hatred, which extreme wickednesse draweth vpon them, doth (notwithstanding all their power and policy) worke their ouerthrow by so many means as hath beene declared? As by open Rebellions, or the generall infection of a whole people, by enterprise of a few by the attempt of some one man, by the disloyalty and treachery of a false wife, fained Friends, fauourites, Subiects, & Guardes, by the defection of Soldiers, in fauour of some enemy foraigne or Domestical, by the negligence of Officers and Ministers, by the casualty of all humane affaires and designments; & lastly, by the errors whereto all humane wit and policy is subiect, which to Princes (that be generally beloved) are nothing so dangerous. All which meanes, the strongest, mightiest, and most polittique Tyrants haue bin ouerthrowne at one time or another.

So that the absurditie of Machiavell is most manifest in true reason of state, seeing that, in counselling Princes to wickednesse and tyranny, vpon confidence of humane force and policy, hee expotheth them to an assured danger, and doth not giue them any certaine or probable remedy, but rather heapeth danger vpon danger, by encrease of cruelty, and of all Tyrannical impiety. Insomuch, that it may be saide to Machiavell Prince, as Dionegen said to a Disciple of his, whom not to euery course and mechanicke conceite, capeable of nothing, but of such occasions as are fiteable to his owne condition.

I haue read of the great Riuer * Enripus, which ebbeth and floweth seuen times a day, and with such violence; that it carrieth Ships vpon it with full sayle, directly against the winde. Seuen times in an houre ebbeth and floweth rash Opinion, in the torrent of indiscreet and troublesome apprehension: carrying Criticke calumnie, and squint-eyed detraction, mainly against the winde of Wisedome and Iudgement; because their braines are no better ballast, nor their capacity of further reach or extendure.

And yet, if the saying of Hesiod be true; That nothing can bee more pleasing, then variety, which is the soules cheefest solace: Then (not fearing folly, but speaking to peerelesse Noble nature) giue mee leaue to tell you, that there can hardly bee any especiall subject imagined, but one Argument or other heere meeteth with it. From Sacred Diuinity (the most solide and supream of all other) through all other Artes and Sciences whatsoeuer, euen to any lowly, and the meanest (worthy) profession, here is some notable marke or Monument thereof (if it be either Ancient or Moderne) stored vp in this Treasure, for future Ages to delight in, and to receiue no meane benefite thereby.

Then (Honourable Lord and Ladie) all these blessings beeing Yours (as also my selfe, in endlesse dutie and seruice) when any subject of great, graue, and serious consideration (as of Nations, Monarchies, Kingdomes, and People, in their Originall, Rising or Declining, by Warres, Dissentions, Combuitions, or otherwise in the like occurrences) shall seeme troublesome or tedious to you: walke on but a little further, & then you may enter into a spacious Forrest, affording all choise of pleasing Game, either for Hawking, Hunting, Fowling, or any other Noble exercise beside.

When those Forrest pleasures shall faint you (as all delights dull, by too much continuance) an Orchard standes wide open to welcome you, richly abounding in the fairest Frutages: not to feed the Eie onely, but likewise to refresh the Heart, inuiting you to plucke where, and while you please, and to bestow how, and when you list: because they are all yours, and whosoever else shall taste of them, do enjoy such freedome but by your fauor.

There is one especiall recreation more (Gracious Madam) which remaineth soly to your selfe, and such as may enter by your admittance; in a goodly large Garden, abounding with all kind of the fairest Flowers, that open with the cheerfull mornings Sun, and shut againe at his sad departure, all sweet, and all soueraigne. And, because Ladies of elder times (as many haue had the like delight in our more Moderne daies) were singularly skilfull in Physick and Chirurgery: there is not a vacant place in the whole Garden, but it is fitly furnished shed euerie where; the verie common walkes (euen as if they were Bride-like strewed by hand) are couered with the choicest Simples, purest distillatorie Plants, and wholesome Herbes of euerie Vertue: for which, the Garden was purposely founded, and not for fruitlesse idle vanity.

And were you all alone, without companie, and by your selfe, yet can you not so continue there: For, you may meete with a faire Beuey of Queenes and Ladies, at diuers turnings as you walke, and euerie one will tell you the Historie of her life and fortune (rare examples of Vertue and Honor) as themselues can best, truly & plainly discourse vnto you. Some other also you shall see, sadly sitting vnder Eughe & Cipresse trees, with Garlands of those leaues wreathed about their heads, sighing out their diuers disasters: whom your Noble nature cannot choose but commiserate, as greewing to see a scratch in a cleare skin, and a bodie beautified by Nature, to be blemished by vnkinde Destiny.

From manie remote Kingdomes and Countries (where naturally they spake those seuerall Languages) are all these variable pleasures come hither, onely to kisse your Noble hands. It was no mean infelicitie for them, to find no fitter a Tutor, that might haue taught them to speake more eloquent English; which (indeede) also was my fault, seeing none else would tie themselues to so hard a Taske. But howsoeuer it may prooue, your rich iudgements, and all-sufficient ability in the Languages, as also my weakenesse, will (I hope) bury all defects in your fauor, & beare out from scandall my willing endeouour, that I may finish the other (yet remaining) eleuen Bookes behinde, to perfect so rich and rare a Treasure.

The Printer to the Reader.

SOME few yeares past, I intended the whole Worke of Pedro Mexia, with some other Authours on the like Arguments of variety. I then published nine Bookes, with intention to haue made them vp fifteen, for the first Volume: but being preuented by sicknesse, I finished but the first nine Bookes; and finding the good acceptance of them, I haue aduentured now on ten Bookes more, of the like Ancient and Moderne Times: sauing only some particular Heads but lightly touched, are now (by the same Authors) more at large illustrated. And may this finde equall fauour vnto the former (without any harsh censure, or vnkinde discouragement:) the other eleuen Bookes shall follow with all conuenient speede, to finish vp so faire a Treasury.

THE TREASVRIE of Ancient and Moderne TIMES.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

Of the ancient Countrey of Gaule, now called France; what Lawes, Customs, Ceremonies, and other manners were used among the people of that Nation in their first Originall; and how (since then) they have continued.

An Introduction to the whole Discourse.

In ancient times, the Countrey of Gaule was enclosed within the limits of the Rhine, of the Alpes, of the Mediterranean sea, of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Ocean sea. But after that the Gauls had passed the Alpes; all the Countrey which was from the Mountains, so farre as the river *Rhodanus, along by the coast of the Apennines, and so vp into the high Sea (which at this day is called the Gulfe of Venice) took the name of Gaule: as Galatia did the like, after that wee had subdued some people of Asia. That Gaule then which is in Europe, being halfe parted by the Alpes, is diuided into two parts; the one on the hither side of the Mountaines, and the other beyond. That which is on the further side, yet concerning vs, was called by the Romanes *Togata: as Romane, in regard of the habit of the Romanes, being commonly called a Gowne, and which they then did vsually weare. That on the hither side, was (by themselves) named properly braccata (by a certain fashion of garment then worne by them, termed Breeches) and partly Comata*, in regard that the haire on their heads was verie bushy. Braccata in the time of Iulius Caesar, had his extendure from the Alpes, so farre as Rosne or Rhodanus* bending towards the Pyrenean Mountaines, where were comprized the Volce, Armoricanes, Rhutheni or Rhytteni, and Heluetians, as it is to be seen in the seventh Book of Caesars Commentaries. This country was one while called Prouence, and then againe Narbonne, after the name of Narbona, then the chiefe and capitall Citie of the country. In Comata dwelt the Aquitans, which are they of Guienne, euen from the Pyrenean Mountaines, so farre as the river Garona*: on the hitherside whereof are the Celts, inhabiting so farre as the Rivers of Sena and Marna. All the rest of the country extending toward the North, is possessed by the Belgians.

Now the search would bee very great, and hard to be performed by any man, that would would (with a certaine history of all the times) set downe the fashions, manners, and customes which the ancient Gaules had held and obserued, vntill the daies of Iulius Caesar. and their nouell qualities from those dayes to ours. But such as can content themselves with that diligence, which generally may be deliuered by the proofes of good and sufficient Authours, worthy of faith and sound credit, perhaps shall finde their expectation well fitted, both with honest pleasure and profite in their reading. And with this intention am I determined to make (summarily) a collection out of many writers, that haue carefully employed their paines, concerning the manners and behaviour of the Gaules, according as matters might be remembered, in such diuersity of distant places. And first, we will select out the most Ancient: after ward (if wee can bring our purpose to full effect, and as our endeuor hath nothing be wanting) we will as diligently seeke for the nouell customes.

Caesar hath comprehended a certaine forme and semblance of Gaul in her ancient dayes; especially in the first booke of his Commentaries, of the warre in Gaul; albeit he hath sowne many other things throughout his Bookes: which I hauing collected heere and there, and from infinite places in other Authors, so that the whole may serue to encrease and fully illustrate the course of our purpose; we may the more reasonably accomplish that which shall serue to make knowne our full aime and scope. Neuerthelesse, I am not to learne, that the Greekes which haue followed Caesar, were it that they vnderstood not the latine tongue, or were it through carelesse and negligence; haue declared in many places, that they scarcely vnderstoode the matters contained in his Commentaries. Wherefore we will first of all imitate Caesar, as the most great and singular Author and master of our history: and then pursue others, according as they haue borrowed any thing of him, or as they serue to make the whole subiect vnderstood.

But in regard that the principall parts of Great Britaine, as also of Germany, haue bene seized by the Gaules, as shal appear in due time and place; and forasmuch as there hath bene great resemblance of the Brittaines and Germanes with the Gaules, as will bee declared by that which Caesar hath written; I imagined with my selfe, that it would very conveniently suite with our purpose, to compare such fashions as carried any coherence in these Nations. Considering that Caesar thought it fit, to compare the customes of Gaul, with them of Germany. And Strabo, perceiving the Germanes to be called so by the Romanes, as true brethren to the Gaules, by resemblance of their manner of liuing, when he wrote the fashions and customes of the ancient Gaules, he reprobued them, and began with the Germanes. But although that Tacitus hath sayd, That they were named Germanes, by an appellation proper to their Nation, and such as they pleased to stile themselves; yet notwithstanding, howsoever at first they received that name, there may be discerned in the great Germanity, or (for our better vnderstanding) a Fraternity, both in behaviour and customes, answerable one vnto another.

For our better beginning then, we will conclude on certaine kinds of manners, to the end, that each thing may be placed as may be most conuenient. Plato sayeth, There are three principal parts in the body of Man, wherein are lodged the three principall powets of the soule; Concupiscence in the Liuer, Anger in the Heart, and Reason in the Head, as in a Citadell. In like manner, there are three severall kinds of vertues that do command & gouerne them: Sobriety or Temperance, to ouerway Concupiscence in the Liuer; Courage, against Anger in the Heart; and Wisdom, in thinking and iudging with Reason. The common consent & agreement of all which, is the faithfull dutie of each one, euen as it were with diuers voices, & worthily may be called Iustice. Caesar and Diodorus, Titus Livius, Strabo, and others, who are as interpreters of Caesar, do declare many things of the Gaules; as if I would haue set down at large in my Discourse, according as they are written by them: I should rehearse one and the same matter too many times. Wherefore I will rather imitate their intention in each place, then bee constrained to alledge their multiplicity of words.

CHAP. I.

Of the Temperance in eating and drinking used among the Gaules: as also of their Marriages and single condition of life.

Enter then on the behalfe of Temperance, wee might speake of their abstinence in eating and drinking, resort to women, their manner of speech, their modesty in Garments and lodging; their sports, delights and alsistance, which they afford to one another in such things as they haue. Concerning the eating and drinking of the ancient Gaules, they liued for the most part (according to Diodorus and Strabo) on white meats, and diuers kinds of flesh, & principally on Porke fresh and salted. They vfed to haue standing by their fires, pottes full of boyled flesh, and spits well laden with roasted flesh; the better part whereof they would giue to men of worth, to doe them honor: as Homer writes, That the Grecian Captains did to Alex, when he had won the victory against Hector body to body. Caesar granteth the selfe-same manner of life to the Brittaines, and to the Germanes. The Brittaines (saith he) which dwell furthest vp into the Countrey, the most part of them do not sowe any corne but liue onely vpon milke and flesh. Neuerthelesse, they hold in detestation (by what religious opinion I know not) to taste of an Hare, of an Hen or Chicken, and of a Goose. Hee saith also the very same in his seuenth booke, speaking of the Germanes; That they do not addit them selves to any kinde of labour, and that their very greatest nourishment is vpon white meats, cheefe and flesh. But Tacitus hath written much more amply concerning the manner of life amongst the Germans. Each mother (saith hee) doth nurse her child with her owne breast, and neuer trusteth it in the hands of their seruants, or other Nurses. Thou canst not know the Master from the Varler, by any kinde of more delicate feeding. They liue nakedly and slovenly, euen amongst their Heads or droues of Cattle; & lying vpon the ground, vntill such time as age doth set apart such as are Masters, & vertue doeth auouch and make them to bee knowne. Their viands are simply dressed or prepared, being of wilde fruits; sometimes of fresh Venison, or curded milke, without any dainty cooking or dressing. So much for their manner of eating.

As for their drinke, that amongst the Gaules, and termed Zythum: This (saith Diodorus) was made of barley and water, hauing passed thorow diuers honycombs. Tacitus writeth almost the very same of the Germanes. They make a drinke (saith he) of water, mingled both with barley & wheate, disguised into some resemblance of wine. They which dwell on the Sea-coasts, do buy wine. The most part of the Gaules (as Diodorus & Strabo doe both write) vfed to sitte on the ground and to eate their food, sitting on the skinnes of Dogges or of wolues: being serued with earthen vessels, which were strong and massiue, and wrought about with branches of flowers; and they were alwayes attended and serued by their young children. In like manner Tacitus recordeth, That the Germans so soone as they were awake and risen (which they vfed not to doe till it was day) they laued and washed themselves with warme water, because winter continued in their region for the most part of the yeare; and at coming forth of the bathe, they went vnto their fooode, each one hauing his table and seat alone by himselfe. Thus then was their ancient and rude simplicity, which caused the Germanes to be so big membered and corpulent, whereat Tacitus seemeth to maruell greatly. And thence likewise ensued the selfe-same greatnesse of bodye which was among the Gaules, vho for their huge corpulency, and regarding onely their owne bignesse of stature, held the smaller constitution of the Romanes in contempt, as may be seene in the 2. booke of the wars in Gaul.

But Plato reprehendeth the Gaules for their intemperance and drunkenness with wine; and Diodorus writeth the very same. They affected Wine so excessively, that when the Merchants brought it to them, they dranke it wholly new as it was; and then becoming drunk, by hauing taken ouermuch, they lay downe to sleepe, or behaued themselves like mad men. And this was the reason that many of the Italian Merchants for the gaine which they got both by sea and land; brought wine in great plenty thither, and for a small vessel of wine, receyved (in exchange) four times the value. And the same Authour not only blameth their drunkenness, but also the quarrels which accompanied this excess. They obserued (saith he) as a custome, at their feeding, for the least debate of words, to rise presently from the Table, and defie one another to the combat, hazarding their lives without any discretion. Thus you see how the Greeks haue reprooued the ancient Gaules; and Tacitus calleth the Germanes their Brethren in the same vice, accusing them equally to be drunkards and quarrellers. They vied not (saith he) any such temperance against thirst. For they held it no dishonor, to spend the whole day and night in drinking, so they might be suffered to drinke their fill, furnishing them with so much as they would haue: you should find them no lesse easie to be conquered by their vices, then by armes. The quarrels which rose very often among them, as among people subiect to Wine, was no sooner mingled with injuries of the mouth; but (for the most part) did end with blows by the sword, to the expence of their blood, yea of their liues. Such was the blame which the Germanes receiued by making no more account of so bad a custome; even as if this vice had bene no vice among them, or did any way shame them.

But the Gaules vied themselves in better manner: for by a publicke ordinance this vile behaviour (in particular persons) was verie greuously and rigorously punished. Let vs heare then from Caesar the cause of the magnanimity of the Gaules; which was, by knowing how to keep themselves from this disorderly kinde of life. The most magnanimous of all (saith he in his first Booke, speaking of the Belgians, Celts, and Aquitanes) are the Belgians, because they are furthest off in the countrey, which is carefully husbanded, and strangers doe but seldome traffike with them, to bring them that which serueth to no other end but to effeminate their courages.

In the same book speaking of the Nervians, as of the most courageous of all the Belgians, he saith; Caesar making enquiry of them, what might be their naturall disposition and manners, hee found, That Merchants did not traffike with them, & that they would not suffer (by any means) that wine should be brought among them, or any thing that serued for delicacy. For they held (as an infallible opinion) that such things were the cause of abasing their courage, & that their naturae virtue would thereby be much weakened. Whereby we may perceiue, that the intemperance of some particular men, was condemned by a generall and publicke decree; and that sobriety & temperate carriage was greatly respected and honored in those parts. Strabo sayeth, That by the perswasion of Cornus, a graue and wise man, the Getes rent and pluckt vp all the Vines in their country, yet vied some wine in the time of their childrens nursing. But our Ancestors did much better, because they would neuer permit or suffer, that any Vine should be planted among them, or wine to be brought them from any other place. Wherefore Diodorus had good reason to say, that in his time there came no vine at all into Gaulle Comata.

Caesar in his fourth Booke, maketh the Suenets, a people of Germany, equall in temperance to the Nervians that were in Gaulle. For they would not suffer that any wine should be brought into their country, because they were perswaded, that it made men lazie, effeminate, and vnapt to endure any labor. Thus we may obserue then, what was their sobriety in eating and drinkeing, wherein their greater part of vertue is commended; for abstinence from lewd and wanton women. And albeit that Diodorus, Strabo, Bardejaner, according as Eusebius reporteth; being all of them Grecian Authors, haue reproued this vice as frequent and common among the Gaules, and which is as innated (if credite may bee giuen to Aristotle) in warlike actions; whereby the fable was faigned, of conioyning Venus with God Mars: yet notwithstanding, Caesar speaketh nothing thereof, but giueth great commendation to the Germanes for their temperance, contrary to them that haue written otherwise of them.

spect and praise. For they held it as a most villanous thing to haue knowledge of a woman, before the age of twenty yeeres. In all which time they did not hide themselves, but bathed daily together in the rivers. And this is the reason rendered by Herodotus, speaking of the nature of children, wherefore haire commeth much sooner to some then it doth to others: because the vse of Venus maketh the flesh more loose and flabby, and openeth the skinn, which affordeth the easier passage to the haire; contrarywise, such Children as are gelded, haue neuer any haire at all. Tacitus hath not omitted the selfsame attribution of praise to the Germanes. Young men are long time before they haue any knowledge of women: and that is an especial reason why they lose no part of their youthfull strength, and therefore make no hast at all of parting with their virgin condition. Young Laddes, and such (of like stature) as are gelded, do make triall of their agility together, and their children do (commonly) partake of their Parents strength.

Marriages do appertaine to the rule of the same vertue: but Caesar hath not written carefully how the Gaules obserued it. The husband (saith hee) laide downe the valew of so much goodes, as his wife brought with her, and a iust account being taken thereof, the whole stocke was put together. The party that furnished, enioyed the others portion, with the reuenues of all that had past. The husbands are masters and commanders of their wives liues, and also of their Childrens. When any Father of a Family (of note) dyeth, the next of the kindred do assemble together, and if any suspicion be conceived concerning his death: the Wife is committed to tortures, as they doe their slaues, and if the proue to be conuincied, after they haue tormented her with fire, and all other kinds of paines, they put her to death. This law may seeme hard, that giueth the husband such like power over the wife and children, as he hath over his slaues. For, according as the Philosophers haue taught vs: the father of the family giueth command to his wife & children, as vnto free persons. Yet this is not all as one kinde of command: for hee giueth command to his wife as to one of the same Commonwealt, & to his children as a King. The Law truly may appeare to be hard, yet it is Roman, even the like as immulus made, Ordaining; That the sonne should bee in his fathers power all his life; and that the father may chastise, beate, put him to any busines in the field, sell, or kill him. The same King also appointed, That a man might punish his wife, if he had drunke any wine. Caesar speaketh all this in his sixth booke: and in his fifth hee declareth diuers other fashions of behaviour in marriages, speaking of the Brittaines.

Ten or twelue together (saith hee) do hold their wives in common, and principally brethren with their brethren, and fathers with their daughters. And (such as are born of them, are avouched for children of them that haue espoused their mothers, being yet maids. So much also he relateth of the English. But Tacitus writing of the Germanes, giueth them most noble commendation in this point. The wife (saith hee) neuer offereth anie dowry to the husband, but the husband to the wife. The parents, cousins, & kindred are present thereat, and allow of all presents passing between them. And they are no presents deuised for delicacie or delight of women, nor to repair a new intended marriage: but they are a gift of Oxen yoked, a horie bridled and furnished, & a Buckler or Target, with a sword and Iaueline. For these presents the husband taketh his wife; who likewise (on her owne behalfe) presenteth him with some weapons of warre. This is the great marriage bond, these are accounted sacred mysteries, & these are the coningall gods that they hold in reuerence.

And to the end that the wife may not thinke her selfe exempted from vertuous desseignes, nor the hazards of warre: from the very beginning of her marriage she is continually aduertised, that she is thus receiued and taken to be her husbands companion in all paines and dangers, and that (be it either peace or warre) she must of necessity runne the same fortune. And these are plainly signified vnto her by the coupled Oxen, the furnished horie, and warlike weapons. She receiueeth what she is to bestow on her children after that she hath worthily and holily nursed them vp: & such as are of most forward disposition the Father hath care of, that they may re-

their husbands for adultery

There are very few adulteries committed in so great a Nation; for the punishment thereof is very speedy, and the husband may lawfully do it. After hee hath thauen and stript her naked, the husband bringeth her forth of his house, in the presence of all his and her neereſt Kindred, and beateh her with a bastinado thorow all the fireetes; for there is no allowance of any pardon after that a wife hath blemished her honor; and neither her beauty, youth, or riches can afterward winne her another husband.

Vices ſerue not there to be laughed and iested at: & one may well ſay, That (there) is ſuch a world, as neither permiteth the doing or induring of any diſſoluteneſſe. Thoſe Commonweales are the beſt ordered, wherein is ſuch permiſſion, that the Maides onely finde themſelves husbands, and marriage conſiſteth in mutual accord (for a little while) in good hope, and that the Bride may haue her hearts deſire. For in this caſe ſhe taketh her husband as one & the ſelfſame body, and one life is allowed by them both: becauſe they can haue no contrary thoughts, neither they deſires any way wandering, but their affections doe fo ſympathize, as not in either to husband or wife, but to the ſanctity of marriage. It is helde as a very great offence, to procure the death of any of their children, or of their kindred: And there good cuſtomes doe beare more away, then good Lawes and Ordinances doe elſewhere. Hitherto haue we continued the writing of Tacitus, concerning the German marriages.

3, And Cæſar ſpeaketh thereof in his ſeauenth Booke, and is alſo to be proued by diuers examples in his other books. Such is that whereof hee ſpeaketh in his firſt booke, of Drucimus the Heluetian, who highly extolled and vaunted the vertue of the Heluetians, and reproached the diſcomfiture of the Romanes, admoniſhing Cæſar by menaces to beware of any further attempting; for feare, leaſt the place where the Romanes miſcarried, by a further loſſe of their people, after the ſpoiling of their whole Army, ſhould take name thereby, and ſo remaine as a memorie of their diſgrace.

thicke and hard, that little difference appeared betwene theirs and the haire of a horſe. Tacitus ſpeaketh (wel-neere) the ſame of the Sueues, a people of Germany. But the eſpecial note of that Nation is, that they turne their haire croſſe or ouerthwart, and then binde or truſſe it vp in a knot. In this manner are the Sueues known among all the other Germanes, and free-men of the Countrey from ſlaues. Some of the Sueues doe wear their hayre long, and briſtling backward with a bending downe, and ſo they go till they bee hoary or white; and then (ofentimes) they binde it together on the crowne of the head. The Lords are no more reſpectiue of their own perſons, and yet without any proud or bad intention: For it is not done in regard that they affect or coe to be affected; but they doe onely ſo decke themſelves, to appeare the more fierce and terrible vnto their enemies, when occaſion calleth them forth to warre.

Diodorus proceedeth on in this manner, concerning the behauiour of the Gaules. Some of them (ſaith he) doe vie to ſhau their beards, but others doe wear them of ſome length. The Gentlemen doe cutte ſhort the haire on their cheekes, & ſuffer their beards to grow to ſuch length, as it will couer all their bodie. They wear alſo a kinde of garment, which is all hairie, to ſeeme the more dreadfull and terrible, conſiſting of diuers colours, and teamed by them Braccates. They haue long ſkirred Iackets or Caſſocks, rewed or ſtreaked, beeing of the very coureſt Cloath, which they vie for winter, and the moſt ſimple or ſlenderſt for ſummer. Diodorus ſpeaketh thus of the Braccates, as the reaſon whereby the Romanes called that part of Gaule Braccata, and by which garment the ſame Authour affirmeth, That the Gaules were more terrible to beholde.

Braccata.

Strabo in lib. 4.

Strabo likewiſe writeth in his fourth book concerning their haire, their Caſſocks, their rude and hairy garments, their long high breeches, & their ſhort open cloaks which hardly couered halfe theyr Buttocks. All theſe Authors doe agree together, as touching the haire of the Gaules and Germanes, and to be of a redde colour, according as Titus Linius, and Diodorus haue writen. Cæſar ſpeaking of the of ancient Britany, writeth thus. They do all paint chemſelves with an herb, called by them Gallum, which cauſeth a blewith or azure colour: and this made them very dreadful to looke on, when they went to any fight. Moreouer, they wore their lockes of haire very long; ſhauing off all their other haire except that on the head, and on the upper lip.

Diodorus purſuing his purpoſe concerning the Gaules, figureth them forth (as it were with golde) in this manner. The whole Countrey of Gaule is without the metall called Siluer: but nature hath giuen it gold, without any labor or cunning endeavour. For, in regard that the moſt part of the riuers haue their courſes verie troubleſome, vncleane in paſſing, & wheeling or circling in wide compaſſe: the waters which deſcend from the hills and mountains, by diſperſing themſelves abroad in the valleyes, do ſcatter a fand on the fields, which is mingled with golde.

Afterwardes, kneading or tweaking the clods together, wherein they diſcerne the golde to ſhine, and permitting them to become hard: they then breake them in peeces, and when they haue waſhed it in water, and the earth is quite taken away, they hule the reſt into a furnace, and ſo melt it in that manner. When they haue thus moulten and drawne out the golde pure and cleane, the women and men do adorne themſelves therewith: for they wear it in rings on their fingers, and in braceletes about their armes, and in Carcanets on their breſts, & in chaines about their neckes, and about their middles as golden girdles. Polybius alſo maketh mention in his ſecond booke, of their Chaines and Bracelets. And Strabo in his 4. booke ſpeaketh of their Mines of gold, whereof the cheefeſt are in the Countrey of Tarbellus; and hee attributeth this Ornament only vnto ſuch as were in honor and dignity.

But Cæſar and Tacitus do ſpeake of another manner of want or poeury (of this magnificence) amongſt the Germanes. They vie (ſaith Cæſar) ſkinnes in their garments, and ſhort cloakes made of ſieered ſkins, hauing the greater part of theſe body naked. But Tacitus ſpeaketh more amply, concerning the whole manner of the Germanes, writing thus. I doubt whether the gods were favourable to them or quite contrary, becauſe they denied them the metalls of gold and silver. Notwithstanding, I will not set it downe assuredly, but that there may be some vein of gold or silver in Germany: yet who (at any time) hath made search for it? They have no such affection thereto, as to apply it to any service. Some vessels of silver have beene found amongst them (which haue bene giuen to their Ambassadors, or to their Princes) and yet to be held in no more esteeme or reckoning, then those that are made of earth. Neuertheles, they that dwell much neerer to vs, in regard that they haue trafficked with our people: do make more esteeme of gold and silver, allowing and commending some peeces of our monies. They that liue further off in the Countrey, doe deale more simply, and (according to the most ancient manner) make their trafficke by exchange. They receive the old money, and such as they haue had longest knowledge of, as the Serrati and Bigati. They loue the coin of silver better then that of gold, not that they beare therto any particular affection, but because the silver money is easiest for them in buying things common, and of smallest price. The vidual habit or garment to them all, is a long skirted lacket or Cassocke which they fasten together with a buckle, but (for want thereof) with a great pin. The rest of the body is not couered with any thing, and they sit the most part of the day vpon the hearth, somewhat neere to the fire. Such as are of greatest wealth, doe differ from the other in their garments, which are not so ample or large as those of the Sarmates, or of the Parthians: but iustly fitted to the body, and such as maketh apparant shew of every member. They wear the skins of wilde beasts, and such as dwell neere to the rivers, are most curious of their habit: but they of more remote abiding, vse ne g'eat curiosity, as being least careful what they weare, because they liue so far from strangers. When they haue made ch'ise of their beasts skinnies, they do the like of fishes, taking such as are the greatest, or as the Ocean and most vnkowne Seas doe yeld, and fullest of spots, and so they sewe them together. The Women are no otherwise habited then the men: but that the women are oftner couered with a garment of linnen, inter-woven with a scarlet colour. They care for no fleeces on the height of their armes, but are naked downe from the very shoulders and part of the breast (neerest adioyning) as is nakedly discovered. Thus you see the gayest brauery of the Gaules, & how simple the Germans are in their garments: it remaineth now that we say somewhat of their houses and dwellings.

CHAP. III.

Of the houses and dwellings of the Gaules; their Townes and villages, and of what manner they were.

THe habitations of the Gauls (according as Strabo sayth) are wide and spacious, made of earth and planchers of wood, & couered with strong reeds arched on the top together in form of a vault: for so Cæsar in the first booke of the Gaules warres saith, That the Lodgings of Q. Cicero in the fields, were couered with straw and reeds, according to the manner of the Gaules. And in his first booke he sheweth, that the more part of the Manner-houses appertaining to the gentlemen Gaules, were in the woods, or on the rivers. Speaking of the house of Ambiorix, which was altogether engirt with woods, As were wel-neere (sayth he) the houses of the Gauls are, who to foun the beste, do dwell in woods, and neere to rivers. Cæsar deliuereth plainly, that the Aquitaines, Celts and first Belgians, had their Cities and Townes enclosed both with walles and ditches: but it may be doubted whether the like prouision was vsed among the Gaules further off, and such as were neerer to the North; as the Morini, Adoniques, Menapians, and Eboracæ.

Cæsar declareth, That the most part of these Belgians, are defended of the Germanes, and saith, that the Germanes had not their Townes and Villages made after our manner: as may be obserued by that which Tacitus hath written according to the custome which they had in his time. It is sufficiently known (saith he) that the German people dwell not in any Townes;

Townes, neither that they could endure to haue their houses neere vnto one another. They dwell distant or apart, scatteringly, where either rivers, fields, or woods do best content them. Their Villages are not after our fashion: for their houses do not touch or ioyne neere each other. Euery one leaueth a great wide distance or compass about his dwelling; either to avoid the disastrous fortunes of fire, or else because they know not how to build better. They vse neither Morter nor Tiles: but the matter which doeth them seruice, is very rude, and is not prepared either for beauty or pleasure. They plaster some places much more respectiue, with a kinde of earth so cleane & shining, as it seemeth to contend with painting, & portraictures of colours. They were wont to make causes vnder the ground, and couered them with thicke clods of dung, to withdraw themselves thither in the winter time, and therein also to hide their Corne, because in such places, the colde weather had not so great power, & when the enemy came, hee could make pillage of nothing, but what hee found readily discovered. As for that which was thus hidden or buried, Theeues not knowing thereof, would bestow the lesse paines & search, in further enquiry after it. Cæsar speaketh (almost) as much of the Britains. They teamed it a Towne (saith he) when they had enclosed some tuffie wood with ditches and pales; whereinto they were wont to retire themselves, to shunne the courses of their enemies. And whereas Cæsar speaketh sometimes of certaine Townes of the Suenes: in mine opinion, hee is so to be vnderstood.

Returne we now to the townes of the Belgians, which are vp higher in the country, and heere my question is: Whether they had any such Townes as the Britains or no? We will first of all speake of the Morini, who (according as Cæsar writeth) beganne to make war, but in a quite contrary manner then the other Gaules. For they haue heard, that the very greatest Nations which had hazarded battel, were quite defeated and conquered: withdrew themselves & their goods into the strongest places, which were great and long forrests, encompassed with fenny or marshy grounds. Cæsar being come vnto the entrance of some such forrest, and hauing concluded there to fortifie his campe: as the Germanes were feriously employed about their busines, the enemy (of whom they had no doubt at all) sallied forth vpon them vnprovided, at most places of the wood, and charged the Romanes very sharply. Heereupon, they betooke them to their Armes, and repulled them backe into the wood, and hauing slaine a great number of them, pursued them thorough many weasie places, yet with very little losse of their people. The next day following, Cæsar determined to fell down the Forrest, and suspending least some harme might be done by the Flankers to Soldiers vnarmed: he cauled all the trees which were hewing downe, to be made as rampiers against the enemy, as d to serue as defences on either side.

Hauing made a great spacious country (in fewe dayes) by incredible diligence, after that the Romanes had made themselves Maisters of the cattle & baggage which was in the reuerd; they withdrew themselves into the thickest of the Forrest. Cæsar speaketh this of the wood of the Morini, which serued them as a Towne or Village. And the yeare after, in regard of the drought which had dried vp all the Marishes (as is to be seene in his fourth booke) they hauing no more refuges to flye vnto as they had the yeare before, were (almost all of them) lubdued by Labienus. In these two warres, hee maketh no mention of any other Townes, then of woods and marishes.

The like is affirmed of the Menapians, in those Countries where the Romaine Legions were brought, vnder the conduct of Fabius and Cotta, as it is set downe also in his fourth booke. They made spoyle in the fields, destroyed the Corne, set the houses on fire; and all this happened, because the Menapians had hid themselves in the thickest Forrests. Afterward Cæsar himselfe came to them with five legions. But they (as Cæsar saith) not hauing gathered any forces together, trusting only in the security of the place, withdrew themselves into the woods and marishes, and carried thither their goods also. Cæsar hauing diuided his powers with C. Fabius, who was his Lieutenant, and M. Crassus Treasurer of his wars, and hauing also sodainly provided bridges for passage, gaue them assault three severall wayes; ways, and burning their houses and villages, made himselfe Master of a great number of men and cattle. The Menapians seeing themselves in this distresse; were constrained to send Ambassadors, humbly to entreat peace. In this place also there is no name of any village, or pregnant appearance that there were any, but such as wee have already spoken of.

By due obseruation of this discourse, perhaps the villages of the Nervi will appear to be even the like. The Nervi (this speaketh Caesar in his second booke) from all antiquity, not having any power of horsemen (for even to this day they do not addit their mindes thereto, but all the strength which they have, consisteth only in footmen) to the end they may impeach and withstand the horsemen of their neighbours, if they make any inroad upon them, to rob and spoile them, cutting downe young trees that had shot forth strong branches, they twined them together, and interweaving briars and thorns among them, they wrought them so artificially, that these hedges or fences served them as a wall; wherein not only a man could not enter, but also he was vnable to see or discern any thing.

In the same warre of the Nervi, the women, & such as (in regard of their age) were not seruicible for bearing armes, had neuer any Village or Town for their safety, which was engirt with wals; but in such a place where there was no coming or entrance for an Army, because of the marsh grounds, which were the only hinderance.

Now, in this first warre against the Nervi, wee may plainly perceiue that they had not any Towne enclosed with wals; and we may well credit it by that which is in the sixth booke. For Caesar having assembled foure Legions with all possible diligence, entred (vnuawares) into the Country of the Nervi, and before they could either draw their strength together, or tell how to saue themselves; after hee had surprized a great number of men, and herds of Cattle, and dispersed the booty to his Soldiers, he layde waste their fields, and compelled them to yeeld and deliuer him hostages. This passage likewise of the Nervi, yeeldeth great coniecture, that they had no other towns or villages in those times, but like them of the Britaines.

It may appeare also, that the Adunatikes (by that which Caesar writeth in his second booke) haue had the like townes. Having forsaken (saith he) all their townes and Castles, they brought all their goods into a village, which was wonderfully strong by naturall situation. For, having (on all sides about it) huge rocks & down-falles of exceeding height, it had but one onely comming to it, which was hanging or descending downward, yet in a sweete and gentle manner, being in breadth no more then two hundred foote. This way or passage they had fortified with a double wall, of very great height, & the same was strengthened in many places with mighty huge stones, and sharpe-pointed beames or pyles. Heere Caesar describeth nothing but a wall onely, and on one side of the Towne. And the like may be easily proued in the Nation of the Eburones: who are also called Germanes by Caesar in his second booke. These men, under the conduct of King Ambiorix, had ouercome Sabinus and Cotta, with fifteene Companies, neere to Vatuna, as it is set downe in the fifth booke. Caesar who had neuer receiued a greater iniurie, determined to be reuenged for this losse, and vtrly to abolish and ruinate the nation of the Eburones, as we may reade in the 6. booke. Therefore he sent Basillus on before with the whole band of horse, and leauing a legion for guard of the baggage, he diuided the other nine into three Regiments, to ouerrunne and make spoile of the whole Country. He caused Labiennus to march with three Legions along by the Ocean, toward that part which ioyneth vnto the Menapians. Hee sent Trebonius with the same number of Legions, to sacke that Country which was neere to the Adunatikes. Himselfe, accompanied with the three other Legions, stayed to go toward the river Sabis, and the utmost parts of the Forrest of Ardene.

The Eburones not having any certaine Army, neither garrison, or any Towne wherein they might defend themselves by Armes, and the whole popularity being scattered euery where abroad, retired themselves to such places as were obscure valleys, or wilde and sauage, or where the moorish Fennes made a troublefome accesse to them; these pretended them with some imaginary hope, that thus they might defend and saue themselves. Caesar in this fiery heate of reuenge, perceiving the great danger which might ensue, by hauing thus separated his Legionaries, called all the neere-ighbouring Cities (in hope of booty) to come and make pillage of the Eburones, to the end, that the race and name of them might bee vtrly confounded. And because he could not (as yet) appease his thirsting soule by such spoile as he had made, which indeed was very great, he put himselfe once more on his way, to giue further vexation to his enemies, assembling infinite troopes of people from all the Townes & neere adjoining parts, and so sent them outward by sundry ways. They burned all the villages, and euery house that they could finde standing. The selfesame desire of vengeance (as is to be seen in his eighth booke) enflamed him the third time, and the like waste he made: neuertheless, he speaketh not of any rampier, or of any ditch belonging vnto Towne or Village. Whereby may iustly bee obserued, that the Belgians as they were defended of the Germanes, so in like manner they had the same order of dwelling.

The Bellouaci, or Bellouacians in like fort. albeit that they were the very principal of the Belgians, as wel in regard of their vertue and authority, as for the great number of men amongst them: yet it appeareth, that they were no strangers to this custome: for in the first warre, he speaketh not but of one Towne or Village, named Bratupunctum*; in the other warres, hee maketh no mention of any one. This may seeme to be spoken sufficiently enough, concerning the habitations of the Belgians.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Humanity, Liberty, Hospitality, & Courtisie of the Gaules to strangers, and care for benefiting each other equally.

Of sports and recreations amongst the Germanes.

I finde nothing written in Caesar, of the playes, sports, & pastimes of the youth among the Gaules. As for the Germanes, Tacitus writeth thus. They had but one onely kind of spectacle in euery assembly: young boies that conceiued delight in this sport, would run or leape forth violently (and stark naked) before swords & lances directed against them. This exercise grew to be an art, and Art made it verie gracefull in them: yet what they did, was not for any lucre, gaine, or wages; but the onely recompence of this their audacious gallantry, was, to bee pleasing in their eyes that beheld them. They would play (being in very stayed and settled judgement) at such desperate games of hazard and dangerous aduerture, as would make a man blush to stand and looke on, and they performed their intentions in such earnest manner, as if they were at strife for some matter of great moment: yea, such was their affection to the gaine or losse, as after they had nothing els to contend for: they would strive about the very last hazard, laying downe their own liberty and persons in pawne. Whosoever lost himselfe, would yeelde to the others seruitude, with his owne kinde consent: And albeit hee were neuer so young and strong, yet (in regard of his losse) he would suffer himselfe to be bound and sold. For such was their wilfull obstinacy, that they would lay down faith vpon the very least occasion.

But whosoever would take note of the great humanity, liberality, and courtisie, as well in the Gaules as in the Germanes, let him read what followeth. They would inuite strangers (this speaketh Diodorus of the Gaules) to feast with them. And after nature was sufficed, they would enquire what people they were, and what occasion drew them thither. But Caesar and Tacitus giue this commendation vnto the Germanes, by writing much more amply. They make it a matter of great Conscience (saith Caesar) to offer any outrage to strangers, who, be it for what cause soeuer they come amongst them, yet they will defend them from all iniuries, and thinke them to be sacred people, each one allowing them part of his house, & whatsoever he had to liue on. Tacitus writeth in this manner. There is not any Nation more addicted to make good chear together, and feast strangers. They doe make great conscience in denying house-room to any commager; for each man will Feast

As concerning the rites of hospitality, they make no difference between him that is knowne, and another that is vnkowne. At his departure, if he desireth any thing, it is their order and custome to grant it : as they will doe the like when it falleth to their turne. They take great delight in giuing gifts : but will receiue no recompence for whatsoever they giue, or think themselves indebted or beholding for any thing that they receiue. This is a testimony of their worthy hospitality, & I am of the minde, that so great an honor deserueth not to be forgotten, as Germany iustly deserueth in regard of this Vertue.

Phaleas the Chalcedonian, did first publish in the Commonwealt (as Asiaticus affirmeth) that goods might bee equally diuided ; to the end, that the two principall plagues to mankind (which are riches and pouerty) might be banished from the City. And this is that which Plato (most of all other) wished for the grounded estate of a happy Commonwealt. But the Germaines neuer fixed their imaginations on such a most fortunate Commonwealt, by disputes and discourses only, but accomplished and brought it to effect by their owne good customs and honest examples. For some of them (as Cæsar auoucheth in his sixth booke, speaking of the Germaines) had not any certain measure of land, or any particular limitation : but the Princes and Magistrates assigned euery year (both to kindreds and parentages, who were acknowledged and placed together) so much ground or land, and such a site or situation, as vnto them seemed best and conuenient ; & the year following, they were constrained to seeke elsewhere. In his fourth booke, hee sayth as much of the Suues, another people of Germany. They had no land which they held in particular, or diuided among themselves : neither were they permitted to tarry longer than a year in a place, to Till or make it husbandable. This is the equality of goods, which then was among the Germaines.

And they rendered great store of reasons for this equality, as the same Author witnesseth in his sixth booke, viz. Fearing least being retained by an accustomed continuance in one quarter, they should forsake the profession of warre, & follow the other more beneficial kind of life. Fearing, least they should withdraw their minds from the enlarging and extendure of their bounds or limits : and growing to be too potent in strength, they should ouerawe and expell the weaker from their goods. Fearing also, least they should become curious in building, to defend themselves against cold and heat, and so proue to be starke Cowards. Fearing besides, lest a wicked covetous desire should arise among them, of scraping and gathering goods together : wheron (customarily) insueth threatnings, dissensions, & blood. Also, to the end that the popular sort might bee contained within a reasonable contentment of mind, when the meaneest perceived his goods to be equal with the most powerfull. This is (in effect) the words of Cæsar, touching the qualitie of goods vfed then among the Germaines : and when the Greekes come to compare with him, in commending this manner of behaviour either in the Cretanes or Lacedæmonians ; all that they could auouch or say, was, to terme this worthy and extraordinary vertue, to be no more then meer barbarousnesse.

Seruitude or bondage was in vse aswell among the Germaines and Gaules, as in other Nations. Many men (so speaketh Cæsar in his sixth booke, discoursing on the Gaules (finding themselves to be charged either with debts, or taxations, or injuries of the mightier sort) did yield themselves into seruitude or slavery of Gentlemen, who had the selfesame right ouer them, as Masters had ouer their slaues. It should seeme, that this Masterie or command was cruell, as well as that whereof Titus Livius recounteth in his 2. booke, to be vfed in Rome, after that the Kings were expelled thence, when the commotion of the bondmen was on foote. For they were then controlled and handled by their Masters, as the bodies of debtors were by their creditors, who were parted (as Quintilian writeth in the sixth chapter

CHAP. V.

How the Gaules used to educate and bring up their children. Of their courage, manhood, and valour in Armes and martial exercises.

Here then were the maners and temperance of the ancient Gaules, which serued very sufficiently to maintain their disposition & strength of body, and (doubtlesse) was the cause of their admirable stature : wherat Cæsar was much amazed, when hee beheld the Gaules which were slaine in the warres of Africa; you haue also heard some part of their liberality, in the administration of their goods, for the releefe of others necessities. But there remained much more to say, if we would enter into discourse, concerning all the parts of their maihood and valiancy : were it in considering the exercise of their youth, or their earnest & violent desire in following armes, and the Nations which haue beene conquered by them, and the Colonies established thoroughout the world, only in the name of the Gaules. The Gaules (thus saith Cæsar in his sixth booke) helde this as a difference from others, in their manner of behaviour, to wit ; That they would neuer permit their children to come openly before them, vntill they were of able yeares to beare Armes. And they held him to be a villaine, whose sonne (being vnder limited yeares) should be found in publike before his fathers face. Cæsar speaketh this neuertheless hee giueth not sufficiently to be vnderstood, at what time or season they were to beare Armes, neither in what exercise their infancy was employed, vntill this date of expectation, therefore we must make search into other Authors.

Tacitus, speaking of the Germaines, would haue vs to know, at what time they came vnto the seruice of the Commonwealt. They obserued as a custome (saith he) that no one should vndertake the profession of Armes, vntill the Commonwealt had approved and allowed his sufficiiciency. Then, in the martial Constitute, either some one of the Princes, or his Father, or els his neereft Kinsman, armed the yong man with a shield and a Iaulin. This was the * Toga or Gown which they tooke, and this was the first degree of honor, wherunto their yong men mounted. Before, and till this dignity was done to them, they were but as a member of the house onely: but afterward, they appertained to the Commonwealth. Aristotle, who wrote long time before Cesar declared vnto vs this manner of education of children (for it seemeth in the 8. Booke of his Politicks) that hee learned this institution of vs. It is necessary (saith he) to accustom and vse the very yongest children to endure cold weather: for it profiteth maruellously, as well, for the disposition of the body, as for manly cariage in war. And this was the reason, why some barbarous people (as the Celts) obserued it as a custome, to plunge their young Infants (so soone as they were borne) in the coldest water of the river, or elsto cloath them in light garments. For, to whatsoever thing youth ought to apply it self, this is the best course; to accustom them thereto (by little and little) from their yongest houre, and when they are tender, because of the heate which is naturally in them, & therefore the first thing to be done, is to be careful in this one point.

Aristotle in this place calleth the Celts barbarous, and yet hee accounteth not their customes barbarous; in regard that hee appointeth the Greekes to fashion themselves after their manner. I know that Galen (sharply reproveth this behaviour, when in the first booke of his Government of health, and instructing how to order health, he saith. I am not of the minde, that Children should onely be nursed among the Germanes. Also, that which he writes of, is neither for the Germanes, or for any other such savage and barbarous men; no more then for Beares, wilde Boares, Lions, or such other beasts. I knowe (I say) that Galen reprehendeth this custome severely; but I know likewise, that the yong nice delicates of the Greekes, whom Galen striveth to please, in preferring them an order for their health: haue bene quite deuoured by these Lyons (as he termeth them) and that the Gaules and Germanes, if they be compared with the Greeks, may in good right be called Lyons.

And truly, Lacedemon, which was the most noble of all the Grecian Cities, was principally renowned for being studious in hardning it selfe to trauaile, after the true manner of the Celts. For the youths of Sparta, did daily inbolden themselves against al manner of paines and exercises: neuer entering into the especial assembly, before the age of twenty yeares, as Plutarch recordeth in the life of Lysurgus. Wherefore, not onely the power of this vertue, which was in the Gaules and Germanes, but (ouer and beside) the authority of Aristotle, as also of Lacedemon (if any man be regardfull thereof) may well serue to answer the reasons of Galen. We may also inferre (to this purpose) that which Strabo hath written, when he saith, The Gaules held this as proper and peculiar to them, to refuse no taking of paines, as fearing to become fat and twain belied by ease: therefore they punished and condemned vnto some pecuniary fine, such yong men as grew grosse through sloath and excessse. Whereunto that ordinance of the Romanes was conformable; that deprived any fat or corpulent Knight, of the Horse graunted him by publike allowance.

Now it is further to be considered, that this exercise was not onely proper or peculiar vnto the Gaules: but it was in like common vse with the Germanes their brethren, as Galen himselfe hath elswhere declared, Let vs listen then to Cesar, who herein giueth them sufficient commendation. From their infancy (this hee writeth in his sixth booke) they added them selves to paines taking, and employed (almost) their whole life time, either in hunting, or feats of warre. They had diuers kinds of wilde beasts, in the Forrest called Heremia: as wilde Bulles, Alees, but especially Buffles, which they tooke with great labour in their dens or ditches, and there slew them. The yong men hardned themselves to this trauell, and euermore exercised this manner of hunting; & they which had laine most of them, bringing their hornes to publike view, as a testimony of their diligence, receiued both reward and great praise. This yeldeth sufficient demonstration, how the yong men prepared their spirits, to endure all paine and labour, and fell not off for any danger: as hauing learned, though not of great and skillfull Doctors, which were befall able to giue them instructions; yet (at least) of their owne selues, and so put it in effectfull execution.

Let vs now obserue what they were in actions of warre, and as the Poet sayeth; The braue workmanship of Mars, because the Gaules were perpetually in war. For, before Cesar came thither (as hee hath written in his sixth booke) it hapned euery yeare, that either they assailed others, or else were glad to defend themselves; and it was easily knowne, that by a custome among the Gaules, age was no excuse to any man, as appeareth by diuers passages in the eighth booke. Vercingetorix, a chiefe Commander of the * Remi, albeit he could very hardly keepe himselfe on horsebacke, because he was so farre gone in yeares: yet notwithstanding, according to the manner of the Gaules, hee would pleade no excuse by his age, in vndergoing such charges as were imposed on him; and he was very vvolving, that any fight should be performed without him. Likewise, in the warre of the Parisians, the whole charge (as is to be seene in the seuenth Booke) was giuen vnto Cambogenus, an especial man of the * Auleri, who was well-neere wholly spent with age: and yet for all that, the great experience which he had in martiall affaires, advanced him to the highest degree of Honor. Answerable to this, Strabo saith, The Gaules were rather men of warre, then any way addicted vnto Tillage or husbandry.

Aristotle writeth, that the Celts helde the vertue of warlike actions in most singular respect and commendation. And it was well noted, as Cesar affirmeth, that the cause of valour (both in the Belgians and Heluetians) grew through their continuall exercise of armes, for he saith: The most valiant people of al the Gaules, were the Belgians.

Now, as Temperance was the first and formost in ranke, as being the Mother, or the Nurse (at least) of true valiancy: so the second cause which Cesar rendreth, was; That they were neighbours to the Germanes, which dwelt on the further side of the Rheine, with whom they were continually at warre. This (I say) was another cause of their valor, that continually they exercised armes, and by the same reason, the Heluetians surpassed (in this vertue) all the other Celts: As it might daily be discerned, in regard, that ordinarily they fought with the Germanes, eyther in repulsing them from their frontiers, or making war on them in their owne country. In this place also might be alledged, their often and frequent skinnishes, to deliuer true faithfulness of their valour. Moreouer, the Gaules for want of warre, to the end that they might still be in exercise of armes: gaue themselves to thefts and robberies, as Diodorus saith, purloining the goods of others, without any prouision of their owne. What were the Germanes? saith he. What participation had they in this vertue? All their life, as hath bene already declared, was no way imployed, but in deeds of armes. And as he hath further written in his sixth Booke, the very greatest honour that any City could haue, was, to haue a great Desert & spacious Country round about it. They esteemed it to bee proper and natural to vertue, to compell their expulsed neighbours, to forsake their Lands and Territories, so that few or none durst dwell nere vnto them. And by this means, they imagined themselves to be in the greatest security, in being deliuered from al dread of courses, which suddenly might be made into their Country.

Tacitus speaketh of the same exercise of armes. You could not so readily put into their heads, any order for husbandry in their grounds, or carefullnes for gathering their fruites, and come, as to go assault the enemy, and to returne back with wounds and maimes. Moreouer, it appeared to them, that it was meere sloth and carelesse, to winne that by sweate and labour, which a man might purchase with the price of his blood. Cesar saith likewise of the Germanes, the same that Diodorus doth of the Gaules, that they were addicted to rapine and thefts. Robberies (thus speaketh Cesar in his sixth booke) did not make men any iot the worse esteemed: so that they were done out of those limits, which appertained to each City. And it is said that they vsed these courses: onely to exercise their youthes, and for the auoyding of ydleness. And when some one of the Lords would deliuer his

Thus then, for the deciding of such differences, each of the parties doe chuse two Iudges for either side, who are absolved of the oath which they haue taken to their Canton: and promise to iudge according to right and equiuy, and labour that the suite may bee louingly and very speedily accorded, or iudicially ended.

By the ancient alliances, there were certaine places appointed, for the ending of such suites. The seuen first Cantons sent their ambassadors and arbitrators to the Abbey of the Hermitage, to end their such suites as happened among them. By an article of very ancient alliance with them of Glaris, it is expressly said; that if they had any suite with them of Vri, the assembly should be at Merch. If against the canton of Suiss; the arbitrators shold meete at Bergeraz: and at Brunnen, if against them of Vnderwald. And then the other Cantons, hauing had knowledge of the cause, pronounced the sentence. The Bernians; and the three Cantons of Vri, Suiss, and Vnderwald, assembled at a place named Dakienholtz. They of Zurich and Berne, at Lofinge. The Fribourgers & they of Solleurre, hauing a suite against the eight first Cantons, or some of them, sent their Iudges to Zofinge; and if they were defendants, to Willfow. As for the causes of them of Basile, Schaffouse, and Appenzell, they pleaded them at Bada, together with them of these Cantons, allied with them of Rotuille and of Mulhouse. But the differences of them of S.Gall, were determined in the Abbey of the Hermitage: and them of the Grifons, at Wallenstad, which is a Towne at the ende of the Lake of Rine, in the Bayliwick of Sargans.

When then some difference happeneth, which cannot be kindly accorded, and that the entreaty of the Cantons serueth to no purpose: the arbitrators and ambassadors of the Cantons that are in suite, do meete at the place appointed, & (with them) the ambassadors of the other Cantons confederates, who come thither to atone the parties, and to make some amiable composition. The Iudges and Arbitrators being assembled, after that the parties haue pleaded their causes: if the Iudges take resolution, & giue sentence, the parties must (of necessity) be contented. But if they be of diuers opinions (as many times it happeneth) and that there are as many voyces on the one side, as on the other; then a fitt Iudge or arbitrator is chosen, whom they call Ein obmann, or, Ein gemeinen mann. He giueth no sentence at all, but onely approueth one of those, which the arbitrators haue pronounced. Sometimes the Iudges themselves do chuse the odde arbitrator: yet in such sort notwithstanding; that he is a man of one of the Cantons; no medler with cyther party, nor hauing any interest in the cause.

The alliance of the seuen first Cantons, makes mention of this election and choise: as that of Fribourg, that of Solleurre, that of Appenzell, and them of S.Gall and of Mulhouse. It is added to the articles of the alliance of Schaffouse, that if the Iudges cannot accord, by choise of another arbitrator, taken from one of the Cantons; they shall then take one of the Lords of the councill of S.Gall. And in the alliance of Rotuille, command is giue to the Iudges, to chuse for an odde arbitrator, one of the Lords of the councill of S.Gall or of Mulhouse. Sometimes also to the complainant chuse. As if the Bernians haue a suite against the three first Cantons, or any one of them; the Cantons shal name sixteen men, out of which number; the Bernians are to chuse a sub-arbitrator. But if they bee defendants, the Cantons will then (for sub-arbitrator) chuse one of the Lords of the lesser councill of Berne. If some difference fall betweene them of Zurich, and of Berne, the complainants chuse for an odde arbitrator, one of the defendants Lords of the councill. The same is obserued in suites for them of Basile, against the other cantons; and so in the Grifons causes.

Thus you see how the Switzers gouerne themselves in the deciding of controuersiall suites betweene the common-wealths. I know very well, that some may dispute subtilly, both for, and against this order there obserued: but I will leave that discouurse to the Readers. For mine owne part, I admire the simplicity and integrity of our ancestors, who by such manner of proceeding, haue often brought to end very great variances, and carefully conferred publike peace and concord. But they did not regard their owne particular profit, neither desired any thing more, then to see their country peaceable and flourishing. If now each man had no other meaning, but would aime at that mark: so many suites would not be seene, and easily might those be appealed, that are the hottest attempted.

CHAP. V.

Of those Common-wealths, which are in each of the seuerall Cantons.
And first, of the Common-wealths of Zurich, Basile and Schaffouse.

Having shewne already, how the whole Commonwealthe of the Switzers is gouerned in common: it behoueth now to make mention, of the Common-wealthe in each distinct Canton. Now it seemeth to me, that the common-wealths of the thirteene Cantons, may bee referred to three formes. For as there are three names of soueraine Magistrates and Cantons, so haue they likewise as many formes of common-wealths; differing not onely in name, but also in the things themselves.

In some certaine Cantons, the cheefe Commanders or Heads of the councill, are called Ammanns. This is obserued in the Cantons that haue no Cities or Townes, but Villages onely, hauing a popular estate, and the souerainety appertaining to the people; by whose aduice, the very greatestt affaires of importance are decided. Of this number are Vri, Suiss, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzell.

The other Cantons haue their cities and townes, which haue the souerainety: yet in such manner, as there are two formes of common-wealths. For the cities and townes, especially such as haue bene built by some Princes, or some times haue bene subiected to them: are gouerned by an Auget, whom they call, Schultheiss, (who is cheefe of the councill) and by some number of councillors chosen by free election, from and by the whole number of Citizens. The forme of this common-wealthe is Aristocratical among all the other: and in this manner are gouerned the common-wealths of Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solleurre.

There are other cities and townes diuided by certaine companies, by each whereof, and by voyce of such men as are in euery of them, the Lords of the councill are elected, and the soueraine Magistrate or cheefe of the councill, who by them is tearmed Burgemeister, that is to say, Master of the Bourgeses, which we in a shorter word call Bourgmaster. Such are the common-wealths of Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse. Now we are to speake of these diuers formes of common-wealths in order, beginning with the last, first.

First then, all the people of these Townes free and Imperiall, were diuided into two ranks: the one of Noblemen, the other of Yeomen. The Noblemen had a Society by themselves, apart, which the Allemaignes or Germans did call, Ein Societät, and they of Zurich, Ein Constatell.

In elder times, in the city of Basile, which is very spacious, and for the multitude of Noblemen, they were diuided into two societies, bandes, or companies of Noblemen. Oftentimes they were in quarrels, and had the fouerainety: so that out of the one cōpany they chose the Confull, and out of the other, the Tribune or Capitaine of the city, which is the estate of greatestt authority next vnto that of Confull or Bourgmaster.

Neuertheless, afterward the Noblemen lost this fouerainety, or else forsooke their right voluntarily. For at the time of the councill of Basile, when Leres, then Dolphin of France, brought (very neere to Basile) an Army of Armignacks, in fauour of Pope Eugenius, and the Duke of Austria; many Gentlemen of Basile, went and ioyned with that Army, in regard whereof, they were all banished, and their posterity deuiued & excluded from all publike honours.

Some of the Noblemen got entrance again into the City, but were excluded from governing in the State.

The companies of Lords & Commons called to do them honour.

The privilege of Zurich in choosing their Lords of council.

Afterward, when the Burgesse (by common consent) made alliance with the ten Cantons of the Switzers, in the year, 1501. the most part of the Noble-men, who hated the Switzers: dislodged from the city, and withdrew themselves to Castles heere and there, so that their authority diminished greatly then, and all the rest was lost in the year, 1529. For by the Sermons & exhortations of Oecolampadius, the doctrine and ceremonies of the Church were reformed, by order sent from the council, against which, many Noblemen opposed themselves. And although they could not hinder the change of Religion, yet they abandoned and left the city, and would not abide in it.

After which time, the two companies whereof we spake, entered in againe, and got possession of some private houses, & as yet they keepe those houses to themselves, and they belong to the whole body of the Nobility. And those houses are called in their language, Zun Amstet en und Zun Brunnen, but yet none of this is of the council. For although the council do meete together (almost) every day, and the Gentlemen (having forsaken the city) dwell most part of the time in their Castles: by common aduice of the Burgeses, they were excluded from governing in the common-wealth, which they had renounced voluntarily. Neuerthelesse, some noble Families that dwell in the city, & haue had care of the common-wealth with the other Burgeses, are in ranke of the foure first companies or supporters of the city, and (in them) are chosen to be of the council. And therefore, to do them honour, in regard of their condition; these Tribes or companies are called Berrenyunft, that is to say, the companies of Lords.

Therefore, there are no more companies of these Noblemen in Basile, but those that are distinguished with the other Burgeses. But at Zurich and at Schaffouse, the Noblemen haue their companies apart by themselves. And they of Zurich haue this priuiledge beside, above the tribes and companies of Tradefmen, to take the moiety, that is, the most part of the Lords of the council, from forth the company of these Noblemen: so that they are as a counterpoise to the other companies. Notwithstanding, there is some difference among these Noblemen, for the Families of race, that are very noble and ancient: they do make a band by themselves, and they are called Die Stubler, by reason of the place where they assemble apart by themselves, by right & especial priuiledge. To the whole body of these tribes or companies, are ioyned many citizens, which are not of any trade nor traffick in which respect, they may haue place in one company, rather then in another. Porters, Labourers, Burden-bearers, and other such like manner of people, who when warre hapneth, are held and reputed to be of this body of companies, which they call St. Coraßaffell, and receiue wages: they haue a voyce in electing the Master of the whole body of companies, and he is of the Seignuries council, in regard of his place.

Beside the Society and Company of Noblemen, the people of those cities & townes there, are parted into certaine tribes or companies, which the Germans call Zunft. The word (it may be) taketh name or originally, of Zamenkunft, which signifieth to meete and assemble themselves in company. Some interpret them to be Tribes, others, Courts, and others, Colledges or Abbeyes: but wee will call them Tribes or Companies. The number of them is not equall in the forenamed Cities and Townes. For there are fifteene at Basile: whereof the foure first are esteemed more noble then the other, and are called the companies of Lords, as already hath bene said. The first tribe or company, is that of Merchants. The second of Goldsmiths, Goldfiners, Founders, and Pewterers. The third is of Merchants dealing only in wines: with whom the Notaries, Masters of Hospitals, Spittles, and other such like communities are ioyned. The fourth is of Merchants dealing in Silkes, and of Factors for all States: This company is the very greatest of them all. The other eleuen, are of all sorts of trades and handycrafts men.

Now there is a dozen or twelue tribes or companies at Zurich: heerebefore they were thirteene in number, when many Drapers & workers in wooll dwell there: for that was one company by it selfe. But now adies, the weauers of woollen cloth and other things, are ioyned into one company pany with the Fullers and Diars. At Schaffouse there are eleuen companies only: neuerthelesse, it falleth out many times, that diuers trades are ioyned together in one company. They haue their meetings by themselves: as at Zurich, the Millers and Bakers, the Barbers and Chirurgeons, the Smiths and Metall men. So at Basile, the Fishermen and Mariners or Barquers, the Cordwainers and Curriers, the Taylors & Skinners. These companies are diuided, and they are called Ghaurt Zunft. For when there is question of cheefe Trades, and especially workmen in them, their houses of meetings and assemblies are by themselves. But in things that concern the common-wealth, and when, and where all ought to be present, to elect Lords of the council, or the Zunft Masters, who must be also in the council, every man speaks his minde, and giues his voyce.

Out of each of these companies, some men are chosen, as many of one company as of another, to be Lords of council. In every city there are two publike councils, which haue the principall authority: as namely, the great council, when as a good number of councillors meete together, in name of all the people: as is vied in the affaires of greatest importance, and which do appertaine to the whole common-wealth. Next, the lesser council, who meete together every day, about the common-wealths businesse, and take knowledge of differences happening among the citizens. The great council of Zurich, consisteth of two hundred men: That of Basile, is of two hundred forty foure: and that of Schaffouse, is of foure score and sixe.

As concerning the lesser council of Zurich, it is of fifty: that of Basile hath threescore and foure: and that of Schaffouse, hath but twenty sixe. For out of each tribe or company, twelue are taken for the great council: except at Zurich, where they elect eightene of the Nobility. At Zurich also each company giueth three men for the lesser council: at Basile, foure; at Schaffouse, two. Next, in every of these cities, there are two Consuls or Bourgmaisters, who are the cheefe and Presidents of council.ouer and beside these two, at Basile there are two Tribunes, who are cheefe in council with the Bourgmaisters. Moreover, at Zurich the Noblemen send sixe from among them, to the lesser council: the other companies doe send each one but three. By the plurality of voyces, choise is made of sixe other men, out of such companies as the council do propoofe, to fill vp the number.

As concerning the election of councillors (for so will wee hereafter call the Lords of the lesser council) it is done in manner following. Every year, about mid-lune, and mid-December, all the citizens of Zurich assemble themselves together, every man in his tribe and company: and the elect a cheefe man, whom they call, Zunftmeister, that is to say, Master of the tribe or company. The custome of these three cities, is, that the companies haue two Masters: but one of them is in estate but sixe Moneths, at the end whereof, the other succeedeth him. Neuerthelesse, it often comes to passe, that hee who was Zunftmeister the halfe year before, is chosen againe. By this meanes, the lesser council is diuided in two parts, to wit, the old & new. Such as haue bene in charge the first sixe Moneths, wearme them of the olde council; for although they be called, when the council is helde, yet notwithstanding, it is not alwayes so done, and there are many masters which passe in the new council only.

The great council of Basile is diuided in the same manner, and of twelue which is taken from each company, there are sixe of the new council, and sixe of the olde. Beside the Zunftmeisters, the lesser council of Zurich chuseth one councillor from each of the companies: but the lesser council of Basile chuseth two. These councillors thus elected, with the other which we haue said to be chosen extraordinarily at Zurich, are diuided into two bands: whereof the one is the old council, and the other the new. These two councils are changed euery sixe Moneths at Zurich; so that at their ending, the olde council electeth the new. At Basile, and at Schaffouse, they continue in the estate a whole year together.

The election of the council at Schaffouse, is made on the morrow after Pentecoste: and that of Basile, on Saturday be-before the foure and twentieth day of June. At Zurich, the Zunftmeisters are elected by the companies in their houses of meeting: then the council of two hundred confirme this election; but at Basile this confirmation belongeth to the olde council. The voyce is given openly at Zurich, and secretly at Schaffouse. For in each tribe or company, charge is given to particular persons, to collect the voyce, whereupon they all come to them in order, and tell them closely in the eare, for whom they give voyce to be Zunftmeister. The lesser council assemblen at the offense, three times every weeke, and some whiles (vpon earnest occasion) four times. The olde and new councillors of Zurich, are seated one by another, & sometimes one among another: but at Basile, the old councillors are about the younger. They haue also this custome, to withdraw often into another Hall, to consult together. After resolution is taken, a councillor of the first company, reporteth the aduice to the new council: and they call the reporter Den Offner.

The Bourgmaster, whom they call Burgermeister, as much to say, as Master of the Bourgeses, is President of the old and new councils. The great council electeth him by open voyce at Zurich; at Schaffouse by secret voyce: and at Basile, the olde council first electeth the Bourgmaster, and the new council the yeare following. The Bourgmaster is in state at Zurich, fixe Moneths: but at Basile and Schaffouse, a whole yeare together, and turne by turne, the Bourgmasters and Councillers olde and new are changed. They whom at Basile they terme Zunftmeisters, and Werkmeisters at Zurich (as much to say, as Masters of companies and communities) doe second the Bourgmasters in their authority.

At Zurich there are three, and at Basile two, who with the two Bourgmasters are called the foure chiefe & principal Lords of the city. Nine other Lords of the lesser council at Basile, are ioyned to these four in chiefe, and by reason of the number, they are called the council of thirteene. They heare the causes of very greate importance, and deliberate on them first, before they propound any thing to the lesser council: and therefore they may be called Preconsulters, or first councillers. Moreover, there is a particular council at Zurich, whom wee may name the Chamber of accounts, for it manageth publike affaires: and is composed of eight councillors, and haue the Bourgmaster of the olde council for their President. Then is there two Purse-bearers or Treasurers, and the Superintendents for Ecclesiastical goods do assist them, together with foure other councillors, two of the olde, and two of the new council. They take knowledge not onely of monies employed for the common-wealth: but oftentimes also, the younger council demandeth their aduice in cases of importance, whereon they consult a while, and then giue their report to the younger council.

To these publike councils, there are alwayes two Secretaries assisting, with their committees, when necessity requireth. The first and chiefe is called Stattschreyber, that is to say, Secretary of the city. At Zurich, the other is called Andersschreyber, that is to say, sub-Secretary: but they of Basile call him Ratsschreyber, that is, Secretary to the council. There is a particular Secretary for the Chamber of Accounts; whom they of Zurich call Rechnschreyber. The estate of Secretary in these cities is honorable, and of great gaine. In regard whereof, the Gentlemen strue to keepe it in their owne power, as seldom it is giuen to any other. These men are they (among all other) that know the lawes, customes, priuiledges, and all the secrets of the common-wealth.

Next to the councils publike, are Iustices of the city. There are two at Zurich, one for ciuill causes, Das Statright, which was in ancient times under power of the Nunnes, and the Abbesse elected the Lieutenant, or cheefe man in that kinde of iustice, whom they called Den Schultheissen, and his assessors or assistants: but now the election belongeth to the lesser or younger council. Their number is of eight, and they haue their Lieutenant, Secondary, and Seriant. To them appertaineth the knowledge of ciuill causes, Debtes, Hires, Lendings, Borrowings, Sales, and as the Switzers vse to say, they iudge Wib und eigen. There is no appeale from their sentence: but if there happen any difficult difficult cause, they send it to the Council.

The other Iustice, whom they call Das Zinsricht, is a Iudgement of proceffe and suites, which happen for repts and yearly reuennues. The Secretary of the other Iustice, and two Lords of the younger council, it seemes doe daily assist for the ending of all such differences. In the bigger Basile there are two such kinds of Iustices, and a third in the lesser Basile. That Law or Iustice of greatest authority, which they terme also Das Statright, is composed of ten Iudges; one part whereof is of the council, and the other, such as the people do name. They take knowledge of all causes, ciuill and criminal: but when there is question of testaments, wils, contracts, monies borrowed, and other such like things: the Prouost or Lieutenant of the city sitteth in Iudgement. As for causes criminal, the Prouost of the Empire iudgeth them. And there are three Lords of the council, who do pursue criminal causes, by the sollicitation of one, who is an ordinary Attorney, named by them, Obertensmecht, and keepeth company with the Iudges, hauing an aduocate waiting on him.

These Iudgements are done publike-ly, and haue eight open audiences, where- by all are permitted to be there present, to heare and see whatsoever is done. But at Zurich and at Schaffouse, the new council doth iudge the criminal causes. Neuerthelesse, the Bourgmaster doth not sit: but it is the Prouost of the Empire, whom Wytschagt, or Wuttschagt, who presideth and collecteth the voyces. Every yeare the council chuseth some one of that body, to exercise that charge. Proceffe and suites criminal are handled at Zurich, with the doores fast shut: but at Schaffouse in open Court, so that all men may vnderstand the accusations and defences. But the council com-mandeth all to be absent, when there is question of pronouncing sentence. The second order of Iustice at great Basile, iudgeth not but in cases of small importance, which hardly exceedeth the summe of ten pounds. But the Iustice of smaller Basile, hath a Iudge apart, & taketh knowledge of all causes, except of criminal.

There are two Courts, or kinds of Iustices at Schaffouse. The one which they call Das Schuldricht, is law or iustice for debts: for therein only is ended differences of contracts, debts, and such like things. And if the summe where-of question is made, doe amount about an hundred crownes, the council doth take knowledge of it. In this Court are twenty assessors or assistants, to wit, one of each Tribe: moreover, eight other persons, chosen by the council. The other order of Iustice is named Obertensricht, or Wuttschricht, that is to say, Iustice for fines and amercements: because the Prouost of the empire, or Iudge in causes criminal, presideth there, and condemneth all such forfeitures & fines. There are twelve assessours out of the twelve Tribes, and who are of the great council. Causes criminal of lesser importance, are debated and ended in this Iustice there; as light injuries, vulgar outrages, and such like. But when wordes do wound honour, and the wrong is not easie to be dissembled or digested; the knowledge of such cases appertaineth to the lesser council.

Beside what hath beene saide, these three cities haue each one their particular council, which they terme Stuorricht, or Segricht, where they discourse on causes of matrimony. For after that the religion was changed, the councils of the three cities established one council: wherein were a certaine number of assistants, elected by publique suffrages, and taken out of the olde and new councils, and among whom were some Diuines or Theologians as they call them. Neuerthelesse, at Schaffouse none of the Ministers were assistants, but onely some learned men admitted to council, who had each one as his adiunct, some Doctour of the Law. These Iudges take knowledge of all matrimoniall causes: punish whoredomes and adulteries, and haue charge to obserue the liues & manners of euery one.

Beside, in these common-wealths, bastards are deprived of all honours and dignity: nor is it lawfull for them to be seene at the council, nor in the Courts of Iustice. True it is, they are not guilty of that stain to their birth, neither can it be denied, but that (oftentimes) bastards haue wonne more commendations for their virtues, then euer could their legitimate brethren: as we haue an example of Iephia, a Iudge of Gods owne people. But to bridle the leud concupiscences of many, and to conferre the dignity of sacred marriage: Bastards stand as branded with infamy, and yke some eye-fores to well ordered common-wealths.

Next, hee that hath not dwelt tenne yeares within the city of Zurich, cannot be chosen to be one of the publike councill.

Such as are borne out of Switzerland cannot be of the lesser councill at Schaffouse: But if they be Bourgeses of twenty yeares standing, they may be brought into the great councill, & into the number of the Iudges.

I will not tell you that strangers are vnworthy of these honors: but it is requisite first of all, that hee who ought to haue charge in a common-wealth, should be particularly affectioned and obliged thereto, and afterward be well skilde and sence, in the lawes and customes of the country.

And me-thinks, citizens, and such as (from their youth) haue bene bred in a common-wealth; should haue more aduantage therein, then strangers.

Moreover, there is nothing more pernicious to common-wealths, then enmities and despights, proceeding from such aduancements to high degrees: as draw on partialities and factions, the danger whereof cannot be auoyded, when naturall borne subiects are left despised, and ancient Families contemned, and charge of publike Officers giuen to strangers, & men of no merit.

Beside bastards and strangers, adulterers, murderers, and men made infamous for any crime: are (by a common law) excluded from councill in these common-wealths.

Publike citates and conditions are of diuers kinde in these common-wealths, and in great number, according as the cities are peopled: we will make mention of the principals onely.

The highest degree, next after the Bourg-masters and Zunft-Masters, are such as haue charge of the publike monies: who are called in many places of Switzerland, Serckmeister, as much to say, as Treasurers or Purse-bearers. At Basile there are three, named Dorperherren, that haue the keeping of the cities treasures. Besides them, there are three other, named Ladenherren, who manage the monies of the Imposts, Customs, and yearly reuenues of the common-wealth: They also pursue criminall causes, making themselves parties, by meanes of the ordinary Attorney. At Zurich there are men (almost) in the selfe same charge, whom they call Die Ambgelter; who manageth the tolle-monies of Corne and Wine, which they cause to be gathered by their committees. This tolle or taxation is not but on the Wine publicly sold, and on the Corne brought in from abroad: but for the wine & corne which the Bourgeses eate and drinke in their houses, they pay not any thing.

Beside these two Treasurers of the common-wealth, there is a third at Zurich, for the reuenues of the Church, & he is called Der Bloesteren obman: he gathereth certaine reuenues of the Abbeyes; wherewith the Ministers wages are payed, the Churches maintained, and the poore cherished or releued, and the ouerplus remaining, is referred to ease the people in times of publike necessities. Some yeares past, the country of Zurich having bene afflicted with an extreme dearth of victuals: the receiver sold corne at a meane price to them of the city, and to most part of the Villages round about, bought with the referred money at the best rate, and thereby the Subiects of the Seigneury were greatly releued.

Next to these, there are other Officers, as they that take care of publike buildings, whom the French call Foyers, the Germans Wuherren, and they of Basile, Lonherren, because they pay the works & workmen that serue in publike. These Surveyers haue charge of the waies, Gates, Towers, Rampiers, Bridges, Couiduits, and other publike Edifices: taking order that they shall be maintained and kept in their best ability. Moreover, they iudge with three Lords of the councill (who are their adiuncts) such differences as happen for the confines, Gutters, Channels, Windows, Walls, and such like things, & wherein the neighbours are to be guided by their direction in their building. At Basile there are five Seigneurs, that take knowledge of these matters.

The Vniuersity at Basile, founded by Aeneas Syluius, who was after Pope, called Pius 2.

The reason why so few Schoollers are, in the Vniuersity of Basile.

There is another degree of them that take charge of victuals. Of this number are the visitors for Bread; to consider if the Loafe carry his full weight, or no. Others view the Flesh in the Butchery, and aduisedly obserue, that they kill not any Beasts, the flesh whereof is bad, and dangerous to be eaten; they also set a price vpon the pound, to sell it by. Then there are some that take charge of Fish, and heedfully forcee, that none be taken whē they are spawny, and haue an eye beside to the goodnesse of all other Fish in the Market. Others looke to salt Fish, and to the Market of Butter and Cheese, how it is reasonably sold. There are some other Officers, whose names are sufficient to be noted: as the Patrons of Widowes and Orphanes, Schennuort, and at Basile, Weissenherren: The Almoners; Visitors for weights and measures; Deputies for questioning of inatters; Comptrolers of Ecclesiasticall goods; and Visitors of Schooles.

Moreover, in these cities there are Schooles very well ordered. At Basile is an Vniuersity greatly renowned, established by Aeneas Syluius, afterward Pope, named Pius the second, who gaue it all the same priuiledges, rights, and immunities, which the Vniuersities of Boulogne, Colongne, Heidelberg, Erdford, Lipsa & Vienne haue. Aeneas Syluius was lodged at Basile, during the time as the councill was kept there. He found the city so pleasant, the ayre so sweete, with such commodity and abundance of all things; that hee reputed the place apt and worthy to haue an Vniuersity founded in it. In the times of our ancestors, and our owne also, this Vniuersity hath yielded many wise men, professors of the tongues, in Philosophy and all Sciences, who are needlesse here to be named. Neuertheless, considering the greatnesse of the city, and the fame of the Doctours there abiding, there are but few Schoollers. Beatus Rhenanus rendereth the reason, and saith; It is occasioned by the smallnesse of reuenues belonging to this Vniuersity, and to many Schooles in Germany. As thinking, that if there were fewer Schooles and Vniuersities, they would bee much more frequented then they are. There is not any Vniuersity at Zurich; notwithstanding, euen to this present day, the tongues haue beene so faithfully taught there, and all good Sciences and Diuinity, that it is very famous, and highly esteemed among all them that study Diuinity.

Finally, these three cities whereof we speake, haue power to stampe and coyne monie: and therefore there are forging Mints, and Masters of the monies, whose charge is to take order that the money coyned with the stamp of the city, should beare full weight, and be of a good alloy. Each of these cities hath her mony apart by herselfe. They of Basile do coyne the same mony with them of Halsatia and of Bourgonne, and call it a Rappennuntz, in regard of a Rauen, which scruech for Armes to many peeces of their mony. Five & twenty Sols of this mony, makes a Florin of gold, which is thought to value threecore cruzers. At Schaffouse the mony is of the same alloy & price, as that of the Empire. They of Zurich do coyne Dallers, and halfe Dallers, of equall price with them of the Empire: but they haue a kinde of mony, which is their owne in particular, whereof forty Sols makes a Florin of gold. They stampe also another sort of mony, which they call Baches, wherof sixteen makes a Florin.

In ranke of these publike charges and offices, we may set downe the Watch, & such as take care for prouision against the accidents of fire. There are two sortes of watch, besides the Sentinels in the clock-houses, and the Porters. First the perpetual guardes at the cities coast, who keepe watch euery night, and diligently search through all parts of the city, crying at all houres of the night.ouer and beside these, out of each company are taken a certaine number of Bourgeses, who likewise watch (according to their turnes) with their Armes. This double guard is not done for any feare they haue of enemies: but to auoid the inconueniences of fire, and to take order also, that (during the time of night) all matters may be peaceable and quiet.

They that are Committees, to take care of dangers concerning fire, when a ny ch happeneth in the city, may command the Carpenters, and other men of like quality, to runne for quenching the fire, taking order that all may be done without confusion, and for the best safety of them that haue the misfortune of the fire.

fire. Moreouer, they carry an eye ouer the watch at the Gates, and on the wals; lest any tumult should happen in the city. For it is ordained, that when the fire is in any one place, a certaine number of the Bourgeses (chosen out of each company) make their sudden appearance at the Gates or Ports, and vpon the walles in Armes. Moreouer, the whole city is distributed into certaine bandes, euery one of them hauing his Captaine & Ensigne to it selfe, vnder whom they go marching in excellent order. The Bourgmaster betakes himselfe to the Town-house, with some of the principall councillors and officers of the Seignury, to aduise on what is good for the weale publique. And not onely Carpenters, Maïsons, and their seruants, but likewise most of the Bourgeses meete together, all labouring industriously to quench the fire: and oftentimes the women throw themselves of no meane courage, in bringing and casting on the water. Beside, if the fire happen in some Village out of the city, the lustiest disposed of euery Tribe (whereof election is made for the purpose) do meete, and issue forth together, to quench the fire. They are conducted by one of the councill Seigneurs, who is sent to helpe and aduise what is meetest to be done, but most especially, to comfort them that haue the losse.

We haue already told you, that the Switzers take great care for the poore. At Zurich, and in some other Townes, there is a daily distribution of almes to all the poore there, as of Bread and Pulse-pottage. There are a great number of poore Schollers in Zurich, sometimes forty, otherwhiles fourescore, that are thus releeued, some bestowing garments, and other needfull things on them also, vsing the poore in no worse manner, then they of the Abbeyes and Couents in the Seignury of Zurich are. Vpon the Sundayes and festiual dayes, an almes collection is made of the people: which Monthly, or at euery two Moneths, by men chosen & deputed to the office, is distributed equally to the poore in the city, and such as liue abroad in the fields. Beside, in the Cities there are great Hospitals, wherein needy citizens, aged, impotent, sicke persons, orphans, and many other are releeued. The Seignury appointeth duers honest people, to haue care of the poores necessities: such as are the Master of Hospitals, Proctors, Receiuers, & their Committees and Comptrollers.

Hitherto wee haue shewen you the forme and state government obserued in the cities: but ouer and beside these, they haue authority in the neighboring countries, and (among the rest) the canton of Zurich hath more country iurisdiction, and larger Bayliwicks, then eyther Basile or Schaffoufe. But in all the Lands and Seignuries belonging vnto these three cantons, there is one and the selfe-same order of government. For certaine Bayliwicks are gouerned by the councill of the city, in such manner, as the Bayliffes dwell in the city, and are councillors of the common-wealth, and yet go to keepe Courts in the Villages. And if there happen any criminal suite, and whereof there is desert of punishment capitall, the councill takeith knowledge thereof. There are other Bayliwicks of farre larger extent, and thether Bayliffes are sent with ample power: so that they iudge not onely in ciuill causes, but oftentimes in criminall occasions, and chafise malefactors, according to the greatnesse of the delicts. These Bayliwicks haue their priuiledges and ancient customes: some also haue law and iustice apart by themselves, and are administrated by Iudges chosen out of the same places.

The Bayliffes make no change or alteration (of any thing) in these places: but they leaue to the inhabitants, all their rights safe and sound: contenting themselves onely to preside in iustice, and giue sentence according to the lawes and customes of each Bayliwicke. The canton of Zurich hath nine great Bayliwicks, to wit, the county of Kybourg, the Bailiwick of Groningen, Andelfingen, Grisenfee, Egli-sow, the free Province, Kegenbourg, Vaden-sile, and Lanfen, neere to the fall of Rhein. There are two and twenty small Bayliwicks or Castle-tships beside: in some of which, there is as large extent of ground, and as great number of men, as in some of the greater Bayliwicks. Moreouer, beside these Bayliwicks, two pleasant Townes, namely Winteraner and Stein, are vnder the protection of Zurich's canton. The Officers of iustice are in the same Townes; but the inhabitants are ty-ed in obedience to the Seignury of Zurich, to obey their lawes, and to go to war for that Canton; in which respect, the two Townes haue their feuerall Ensignes by themselves.

The Bayliwicks belonging to the Canton of Basile, are the Cattle of Farnspurg, seated on the top of a Mountaine about Rhinsfeld; Walbourg, a small towne on the Mount Jura, which they tearme Der Howerstein, in regard of the Rock there cut in funder; Hombourg, Munchenstcin, and Ramstein.

Schaffoufe hath the most part of the country of Clegow, all about Basile, and sendeth Bayliffes and Chastellaines into the Bourroghs and Villages on it depending.

CHAP. VI.

Of the publike estate and gouernment, of the Townes of Berne, Lucerne, Fribourg, and Solleurre: which are not diuided into Tribes and Companies, as Zurich, Basile, and Schaffoufe are.

Of the second kinde of gouernment without tribes or companies.

Schuldheff: The seruants of the word.

The words as they are written in the Lombards lawes.

WE haue already said, that the second kinde of publike gouernment, is considered in such Townes, as are not distributed into certaine Tribes or Companies, out of which are equally chosen, the Lord & Seigneurs appointed for Councill and Iustice. In these towns they that are soueraigne Magistrates, or Heads of publike councill, are called Stn Schuldheffen. The old Allemann word is found in the Lawes of the Lombards, where it is written, Schuldahis. It seemeth that the word came of debt, which the Switzers tearme Schuld, and of commanding: as much to say, that the Schuldahis commands the debtors to satisfie them of whom they borrowed. And in this fence it is found written in the Lombards lawes, vnder the title of debts and wages, in these words.

If a free man who is a debtor, hath nothing else wherewith to make satisfaction, but his owne private Cattel, as Horses and Oxen for labour, or Kine to the pail: then he that chal- lengeth or demandeth the debt, shall go to the Schuldahis, and intimate the cause, giuing him to vnderstand, that his debtor hath nothing else to make reparation withall, but the matters above rehearsed. Then the Schuldahis is to make seizure on the said Cattel, &c.

The same word is found also in the twentieth rule of King Luiprand's lawes in significant tearmes, as followeth. If any man haue a cause or suite, and do appeare before his Schuldahis to demand iustice: if in case that the Schuldahis do him not iustice within foure houres after following (if both the parties stand bound to answer before him) himselfe shall pay to the demander fixe Sols, and to his iudge fixe Sols.

We may perceiue heereby, that the word Schuldahis signified (among our graue Ancients) a Iudge, that gaue sentence vpon differences concerning debts, made leuicy on the debtors goods, and compelled them to pay their creditors. Neuertheless, there was no iustice so high, but hee stood in subiection to the county. At this day, the name is in frequent vie among the Princes of Germany: so that the Iudges of Townes and Villages haue no other name. Among the Switzers it is more honourable for in the forenamed townes, the Schuldahis is lord ouer all. The soueraigne Magistrates of Townes among the Switzers, some haue thought were called Consuls, in imitation of the Romans: others hold opinion, that Bourgmasters and Schuldahis ought to be called Prefitors. For mine owne part, I call them Consuls, that are Presidents in publike councill. The French call him an Auoyer, whom we tearme Schuldheff.

Now as concerning the Towns wherof we speak, they are not diuided by companies and trades, because there are lawes which prohibit them from so doing. But although the forme of the Common-wealths of Zurich and Berne are different: yet the one stands bound to succour the other reciprocally, to maintain and conferre the estate, such as is established in cythers common-wealth. In the meane while, the trades that are at Berne, Lucerne, Fribourg, and Solleurre, haue houses established for meeting, for knowledge of the best and cheefest workmen, but not for the election of Magistrates. They tearme those Officers by the name of St. Schafften, and not Zunftten.

Two publicke councils in those Towns:
the great and
the lesser.

In these Townes there are two publicke councils, as at Zurich, Basle, & Schaffhouse; to wit, the great and the lesser. The great council of Berne, is of two hundred men, as at Zurich, although it hath more then two hundred councillors. The lesser council of Berne, is of sixe and twenty. At Lucerna, eighteen councillors do governe the estate, during the space of sixe Moneths, and eightene other sixe Moneths, or the rest of the year. To elect the council of Berne, the proceeding is in this manner.

Banderets is the Capitaine
of a quarter in any good Towne.

The third Feries before Easter day, the foure Banderets of the Towne, doe chuse, and take with them sixteene Bourgeses, the worthiest and best esteemed men of all: then these twenty, with the Auyger, do elect the great council, wherefore we may well call them Electors. First of all, they consider and examine exactly, the lues and manners of all them that are to be of the council of two hundred; and if any one of them hath soyled his dignity and reputation, with any bad or villanous acte; they depose him, and in the place, as wel of the deposed, as of the ded, they chuse another, whom they do better like and allow of. In meane while, their election remaineth secret, untill the evening of the day before Easter, & then the Officers goe, and signifie to all them that are elected for the great and lesser councils: that they are to meete on the morrow morning in the Towne-house.

The Seigneurs
of the great council
meet in the Towne-house

The first Feries after Easter, the Seigneurs of the council do assemble in their houses of meeting, and afterward they conduct them to the Towne-house, that are newly set downe, to be in number of the two hundred, and then all the Magistrates are elected. The election ended, the Bourgeses go to feast in their houses, and after dinner, walke forth into the fields: exercising themselves there in leaping, running, throwing the Barre, Stone, and other pastimes. But the Auyger goes againe to the town-house, accompanied with the twenty Electors; and there they elect the councillors, that are to be of the lesser council. On the morrow, they are named to the council of two hundred, and after that their election is approued, they goe and sitte downe in their places. Now in regard that the council of Lucerna doth command no longer time the fixe Moneths onely: the election of the Seigneurs both for the lesse and greater council, is made twice yearly, if there be any vacant places, and that is done about mid-Lune, and mid-December. The new councillors are taken from the lesser council, that governed during the sixe precedent Moneths.

The Auygers or Consuls, who are above the other Seigneurs, are elected by the lesse and greater councils, & by common voyces. The authority of the Auyger at Lucerna, lasteth but a year, and a years at Berne: but yet in such manner, that the voyces are yearly taken for him, and hee againe elected. Next to the Auygers of Berne, the principall men in the common-wealth, are the foure Banderets, chosen out of foure companies of trades-men onely, or men of handy-crafts, to wit, Carpenters, Curryers, or Leather-dressers (who are distributed in three parts) Bakers, and Butchers.

The Towne of Berne is diuided into foure parts, which are committed (each one of them) to these foure Banderets: who view and ouer-see the Armes of all the Bourgeses, and provide for the affairs of warre. They continue in their charge the space of foure yeares: but every yeare on the same day as the Auyger is elected, they resigne their estates, and deliuer in to the hands of the cheefe Vther of the Seigneury, their Ensignes, and all the other marks of their dignity, which are laide on a Table before the Auyger and the council: and then the great and lesser council giues their voyces, concerning the Banderets. If one of them have continued in his charge fully foure yeares, or is preuented by death, another is planted in his place: but yet it is thus conditionally done, that if the dead did not finish his foure yeares, his successeur must accomplish them in the nature of a substitute, and afterward, execute the same charge foure other yeares.

In all the Townes of the Switzers, the dignity of Purse-bearers or Treasurers is great. Some whiles, the time of their charge is not limited at all; but they continue in that estate, so long as please the council, and themselves also. There are two of them at Berne; the one receiveth the reuenues of the Towne, and of the Allemaigne country: the

the other is for the Romane country, because hee receiveth the reuenues which the Seigneury derieth from the countries of Fantz, and of Sauoye. Those men which we haue lately named Auygers, Banderets, and Treasurers, with one councillor of the two hundred, are called at Berne, Die heimlichen Rath, which is as much to say, as the secret or priuy councill. For to them (before all other) matters of most secrecy, of consequence, and which concerne the whole Common-wealth, are reported and trusted.

Concerning
the election
of other public
Officers.

After that the abouenamed Magistrates haue bene elected, and confirmed by the lesse and greater councils; aduice is vfed, concerning other publicke Offices, which is done in some of those Townes the very same day, and on the morrow in others.

As for those estates that haue not any dignity, as Sericants, Executors of iustice, Messengers, Watches, and other such like charges: ordinarily, the lesser council bestowes them of such, as they know meetest for them.

The election
of councillors
at Berne for
council.

The Bernians hold this properly to themselves, as concerning election of their councillors, that they will not receiue any person into the lesser council, if he be not borne within the Towne. In elder times, if the sonnes of councillors were borne out of the Towne, they could not attaine to the fathers dignity. Now adayes, when some councillors are absent, about occasions of the weale-publicke, and for the governing of some Bayliwicke: if they happen to haue any children, they are reputed as borne in the Towne. For the great council, they may be elected that are borne out of Berne: provided that they be Bourgeses, haue houses in the Towne, and are issued of the Switzers country, or of the confederates of the Cantons. For no man is receiued into the councill of the two hundred, if he be borne out of Switzerland: and the same is in practise at Zurich, as we haue already declared. In like manner, bastards, and people of infamous note, are quite excluded from councill.

The ordinary manner of iustice
at Berne.

There are three Courts or Benches of iustice at Berne, all the Iudges whereof, are elected by the Banderets & Treasurers, and are confirmed by the lesser council.

furers, and are confirmed by the lesser council.

The first Court of iustice is called, Das Allrecht. The Auyger presideth there, but the cheefe Vther, whom they call Der gros Vtelhel, doth (almost) daily keepe the place, and hath twelve Assistants, to wit, the last man elected of the foure Banderets, one of the Seigneurs of the lesser council, one and tenn of the great, with one Secretary, and two Officers. They take knowledge of debts, injuries & outrages of slender consequence, as if one man giue another a box on the eare, or giue some words to his disgrace. A man may appeale from their sentence, to the lesser council, and from them, to the sixty men, which is a councill composed of Seigneurs of the lesser council, and of sixe and thirty councillors of the great council. From the sixty, appeale may be made vnto the generall. The Iudges doe assemble euery day to conclude causes, onely Tuesday excepted, which is the Market day.

The first
Court of iustice,

are therein
determined.

The second Court of iustice, iudgeth the appellations of the country of Sauoy: and therefore it is commonly called, the Court for strange Appellations; Das veltich Appellatz gericht. The Purse-bearer or Treasurer of the country, sitteth in iudgement there, & hath ten assistants, to wit, two Seigneurs of the lesser council, and eight of the great, with one Secretary and an Officer. They end all the appeales for the country of Sauoy, and giue audience to parties at all times, and as oft as they desire it. Notwithstanding, their ordinary vse is to meete after the day of S. Martin in Nouember, vntill the Month of December. All they of Sauoy come thither to the appellations, they onely of Laufanna excepted: but at euery two yeares, the Treasurer cometh to Laufanna with some assistants, and there decideth the causes of appeale.

The second
Court is called the Court of appellations,
or appeals.

The third Court or iurisdiction, takes knowledge of matrimoniall causes. It is the Consistory, where there are eight Iudges; two of the lesser councill, who preside or giue sentence there (turne by turne) from two Moneths to two Moneths; two Ministers of the Church; foure of the great councill, and they haue a Secretary or Cleaerke, and an Officer. They assemble three times in the weeke, namely, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, then they consider not only on matrimoniall causes, but also censure such as giue scandales, and put in practise the discipline of the Church. Moreover, these men and the Iudges of the first court of iustice, doe hold in estate but halfe the yeare, and are changed about Easter, and likewise about the end of September.

They of Lucerna haue two courts of iustice, the one they call Das vndergericht, because the Iudges do meete euery weeke, and decide all suites proceeding of debts and contracts. The other is called Das obergericht, the iustice of nine: for nine Iudges take knowledge of iniuries and outrages, and accordingly inflict punishment. There is not any Confraternity at Lucerna, neither at Fribourg, or Sollemure: because they are Catholics, and subiecte to the iurisdiction of Bishops, by whose Officials the causes concerning matrimony are debated.

As for criminall matters capital, there are not any particular Iudges thereto appointed, neither at Berne, nor Lucerna. But when question is made concerning any ones life, the great and smaller councells take knowledge thereof, and iudge it. The Auoyer sit in cheefest authority, and censure on the matters. After sentence is refused on at Berne, the Auoyer goes and sits in a seate of iustice, appointed in some eminent part of the Towne, enuironed with Officers of the Seignery. Then the Clarke or Secretary readeth out aloud the confession of the offender, & the sentence giuen against him. Afterward the Auoyer enioyneth the hangman to execute the sentence, and commandeth the condemned person to be deliuered to him. At Lucerna, the councell do iudge in criminall causes of all the Bayliwicks, and all the Malefactors are punished within the Towne. But in all the Bayliwicks of Berne, there is iustice apart by it selfe, which they call Landgericht, and the other the Iudges of all the Bayliwicks are called, and giue their aduice in presence of the Bayliwicks, who presideth: and yet in such sort, as the councell of Berne may approue, or change the sentence, if they think good.

The Bernians haue many Bayliwicks, & are the most powerfull Seigneurs of the Leagues. In some they speak the Alleman or Germane tongue; in other the Romane or Sauayan. Among the Alleman Bayliwicks, there are foure depending on the Towne, and are euen as Subburbs thereto: whereof the foure Banderets are Bayliwicks, and if they were to go to war, those Bayliwicks march vnder the Ensignes of the foure Banderets. Moreover, there are feuen and twenty other beside, to wit, the vale of Hafell, which hath an Anman, out of the body of the inhabitants, but hee is elected by the councell of Berne, & there rendereth an account of his charge. Vndersee is a Towne so named, because it is at the end of a Lake: it either is an Auoyer sent, but he is of the Towne of Berne. The vale of Simma, both high and low, do call their Bayliffes Schachtlandt, that is to say, Castilians. Feutingen, Sane and Aelen: because they are Catholics, and subiecte to the iurisdiction of Bishops. Luopen and Thun are in the same condition as Vndersee.

Next to these, are Signow, Trachselwald, and the Riuer of the vale of Emme. Brandis, that receiues her Bayliffe from the Lord of the place: but he is numbered among the Bourgeses of Berne. Smuifwald, where the Masters of the Testament Order established a Bayliffe. Burgdorf and Pyrmstic are gouerned all alike, as Vndersee, Landbunt, Arberg, Nidew, Erlach, Biipin, Wange, Arwange, Arbourg, Eiberitain, Schenkenberg, and Lentabourg. Moreover, there are three free Townes in the country of Ergow, vnder the Seignery of Berne, to wit, Zofinge, Arow, and Brug. There are eight Roman Bayliwicks, as namely, Ananches, Modon, Tuerdin, Laufanna, Morges, Nyon, Orbe, Aille and Veunay. Beside, they of Berne and of Fribourg haue foure Bayliwicks in common; as Mort, Schwartzenbourg, Granjon, & Chalosse, whether they send a Bayliffe successively at euery 5. yeares end: so that if the Bayliffe be of Berne, his causes of appeale goe to Fribourg, where the reasons of the Bayliffe are examined. There are Prouosts beside, for the gouernment of Abbeys. The Bernians haue nine in the Alleman country, fixe whereof held iurisdiction, and three in the Romane country.

They of Lucerna haue onely two out of the Towne, as at Wiken, and at Sempach: but hee of Sempach hath no other authority in the place, but only the superintendency of the Lake, and of the Fish.

As for their other Bayliwicks, they are gouerned by some of the Seigneurs of the councell. Those Bayliwicks are Willson, the Vale of Entlibuch, Rotenbourg, Habsbourg, Berone, and the neighbouring cuntry, which they call, Chelampt: Meriswande, that hath this priuilege, to chuse for Bayliffe, one of the Seigneurs of councell in Lucerna, euen whom they list, except the Auoyer: Weggis, Elbon, Horbe and Krientz. Moreover, the two Townes of Sursey and Sempach, are in the protection of the Lucernians: Neuerthelesse, they haue their councell apart by themselves, who iudge in causes both ciuill and criminall. But the Auoyer of Sursey, giueth his oath to them of Lucerna. Hee of Sempach is elected by the councell at Lucerna: but he is in number among the citizens of Sempach.

The law of likenesse or equality, which the Latines termed Lex Talionis, is as yet vied (in some sort) at Lucerna. For if any man kil a citizen of the place, although he did it vpon iust occasion, hauing bene prouoked thereto by the other, and in defence of his owne body: yet if hee be taken, they smite off his head; or if he flye, he is banished for euer. But if he make satisfaction to the children or kindred of the dead, and cause them to giue ouer all pursuit: hee may obtaine leaue of the councell to come againe into the towne.

Among all the Switzers, there is not any but them of Lucerna, that make vse of Brasse Cornets, instead of Trumpets. The crooked Cornets, which they call Parisch-boer, giues a frightfull sound. The Romans also made vse of Cornets in warre: and thereupon, they that sounded or winded those Cornets, were called Cornettes. The men of Lucerna say, that Charlemagne gaue those Cornets to the; because they carried themselves valiantly in a warre which he had against the Sarracins, and that Rowland, a Lord very highly beloued of Charlemagne in those times, serued himselfe with those kindes of Cornets long before.

These forenamed Townes do coine monies, but Berne, Fribourg, and Sollemure, haue one particular kind of coyne: whereof two and forty Sols, and two thirds of a Sol, makes a Florin of Rheine. Moreover, they stampe another more great sort of money, which the Switzers call Bundtschenpfening, and the French a Tescion. These Tescions are minted at Sollemure for the most part; and yet notwithstanding, are counted of lesse value, by a tenth part, then them of France. They of Berne coyned first certaine money, which the Switzers termed Baches: in regard of the figure of a Beare, which was stamped on the one side, for they called a Beare Baer and Baerzen. Afterward, the other Citties and Townes of Switzerland and of Susba, coyned the same money: fixe-teen peeces whereof, valued a Florin of gold. The mony of Lucerna cometh not neere to the value and price of that of Basile, which is more hard and strong: for the Sol of Lucerna valueth but the moiety of that of Basile, and fifty Sols of Lucerna, will make one Florin.

Now we come to speake of Fribourg, which is diuided into foure parts, like vnto Berne: the first is called the Borough, the second, the Island, or the Meadow; the third, the new Towne; and the fourth, the Hospitall. The councellers of the common-wealth are chosen out of these quarters. As in the other Townes, so in this there are two publike councels: to wit, the great councell, consisting of 2. hundred, and the lesser of foure and twenty. The election is made on the Sunday before S. Iohn Baptists day. The lesser councell manageth the affaires of the Towne, deciding the causes of appeales: except of the Bayliwicks of Sauge, conquered in warre. As for the matters which concerne the whole State, and are of maine importance, the councell of two hundred takes knowledge of them. The Auoyer, who presideth both in the lesser & great councels, is elected on S. Iohns day by all the people, and continueth in his charge the space of two yeares.

Next vnto the Auoyer, are the foure Banderets, who are Captaines of seuerall quarters in the city or towne, & although they are not of the ordinary number of Seigneurs of the lesser councell: yet notwithstanding, they assist there in name of all the people, and deliuer their aduice, except in appellations. If some thing be propounded which seemeth to belong to the councell of two hundred; they may ther make their report of it. Furthermore they remaine in authority, three yeares and are chosen by the great & lesse counsels, as many other Officers are. Then followeth the office of the Treasurer, who manageth the monies, and all the reuenues of the Towne: he hath (as his coadiuter) the Secretary or Clearke of the Towne, or his Committees, who register downe all those summes, which the Treasurer receiue, or imployeth. His charge also is, to haue an eye on all the publike buildings. Twice every yeare he renders an account to the lesser council, and remaineth in his charge, the space of three yeares.

Four principal Secretaries in Fribourg.

In Fribourg there are foure principal Secretaries: the first is called Secretary of the Towne; the second, Secretary of the council; the third, Secretary of the country; and the fourth, Secretary of law or iustice. In like manner, the estate of Saulnier, or cheefe Vther, is honourable both in Berne and Fribourg, where it is named, Großwerbets. He is very often neere to the Auget, and when the Seigneurs are set in council, he is at the door, counteth voyces, calleth the parties, and takes care of prisoners. His charge continueth three yeares.

The Courts of law and iustice at Fribourg.

As concerning Law and Iustice at Fribourg, they are established in manner following. First, the Court of Iustice belonging to the Towne, called, Das Statgericht, is a particular assembly of certaine Iudges, to know and decide differences among the Bourgeses. And if there be any criminal proceesse or suite, their charge is to interrogate the prisoners, to present & deliuer the case in question, and then to relate all to the lesser council. The other assembly of Iudges, is termed Das Landgericht, judging the causes of dwellers in the country. In each of these iurisdiccions, there are two Seigneurs of the lesser council, and two of the great, and they meet three times every week. Appeals may be made from their sentence, to the lesser council. Moreover, there are twelue Iudges, chosen out of the great & lesser counsels, for the appellations of the Bayliwicks, conquered in the last warre against the Duke of Sauoye. They meete together once in euery Moneth, and there is no appealing from their sentence.

At Fribourg there are two kindes of Bayliwicks, as in the other Townes: the one of Bayliwicks neigbouring to the Towne, which are gouerned by certaine Seigneurs of the council, who dwell in the Towne, and come dayly to council, and of such Bayliwicks there are fise. The other is, when the Bayliffes are sent to dwell on distinct places with ample authority: and they of Fribourg haue fourteen such Bayliwicks, and foure in common with the Bernians. The Bayliffes are elected by the great and lesse counsels, the morrow after S. John Baptists day, and hold in office the space of fise yeares: but every yeare they render an account of their charge, before the lesse council. They enstruck also, and deale in criminall suites: but then they fend to the lesse council with their sentence, which the council hath power to approue, change, or moderate.

That which at Fribourg is called Trostungen, and in the vulgar, Leistung, is carefully maintained at Fribourg, by these words is vnderstood a remife or charge for certaine time, and the charges to be on his owne head; when the debter doth not pay his debt, at or on the day of assignement, as in this manner. When the debter maketh not satisfaction, on the day appointed for repayment, the creditor sendeth one, two, three, or more seruants (on horse-backe) to an Inne or Hostery, whose expences there the debter is constrained to pay (tarry they there neuer so long) vntill hee hath made satisfaction to the creditor. Some say, that the Duke of Zeringen established this Law. Such as infringe or breake it, are punished by imprisonment, banishment, or by the puffle. And there is a certaine Iudge, who they call Bourgmasser, that holdeth a strid hand in this case. Moreover, if addition or suite is moued, and a man demand the Trostung three times, if it is not grated to the demander, it is present banishment. Such as breake the peace, where in they are enioyned to liue one with another, are banished likewise; and they that (without iust cause) will meddle, or take part on eyther side, when a cause is in pleading.

Finally, the Fribourgers make feasting yearly, with solemne procession of all estates through the Towne, on the second day of March, and on the eight and twentieth day of Iune, which are dayes of bat-

CHAP. VII.

Of the Commonwealth of those Cantons that haue neither Cities nor Towns, but dwell only in Villages.

Hitherto we haue discoursed on two formes of Common-wealths, conuerued in the Cantons of Switzerland, that haue Cities and Townes. There remaineth now a third, which is of those Cantons that haue no Townes, but make their abode in Villages, and for that cause are called, Die Lander. There are fise of them, to wit, Fri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzell. Zug indeede is a towne, & hath her Officers in the towne, but the souerainty of the Canton appertaineth to them that dwell in the lands of the Canton, with them of the towne, and are Lords as well the one as other. In all these Cantons, the cheefe of the publike council, is termed Amman, which signifieth a man in office and authority, and that name is attributed to all publike Officers. So that Abbots, and other Ecclesiastical persons, do call their Iudges, Receiuers, and other such like Officers, Amman.

As the Townes are diuided or parted, by Companies and Colleges of Artzans, or Tradelmen; so the Cantons are distributed into certaine parts and portions.

CHAP. VIII.

Of all the fise Cantons forenamed, which in this ensuing Chapter we will handle together, according to their severall rights & iurisdiccions.

THE whole country of Fri is diuided into ten parts, which by them are called Gnosaminen, as if a man would say, Participations. It may be in this respect, because they are all partakers in pasturages, goods, honours, and publike charges, and that from those ten parts onely, they are summoned and called, to be present at those assemblies which are yearly made.

The Country of Suits is diuided into fise parts, which they call quarters. Because the country (hetheretofore) was distributed into foure portions: but the people coming to encrease greatly, they made a new partage into fise portions, which neuertheless do retaine the ancient name.

As for the Country of Vnderwald, there is a Forest that diuideth it in the middle: and therefore the diuision is thus made to them that dwell aboue and beneath the Forest. The whole Country taketh name of that part which is beneath the Forest: for Vnderwalden is as much to say, as beneath or vnder the wood. In elder times, Stans, a principall Village beneath the Forest, and neere to the Lake, was the prime and cheefe place of the country, and the people were called, inhabitants of the Valley of Stans. But now adayes, because the word Vnderwald is taken for the whole country, the Switzers haue added these words, aboue and beneath the wood, Vnderwalden ob vnd nider dem keenwald.

Now as concerning them of Zug, we haue said already, that they are diuided in two parts; the one is the Towne it selfe, the other the Villages round about, comprehended vnder three assemblies, to wit, the Mountain, the Vale Egeria, and Bars, a Parish very neere to the Towne.

Glaris is diuided into fiftene parts, which they terme Cagwan. The word signifieth the work of a day, and as much distance or spaciousness of ground, as a man can plow in a day. It may be, that these parts were called Iournals, or daylabours: because euery one prepareth & ordereth the way in his quarter, and each one knoweth where he is to labour.

The country of Appenzell is parted into twelue orders or portions, which they call Raden, whereof those fise conioyned to the Village of Appenzell, they name them the orders within, and anesimely were subiects to the Abbot of S. Gall. The other fise are called the orders without: to wit; out of the Abbots Seignoury, Election of the council.	Seignury; heerefore partly free, and partly in the iurisdiction of Gentlemen. Out of these parts (by equal number) are chosen certaine men, for the council of the Canton: in many of them there are threecore councillors, beside such as (having bene in office) continue perpetual councillors. At Zug there are five and forty councillors, nine of each assembly, for the Towne is counted for two.	Vri meete at Betzelsinge , distant halfe a dayes journey from Altorf , the cheefest Village of that Canton. The people of Glaris meete at Suanda . The ordinary and annuall assemblies of these Cantons, is made every year about the beginning of May. They of Suiz , of Vnderwald vnder the wood, of Glaris and of Appenzell , do meete the last Sunday of Aprill. They of Vri and of Zug , the first Sunday of May. In elder times, they of Zug held their generall council the 24. day of Iune, being S. Iohn Baptists day. They of Vnderwald about the wood, meete the first day of May.

The generall council of Appenzell.	The council generall of Appenzell , consisteth of an hundred forty foure, to wit, twelve of each order. And if matters of importance are to be treated on, and it appeareth needfull to assemble the council of all the people: then they will double or treble the council in this manner. Each of the councillors takes a man or two with him, if they be to hold a council of three times as many persons, as ordinarily they vie to do: and one of the councillors, on Sunday, in the Church after Service is done, hath a custome to signifie, that on such a day as he nameth, all the councillors are to meete in the Towne-house of the Canton, and each man is to bring with him such a one, as he holdeth to bee an honest and wise man, who shall also bee there bound to obedience, vnder the oath whereby all are obliged to the common-wealth. Beside, no man is elected to be a councillor, neither can he assist in the generall council, if he be not borne in the country. Ein Landman : And it is much more easie to obtaine the degree of Bourgeshippe, in the Townes of the Suiz , then in these Villages. But rather by a certaine order of aduised iudgement, and according to the custome of their predecessors: being neuer willing to mingle new comers among olde inhabitants of the country, both to preuent charges, and to preserve the common-wealth (the more easly) in one and the same estate and condition. The Switzers louing and kinde to strangers: louing among them.	The council generall of Appenzell , consisteth of an hundred forty foure, to wit, twelve of each order. The election of the Lieutenant.
The council generall of all the people, & their appointed places of meeting.	The fouraignty in these five Cantons, belongeth to the assembly of all the people. All they of the country, from the age of fourteene, or sixteene, or yppwards, do meete eyther at the principall Village of the Canton, or else at some other place in the midst of the country. As they of	Secretaries & Bayliffes.

Finally, if at some other times of the yeare, there happen affaires that concerne the estate of the common-wealth, an extraordinary council is held. As if need require, to send Ambassadors to the dayes at Bada , or to some other Kings and Princes; or if there be question of making alliances, be they eyther for peace or warre, &c.	a double key for the whole country: this partition caused each of the sides to take one key onely, and they that were above the wood, retained still their olde Stands , white and redde, because they were the greater part of the Canton. Then they vnder of beneath the wood, received from Popes another Ensigne, which had two keys in it: for in regard that Stands (long before) had bene the principall Village of the Canton, they therefore kept still the Ensigne, which in those times they had at Stands .	But one council and side: stands: white and redde.
An extraordinary council holden.	Beside the lesser council and the generall, composed of all the people; some of the cantons haue a council more strict and priuate, and courtes of iustice for diffinition of suites. In the Canton of Suiz , which is diuided in sixe parts, the principall councillor of each part is taken: and these sixe, with the Amman , make the council of feuen, called secret. These feuen do manage and order all the reuenues of the country, and furnish all that is laid out for publike expences. Moreover, there are two Courts of iustice, the one being called the order of nine, in regard of the number of Iudges, and there the Amman sits as President. In this Court are decided the causes of greatest importance: as of inheritances, outrages, and terrible injuries, hard to be endured.	The Towne of Zug , beside the council generall of the whole country, hath a council apart, order of iustice, Magistrates, a Lieutenant to the Amman , Treasurer, Voyer, &c. who iudge the causes of the Bourgessees, and manage all the publike affaires.	The Popes gave them another Ensigne.
Council more secret and priuate.	The Court of feuen, (so is the other order of iustice called) where the Lieutenant to the Amman sits as President: and those feuen are Iudges in causes concerning contracts, debts, and such like. They of Vri haue (almost) the same government: for there the Court of feuen, with the Lieutenant to the Amman , doe censure and iudge of debts, which exceede not the sum of threecore pounds. There is another iudicial Court of fiftene, where the Amman sits as President, and concludeth causes ciuill of greatest consequence. At Glaris there are two Courts of iustice, one of nine, the other of five Iudges, which the council generall of the Canton do elect euery yeare. They decide law-sutes in the Moneths of May, and of December onely. The nine take knowledge of differences concerning inheritances, and dangerous injuries. The five do censure suites of debts and payments, after that the nine (who keepe Court the space of sixe dayes) haue ended.	Two Courts of iustice at Glaris, and other seuerall authorities.

They of Appenzell haue two courts of iustice also, the first is kept in a public place of the streete; in regard whereof, they call it Das gassen-gricht . Therein are foure and twenty Iudges, two of each order of the canton, and their President is the Vther of the canton, Der Land-tweibel , and they meete together weekly euery Thursday: they condemne men in fines, and chastise such as wrong one another. The other court is called Das gethwoen-gricht , iustice of oath: because twelue Iudges sitte there, and take knowledge of differences, which are ended, by giuing oath to one of the parties. Moreover, from each order of the canton, a councillor is chosen, & many from the orders that are greater. These men make obseruation of such as breake public ordinances, and deliberate on matters which are to bee propounded to the council generall. In which respect, they are as Guardians of the lawes, and tearmed cheefest councillors: their charge is perpetuall, and they are called in this canton,	The Courts of iustice at Appenzell.

Of the catho- like Cantons.	ton Landthelick. Suits, Pri, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzel, are Catholicke, and vnder the Diocesse of Constance. And if there happen any difference concerning mariages, they goeto the Officialtie of the sayde place, but they of the other opinion goe to Zurich.	four Bayliwickes, to wit, the Marche, the Hermitage, Cusnach, and certaine small Villages or great Farmes, neer to the lake of Zurich: but the two former haue obtained municipall right, and doe elect a councell and triall of suites in their owne bodye. Notwithstanding, euery yeare, when a councell generall is held at Switz, ordinarily they send their Ambassadors thether, and require, that they may haue leaue to elect their Magistrates; which is granted them, as in verie great fauour, with this exception, that they are to bee modest and obedient, for otherwise it remaineth in the peoples power of Switz, to send a Gouernour thether, whensoever they thinke meet.
Punishment for adultery.	As for aduheries, they are chastised in each Canton: some, by confiscation of goods; others (sometime by the fine of ten Dallers. I haue heard likewise, that (diuers times) the councell generall of the whole Canton, doeth decide some differences concerning mariages.	Cusnach hath the same condition, but because, within some few yeares certaine strangers (customers for carriage of salt and other things that way) made their complaint, that they of Cusnach did them wrong, and vied them harshlie vpon no occasion: the men of Switz knowing the accusation to bee true, sent a Bayliffe thether againe, and appointed new ordinations for Cusnach. Besides, they haue two Bayliwickes in common with them of Glaris, to wit, Vnzac, which is a Towne, and Gallall. Thether they send Bayliffes, turne by turne. And alwaies there is one of Switz in one of the Bayliwickes, and one of Glaris in the other.
Iustice in cri- minall causes.	Iustice in causes criminall, is administred (almost in all the Cantons) by the publike councell, and oftentimes doubled or multiplied by the ordinary councellers; the Amman sitting President, or his Lieutenant. At Zug, in criminal matters, other assistants are ioyned with the councell or Iudges, chosen out of each diuision or assembly of the Canton. Suites of Law are discusst in an open publike place, where all may heare that which is said, and know the merite of the sentence giuen by the Iudges.	What priu- ledges belong to Cusnach, but held through their owne despatch
The order & disposition of the Bayli- wickes in these Cantons.	Now to speake of the Bayliwickes or Gouernements appertaining vnto these Cantons, they are carried and disposed in manner following. They of Pri send a Bayliffe into the valley of Liuner beyond the Mountaines: who hath one of the same valley for his Lieutenant and Assistants also; with whom he iudgeth causes both ciuill and criminall, and continueth in his charge the space of three yeeres. Beyond the same Mountaines, they send Bayliffes also to Bellizona, and to two other places. They of Bellizona haue three Bayliwickes, to wit, Bellizona, the Vale Brune, and Riuiera, where the three Cantons doe command in such manner, that each of them hath alwaies a Bayliwicke. Moreover, the inhabitants of Mount S. Godardo, are subiectes to the Canton of Pri, neuertheless they haue their Councell and their Amman, who are confirmed by them of Pri, & when there are criminal suites, two of the councell of Pri do meet there. Moreover, that all keepe silence while the Sermon is done, and to carrie themselves (that day) so modestly in their refection, that no disorder may be noted, because the Seigneury will chastise them severely that do otherwise, and because the whole Canton of Glaris doth solemnly feast that day. this folemne Proceffion, and to thanke & fing praifes to almighty God, the Virgin Marie, and their Patrones, S. Fridolin, and S. Hilary.

First, one beareth a red Standard, wherein is the Image of S. Fridolin, then follow 4 men, bearing a gilded Toomb, whereon are many faire and holy reliques enchafted. Then come the Croffe-bearers, carrying the Croffes of Glaris, Haures, of the Vale of Linthe, and of the churches neighboring to the Canton of Glaris, as of Schenniff, Wefen, and others. The Croffes are followed with Banners of all the Churches, and the Priests come after them, finging according to their order. The Curate of Glaris is the first, accosted by an Abbot, or else some other man of the Church. Among the strangers the other Priests follow. Then the councell of Glaris, to witte, the Amman, with the Ambassadour of Swiss, then the Lieutenant to the Amman, and the other Officers in their order, each guiding or leading one of the most honourable strangers. The women (in great number) follow, to make up the end and conclusion of the Proceffion.

Being come to the place where the battail was fought, there are eleuen stones set down in thofe feveral parts of ground where they began and held on fight with the enemy: for they had partings & meetings againe at hand-blows, eleuen feuerall times, and at each of thofe stones the Standards and Banners stay, and all fall vpon their knees in prayer to God. Vñ he they are come to the fixt stone, they caft themselves round in a ring, and then the Secretarie of the Canton readeth in a paper, the cause and originall of this Proceffion, the summary whereof is this. War being moued betwene Leopold, Duke of Austria, and them of Zurich, Berne, Sollemre, Lucerna, Vri, Swiss, Ynderwald, Zug, and Glaris; Leopold led his Army to Sempach, where hee was ouercome, and slaine by the Swissers, the ninth day of Iune, one thousand, three hundred, fourescore and fix, beside fixteene Earles and Barons, and a great number of Gentlemen.

Afterward, in mid-August following, they of Zurich, Vri, Swiss, and Glaris, befieged and tooke the towne of Wefen, & the inhabitants promised perpetual fidelity to the Swissers. Truce was made, till the beginning of Lent in the yeare following; which being ended, and war beginning againe, they of Glaris sent a Garrison to Wefen, where the Souldiers thinking themselves to be in safety, and confiding on the oath of the townesmen, were slaine (for the most part) in a night by them of Austria, who entred in the dead of night, by intelligence which they had with certaine of the inhabitants, that machinated this villany against the garrison, and opened the gates to their enemies.

Furthermore, that the very same yeare, and the ninth day of Aprill, they of Austria brought an Army of fifteene thousand men towards Haures, and wonne the Fortresse of the Country. But three hundred and fifty Souldiers of Glaris, & thirty which the Canton of Swiss lent to assist them, assayed the enemy, and (God helps furthering, the Virgin Marie, and their Patrones, S. Fridolin and S. Hilary) they became conquerors, wonne eleuen of their cheefest Ensignes, and left two thousand five hundred enemies slaine in the field, beside them that were drowned in the Lake, and among the rest, many of Wefen were there slaine, that formerly had betrayed the Garrison of Glaris. And therefore, in dutifull thankfulness to God almighty, the glorious Virgin Mary, and S. Fridolin, and S. Hilary their Patrones, and to all the Saints and Saintesses of Paradise, & in euertlasting remembrance of so great a helpe and deliuerance, this annuall Proceffion was ordained vpon thofe limits, where their Ancestours had suffered many inconueniences.

After the reading of these feuerall letters, a Sermon is made in the same place; the Priests of Glaris performe their Annuary, and followeth the Minister of the new opinion. All their prayers being ended, they go againe to the same stones, in the same ranke and ceremony as they began, vntill they come to the eleuenth, which is placed neere to the Village of Haures, towards Wefen, where they assayed the enemy at the last time. Then they take their way to the Church of Haures; but they of the new opinion return home to their houses. The rest go to the church, where they sing a Masse for the Swissers that were slaine in the battail: and one reciteth all the names of them of Glaris, that perished there. Soone after this, a banquet banquet is made (at the Cantons expences) for the Priests, and all the strangers that came in the Proceffion. After dinner, the Priests sing, bring backe againe to Glaris the gilded Toombe, the Banners and Croffes.

This is the manner of the annuall Proceffion and Feast of them of Glaris, in remembrance of so famous and remarkable victory. The other Cantons also haue their Feasts, to celebrate the victories obtained at Morgarten, Sempach, and elsewhere.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Common-wealths belonging to the Confederates. And first of all, Of the Abbey of S. Gall.

AFTER we haue spoken of the thirteene Cantons, and of their feuerall Common-wealths; me-thinks now (according to the same order) wee should make mention of their Confederates, among whom, the Abbot and Abbey of S. Gall holdeth the prime place. The Abbots of S. Gall, haue bin great Lords for the space of many ages possessed of great meanes, and numbred with the Princes of the Empire: but I know not well, from what Emperour they receiued this honour and title. Stumpfius noteth, that Conrad de Pfaweris, Annalist of Switzerland writeth, that Abbot Huldrich, of the house of Alsace, was made Prince by the Emperour Phillip, in the city of Basile. Now albeir these Abbots are not of such power as heretofore; yet notwithstanding, they continue still great Lords, and haue their dominion in large extendure.

In the country of Turgow they are Lords of Wile, and haue a Pallace and a Vicar in the Towne. Moreover, in the high country of Turgow, they haue a great Territory, and well peopled, who are all subiect to them. The inhabitants are called Die Gottshulsi, the Subiects of the house of God, or of the Abbey, and are parties in certaine Regions. Their names are Rosch, Thumbech, Gold, Ynderreg, Morfwill, Tablate, Gosow, Wald- kilch, Romforn, Sammeri, Adle, Hofschwill, Bernattzell, Lumfwill, Berg, Wittenbach, Rodtmont, Strubenzell, Geiserwald, Helbach, Bergkuecht, Luzwill, Zuberwangen, Vad Wiger. These places are diuided into Castle-wicks or President-ships; and the Abbot sendeth Prouosts thither. Moreover, he hath his *Amman*s and Officers, that hold meane Courts of Iustice in many places. Beside, he hath a higher Court of iustice, whether resort all appellations, and where causes of importance are decided. All kinds of duties, and such as are rendered to Princes, in these places are confirmed vpon him.

Beside this country, the county of Toggenbourg acknowledgeth (as Lord) the Abbot of S. Gall, who sendeth a Gouernour into the country, and a Iudge in criminall causes, which admitteth no further appeale. And yet they of Toggenbourg are Bourgeses of Swiss, and of Glaris, & haue their priuiledges & franchises, by meanes whereof (among other things) they enjoy the freedome of Religion. Also in the Bayliwick of Rhinthal, which belongeth to the cantons: the Abbot holdeth law courts of iustice in many Villages, & keepeth Officers there for that purpose.

CHAP. X.

Of the Common-wealths in the Towne or Citiest of S. Gall.

Saint Gall, Mulhouse, and Rotuille, are numbred among the Imperiall townes, and therefore haue (almost) the same manner of gouernement, as we haue already described vnto you. But because the citizens of S. Gall, do hold something in particular; I will here set downe a summary description of their common-wealth.

In the first place then, the Towne of S. Gall is diuided into fixe Tribes or Companies, & the Society of Noblemen. The first & principal of these Tribes, is of weavers, because of the linnen cloth there wouen, which is made very faire, and in a bounding quantity: which afterward is sold in Germany, France, Italy, Spain, Polonia, and Poland, greatly enriching the inhabitants that dwell in S. Gall, and making king the Towne much renowned. It hath two counells, according to other towns, to wit, the great and the lesse. The lesse is composed of foure and twenty, and namely first of all, twelve Zunftmesters. Each Tribe, Colledge, or Company, hath three Masters, which gouerne the company a yeare, turne by turne: but there are no more then two, which enter into the lesser counsell; the first is of the new, the second of the olde. The thirteenth Zunftmaster, is the first of the elueen, which are elected out of each Tribe, to be of the great counsell.

The Zunftmesters are elected by secret voyce in their Tribes, and are confirmed by the lesser counsell. Every yeare, the counsell and officers of iustice, are elected about mid-Iune, and mid-December. Beside the Zunftmesters, nine other Senators do assist in the lesser counsell, and are chosen as well in the company of Noblemen, as in the other companies. The three Consuls (with them) make the number of foure and twenty counsellors: For there are three Consuls in S. Gall, the first is in charge; the second is called olde Consul, for having gouerned in the very neereft yeare before; and the third predesth in iudgement for criminall causes, and in other places he is called, Prouost of the Empire, Reychvogt. The counsell is elected the first Sunday of Aduent, not in the lesser counsell, but in the generall, by secret voyce, Mit derraum: the Sub-consull and the Zunftmesters, going then out of office, do collect the voyces.

The great counsell is composed of threescore and fixe, to wit, twelve of each company: whereby there are ninety persons in the great and lesser counsells. After the election of the Consuls and the counsell, the ordinances of the Towne are read in this assembly: whereon the Consull and the new counsell do deliberate. Then they go (by two and two together) to the great Temple or Church, named S. Lawrence, where all the citizens meete, and after reading of the lawes and ordinances, the Consull sweareth first to obserue them, and afterward, receiue of the counsell and whole assembly, the same oath. This done, the morrow after christmas day, and the day following, the Zunftmesters, and the other elueen Seigneurs of the lesser counsell, do meete together in the Towne-house, and elect the Sub-consull, whom they call Vnderburgermeister. His charge is to take order for the watch of the Towne, and to appoint Tutors and Querfeers for Widdowes & Orphanes, and also to examine their accounts.

Every weeke, the lesser counsell do ordinarily meete together twice, on Tuesday and Thursday; except those dayes be Festiuals, or haue Fayres. Also the Thursday before Lent, which they call the mad Thursday, Den Unsinigen donstag: because once, and on that day, the people mutined against the counsell, by means whereof, it was ordained, that (tho thence forward) there should be no more assemblies held, as on y day. The lesser counsell manageth the Townes affaires, decideth ciuill causes, and giueth sentence concerning inheritances and wills: but medleth with no criminall suites, nor differences about Seecules, Obligations and iniuries.

The great counsell meeteth together five times euery yeare. First, the morrow after christmas day, when they elect and confirme the new Magistrates. Secondly, in mid-Lent, to elect and confirme the Master of the Hospitall. Thirdly, the Friday before S. Bartholomewes day, being the foure and twentieth day of August, whē they establish the Masters of Halles, and consider on the tolles and taxes at the Gates. Fourthly, and fiftly, before the Fayres which they keepe, on the morrow after Ascension day, and the day of S. Gall; and then they consult on the conseruation, and course of Courts for the Fayre.

The great counsell also doth sometimes extraordinarily meete when they are to discusse on matters, whereof the counsell ought to haue knowledge, as concerning sentences in criminall suites. Then the Prouost of the Empire sitteth President, and demandeth each case: this is done in the Towne-house, and the doores kept close. The lesser counsell electeth the Prouost, and giueth him power to iudge. Afterward, the great counsell decideth the appellations made vnto him, and receiue such strangers as desire to be Bourgeses.

But this is done more often, in the ordinary assemblies of the great counsell, and

and then also they conclude there on many appeales. Sometimes the lesser counsell fendeth affaires of importance to the great counsell, to bee considered on.

The three meetings of the Counsell generally of all the people, and their appointed times.

Euery yeare, the counsell generally of all the people, is assembled three times, about publick affaires. First, to elect the Consull. Secondly, the morrow after Christmas day, to take oath of the new Consull, and to binde him to obey the Magistrates. And thirdly, in the Moneth of August, about S. Bartholomewes day, after that the ordinance for tolles and taxes is agreed vpon, to heare the Lecture, which is made before all. Moreouer, the lawes and statutes of the Towne are distributed into three parts; one part whereof is deliuered to the people, in each of these three assemblies.

The cheefest Court of iustice, that of fine, who are the Consull, the Sub-Consull or Lieutenant, one of the new Zunftmesters, and two of the new counsell.

The principall and cheefest Court of iustice, is that of fine, who are the Consull, the Sub-Consull or Lieutenant, one of the new Zunftmesters, and two of the new counsell. They iudge in differences concerning borrowed monies, things laid to pawns, debts that haue no certaine time prefixed, wages that are due, suites concerning victuals, iniuries, and fines. They sit on the Wednesday, or Friday, and there is no appeale from their sentence; neuertheless, they may send backe difficult causes, and of importance, to the lesser counsell.

The Court of iustice, called the Towne or City Court, and what Officers belong thereto.

Next to this, there is the Towne court of iustice, Das Statgericht, composed of twelve Assistants, chosen out of the Noble mens companie, and out of the other companies; so that the one is of Zunftmesters, and the other of the people. The cheefe Officer of this court is called Statamman, Maior of the city, and is elected with the other Magistrates, about Christmas day, and is confirmed by the great counsell. As for the Assistants, they are changed twice euery yeare, and elected by the great counsell, on one of the feast dayes of Christmas, & by the lesser counsell, about S. John Baptists day, in the Moneth of Iune. These Iudges take knowledge of debts, barrings, and yearly rents, although the summes bee great. They are called together by tolling the Bell, and assemble in the Towne-house on Monday in euery weeke, except it bee a Feast day, or that all the counsell doe meete together, for then they referre those causes till Wednesday. A man may appeale from their sentence, to the lesser counsell, provided, that the suite be of no lesse moment then an hundred Sols, or Shillings: and if the appellant loseth his cause, he is condemned in a fine to the Iudges.

The consistory court is composed of eight Iudges, whereof foure are Ministers of the Church, or some other men of learning: next, two counsellors of the lesser counsell, and two of the great. There sitteth another Seigneur of the lesser counsell, as President, who questioneth the causes: and if there be as many voices on the one side, as on the other, hee redubeth both parties to such a course, as hee conceiue to be iust, and then sentence is giuen accordingly. The consistory censureth matters of marriage, and of diuorces, and no appealing is permitted from sentence. But if there happen any inuolued or entangled variance, or if some colour of pollicy be mixed with the case of marriage; then cause and all, is sent to the counsell, where the deciding is suspended, vntill the counsell, and some of their learned men, haue aduisedly considered thereon.

As for publick Offices, estates, and charges, this common-wealth is therein gouerned, as the other are; hauing Treasurers, Masters of Halles, Receiueurs, and Administrators at the Gates, for customs, tolles, and taxations, Vogers, &c. Such as hold these places, doe render their accounts, first to the Zunftmesters, next to the lesser, and lastly to the great counsell, on the morrow after christmas day. Having giuen vp their accounts, the lesse and great counsell do elect new officers, or reconfirm the olde: and it is openly read, what the charge is of each one of them in particular, and afterward, in presence of the counsell, they sweare to discharge their duty faithfully. But when many are established in one and the same charge, then such rules as they are to follow, are giuen them in writing.

And because the very greatest trading of S. Gall, consisteth in linnen cloth, and that not only the people of the towne, but then also in most part of the Villages round about, doe maintaine their liues thereby, the counsell is diligent and carefull, for well ordering all things in that respect, and for the auoyding of fraud and deceit. First, therefore, so soone as the weauer hath finished a peece of cloth, there are three expert sworne Vissers or Ouerseers, that come to looke vpon it, and according as it is good, or indifferent, they set on such and such marks. If it appeare to be bad and naught, they send it to the Zunftmaster of the weauers, and to the other eleuen Zunftmasters; who condemne the workman in a fine, or cut the whole peece into some portions, of eight Elles in length each one, or else through the midst, or if it be worth nothing, they burne it openly. This view and visitation is done daily, and there is a Market of linnen cloth, which hath certaine Lawes, for the obseruation whereof, they that deale in such Merchandize are strictly bound.

After that the cloth hath bene seene and approoued; the sworne Measurers do both Ell it, and make it. The Measurers haue some other sworne men of the Mystery, to be their adiuncts; and the Merchants haue with them the Ouer-seers of the measuring. They call them Dm ruff, measurers of linnen cloth, which are of diuers lengths: but a whole peece consisteth of 134 Elles, and may not be of any greater length. There is another view made at the whistlers, where the cloth is thickened and whited. These Viewers are called Die wipfen Schowter. They looke that the clothes haue their requisite whitenesse, and whether they sustaine any harme in the thickning: and according as they finde, they marke, or condemne the whistler in a fine. Likewise there are certaine Merchants and Weauers, that visite the whistlers houses and grounds, to see if all things bee sitting and conuenient there: whether they haue sufficiency of wood and ashes, that none may be wronged by delay. Every yeare the Masters whistlers take newly their oaths, to doe their duties as becommeth them.

As for the clothes which the Viewers (whom they vsually rearme Blau und Schwartz gschowter) thinke fit to send to the Diats: the cutters of linnen cloth, named Lynboathschnyder, do cut them iust in the midst, and there are other committees, to regard that they haue their iust measure. After they are dyed into colours blew or blacke, if the Ouerseers finde the dying to bee well taken, they marke the peece, and when they haue plained and smoothed it with a Rowler; others come to approue it valuable, and they set on the Seale. Contrariwise, if it be spoyled and viciate in the dying: they cut it, or dip it againe, if it may bee done, and the Plainers and Diars are condemned in some fine. All these things aboue named, are very carefully obserued, and if any dare do otherwise, hee is severely punished. For the Towne or City of S. Gall hath this priuiledge, to condemne in criminall suite, to fetch men out of places of refuge, and to punish them that vse any fraud, in weauing, marking, sealing, dying, plaining, or misusing any Linnen clothes.

Something likewise must needs bee said, what order they of S. Gall take, to auoid the inconueniences of fire: because they hauing bene heerebefore much endangered thereby, it hath made them (enuiouing) to be the more prouident. Every euening, for the space of a quarter of an houre, there is a Bell rung, and it is called Die feurglocken, the Fire-Bell: which admonisheth every one, to looke to the hearths of their Chimnies, for feare lest fire shold take in any part. Then are there two Zunftmasters, that four times yearly do visite the hearths, furnaces, & chimnies in all the houses; and thereupon are called Die feurgschowter, Vissers for fire. They regard also, what Armes and prouision of foode the Bourgeses haue: and whether they be provided and furnished, according to the ordinances of the Seigneury.

Beside, if there rise any impetuous windes, or any rough stormes or tempests happen (beside the ordinary Captaines of the watch, whom they call Die Wacht-bietter) there are two other, named Masters of the watch, Die wachtmaster, who take with them two men of every Tribe, well appointed, and goe with the Captaines of the watch, to walke the round through all the streetes of the City, to prevent the dangerous accidents of fire.

Every night, two and thirty men keepe watch on the Towers and VValles, and in other places of the City, being appointed as Sentinels, by the cheefe Zunftmaster, with the Captaines of the watch.

Concerning the Grisons in elder time.

If fire take in any part, some of the Cittizens runne to the Gates, some on the Towers and VValles, some into the cheefe freetees; some keepe company with the Confull, and others labour to quench the fire. There are foure Captaines of the lesser councell, that haue a care of all this businesse, commanding every one to that which is to be done, and punishing greuously the disobedient. If the fire be without, and neere the city, they send forth a certaine number of men with their Captaines, to prouide against the inconuenience. Others keepe watch at the Portes, upon the VValles, and in other places, where they are by them appointed.

I spare to speake heere of Schooles, Almshouses, and Hospitals, because they of S. Gall gouerne themselves therein, as other well pollicied citties do, and carry a faire and comely order among them. Likewise, I will not speake of the election of the Ministers of the Church, nor of their establishing and charge, neither what order they hold in their assemblies: because in this worke, we treat on the matters of pollicy onely, referring to discourse on the other, at some apert time and place.

CHAP. XI.

The Common-wealth of the Grisons.

HE name and dominion of the Grisons heerebefore was of great extendure: but now wee vnderstande by that word, a people of the Alps, who the French and Italians haue named Grisons, and the Switzers Gratopunder. In ancient times, they inhabited Rhats in the Alpes, neere to the source or head of Rheine, and of tau.

The Grisons are diuided into three Leagues. The first is called the League

Grise, and hath ten Comminalties, to wit, the Abbey of Disentis, which the ancient Cardes or Mappes called Disertine. To this Abbey are ioyned Tauech, Trumb, and some other places. 2. Waltersbourg, 3. Oberfachs, 4. Luzinis, 5. Fals, 6. Yuntz, 7. Scharwiff, 8. They of Laas, Sins, and them enuiouring about the wood. 9. Thannen. The Grisons call these nine Communities; the part about the wood, Die obderwald; and the other ten, they call, vnder the wood, 10. Fims, 11. Trimun, 12. Safen, 13. Ratzuns, the ancient abiding of the noble Family of the Barons of Ratzuns, 14. Heintzenberg, and Taufis, 15. Schopine, 16. Schamps, 17. Spugen, 18. Mafax, 19. Rifflee.

In each of these Comminalties, they yearely elect a soueraigne Magistrate, which many of them do call Amman, who with the Iudges or Assistants, elected by the same comminality, doth iudge suites in law, and condemneth delinquents, according to the exigence of the case. Beside these Amman, there is a great Procuost of the whole League, whom they call Der Landrichter, who is chosen by every one in the generall assembly of all the comminalties, and direct President in the dayes meetings for all the League.

These meeting dayes for this Grise League, is in the Village of Trumb, which is the cheefe comminality, and there also meet the Seigneurs of the Iusticial court, wherein the Landrichter direct President, who hath fiftene Assistants, one Clarke or Secretary, and one Officer. The Lord of the Castle, and of the Barony of Ratzuns, is yet about the Landrichter, by an ancient prerogative, belonging to the race of the Barons of Ratzuns, in whose rights, the Lords of the places haue euermore succeeded.

The second League is called Der Gottthusbundt, The League of Gods Household, or of the Cade or League Cathedral, because of the Bishopricke and Colledge of Coire: and it hath one and twenty Comminalties, which sometimes were reduced into eleuen much greater. The Towne or City of Coire is numbered in the first place, as the cheefe of the League: and alone (among the eleuen Comminalties) is compounded of two lesser. But as the citizens admirable physick, to preferue him from being drunke, albeit he daily drank more wine then any other one man of his time: for he could out-drinke all comers, yet neuer be drunke, or bereft of his iudgement. But in the ende it was knowne, that (visually) before hee entred drinking, he would eate suet or fixe bitter almonds, whose power and naturall property was such, as it impeached the wine from alienating his spirits. And experience thereof was afterward made, for when they abridged him from the meanes of eating bitter Almonds, and he vsing to drinke as formerly he did, he became as soon drunk as any other man. That these Almonds have this peculiar property, Pliny affirmed it, adding further; that eating a Rad-dith roote before hard drinking, avoideth drunkennesse. He saith also, that Cole-wortes eaten before hand, keepeth a man from being distempered with wine: and being eaten after drunkennesse, they remove instantly the distemperature, as Saffron also hath the selfe-same power. There are many other remedies for this imperfection, wherein I will be silent; speaking onely of one, recited by Pliny. He saith, that taking a quantity of wine, mingled with the egges of a Chough, and being drunke two or three mornings together, he that drinketh it, will hate wine in such sort, as he will neuer after drinke thereof. Heereto he addeth, that a Swallow being taken and burned to ashes, then beaten into powder and mingled with a little Myrthe in the wine; whoeuer recey-ueth a draught of this potion, shall neuer be drunke, for this was experimented by Horus, King of Assyria.

Aristotle, in the third part of his Problems, and Auicenne, in his sixth Booke of Beasts, do yeld a reason, why in drunkenness, when a man looketh vpon any one thing, it appears to him as if it were two, and albeit they doe both produce diuers reasons, yet will I alledge but one from each of them. The first shall be Aristoteles, who saith, that thorow excessive heat of vapours in the wine, ascending vp into the braine; the little nerues, called Optic nerui*, which go on directly to the eyes, do worke and moue with such power, that the visual vertue, and the spirits of sight (altering in their motion) do cause whatsoeuer drunken men gaze on, to stirre very strongly and quicke; because the Organe of sight moueth it selfe in that manner, and maketh the common sense to receiue the Images of things, in a multiplicity of quality to the eye. For such kinde of motion, maketh single things to seeme double, and because this motion is so sudden and insensible, it causeth two things to seeme as one to the sight. As any man may easily make tryall of, by laying his finger vpon his eye-lid, and then removing it thence, it will appeare to him, that it is the thing remoueth it selfe, which he beholdeth. Auicenne deliuereth another reason, saying: The vapours of wine, which ascend vp into the head of him that is drunke, are moist, and because the little nerues and muscles which reach to the eyes, doe engrosse or swell themselves by this humidity, so much more the one (then the other) doe thereby mount themselves, the one bigger, and the other lower. From hence ensueth, that the visible rayes do not equally diuide themselves forth-right from both the eyes, neither by a direct or right line: which is the cause, that the Images of things visible, doe extend to eyther eye by themselves. In this respect only, things simple and single, appeare to be double, the common sense receyuing & apprehending two images for one: and for the maintenance of this opinion, Auicenne yeeldeth the selfesame example, as Aristotle did.

required to be well apprehended. Neuertheless, I am the more willing to speake somewhat of the argument, onely for the delight and contentment of such mindes, as are enclined to the Science whereof it discourseth. Wherefore concerning our present purpose, it is needfull to presuppose, the first and chiefe Elements of such a Science: which because they are common, shall require the lesse labor to proue them. The first is that whereof wee are now treating, the greatnesse of the earth, carrying with it both Land and Sea: because God did dispose them in such manner, when he said; Let the dry Land appeare, for they both being vnited together, made one body perfectly round. So likewise it is to bee vnderstoode in all those actions which are giuen to the earth, the Sea is also therein comprized: For, when a man sayth, the earth hath so many degrees in roundnesse, or it containeth so many degrees from one place to another; the sea is therein as well vnderstood as the land. So in like manner are considered the Eclipses, heights and breadths, to hold one and the same certitude: and yet notwithstanding, Mountaines, and Valleys are not comprehended in this roundure, nor Woods or Forrests likewise, which the earth containeth in it selfe; because such things are not worthe of any account, with the greatnesse of this wonderful body.

This rotundity of Land and Water, is seated in the midst of the circuite of Heauen, in such manner, as the point & center of that round body, composed of Sea and Land, is likewise the center and number of the whole world, as well of heauen, as of the Elements.ouer and besides this definition, there is another, true and absolute, to wit, that the land and water (in regard of the starry heauen, which we call the Firmament) are so little, that all these two Elements serue thereto but for a center, and is euen but as a small point, in respect of his circumference. So that in whatsoeuer part thereof a man best liketh to helpe himselfe, by meanes of a Quadrant or an Astrolabe; his labour fortheth to the like effect, as if hee made the same for the center of the earth. For in whatsoeuer place of the earth we are (prouided that it be not in any deepe or hollow bottom) we shall discouer the moity of heauen; which proceedeth by reason of the incomprehensible distance, that is from hence beneath vp to the Firmament, with his incomparable greatnesse. That this must needs be true, it is most euident, that the verie least Starre which we discern in heauen, is much more greater then the whole earth; and yet neuertheless, it appeareth to vs but as a small point, in regard of the heauens large spaciousnesse; by the least of which things, a man may make prooffe in sufficient demonstration, but it sufficeth that experience hath apparently shewne the same.

Ptolomy approueth it, in the 10. chapter of his first booke of Geography; Alphraganus, in his fourth Difference, Cleomedes, in his first Booke; Geber, in his second Book; and Iohn de Sacroboto, as the like do all other that haue written on the Sphere.

This then being thus presupposed, let vs imagine in our mindes, that the vnder Land do make one round circle, and that heauen is another, but much more great, as indeede it is; and that these two circles haue no other, but one common center within them. Which being so imagined, let vs lay two lines of equal greatnesse, which may extend themselves (all the common) to the circumferences of all the two circles, according as Euclides enstrueth, cutting and diuiding the two Circles by equal portions, each portion being iustly equalled, in regard of each one of them: that is to say, that if those two lines passe on right in such manner, they will make eight parts of a great circle, and so shall make as much of the lesser. I vnderstand and meane each eight part, in respect of each ones greatnesse.

Our elders in former times, in their manner of measuring the world, gaue aduice to diuide the heauen into three hundred and threescore equal partes, which we do now call degrees, & by consequent, the roundnesse of the earth into as manie parts, by imaginations of lines, parting from the center, and making the diuision in such manner, that the like quantitie which each one of the degrees hath, in respect of the whole heauen; the verie like shall be that of each one of the degrees for the earth, having regard to the roundure and circuite thereof. And as these portions or degrees, if you please so to terme them, may bee framed by hote water, that if a man put his hand rashly thereinto, he can hardly suffer or endure it. Notwithstanding, let him hold it firmly therein, and it yeldeth then lesse cause of passion then if he moued it vp and downe. In regard, that the lesse part of the water enuironeth the coole hand, whereby it causeth some small temperatour round about it: but being plunged and moued about the water, it reneweth fresh heate, and at each time appropriateth new power to it selfe; for the more potent, must needs worke nouelly vpon that which is much weaker.

It may be likewise demanded, for what cause it is more hot at the end of Iune, & all along the month of Iuly, the Sun being then the furthest off from vs, then it is at the beginning of Iune; considering we are then in the Solstice of the Sunne, and more directly smitten with his beames? Heereunto answereth Aristotle, in his second Booke of Meteors, and the ninth Chapter, that the heate of the Sunne is not the cause thereof, neither is there any more heate felt by the Sunnes being neere to vs, then when hee hath longest time to abide ouer vs. For in the months of Iune and Iuly, hee hath a great length of time in approaching towards vs; as also in declining, hee causeth the greater heate, because (in descending) here heateeth that part and tract of the ayre, which hee formerly had well warmed in mounting aloft.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of sodaine death bapting vnto diuers great Persons, that haue thereto bene wished or threatened, by such as they haue vniuersally put to death before, and their deaths haue ensued to them in such manner, & at such times, as haue bene assigned vnto them: With the notable history of an Archbyshop of Mentz or Magonce.

Ven all helpe in man hath ceased, concerning such to whom great wrongs and injuries haue bene done; yet the powerfull arme of God hath neuer failed them. And albeit it hath not ensued so speedily, or else so visibly as they could haue wished; yet GOD, who knoweth both how and when to be augmented on them that are the oppressors of innocents, hath wrought so graciouslie for his own glory; that trecheries haue come to light in due and meete times, & mens false iudgements haue felt his seuerer condemnation, and publickly enough for other mens forewarning. In this case wee could alleadge many memorable examples; but being loth to trouble you with ouer many, these few commendable Collections shall serue for this time.

I read of a Knight amongst the Templers (of whom wee haue spoken in our former Volume) who being (in the opinion of many) sentenced to death verie vniuersally; as the Officers led him towards the place of execution, hee espied Pope Clement, the first of that name (by whose meane he was condemned to death) looking out at a window; and by him flood Phillip le Bel, then King of France. The Knight being an Italian, borne at Naples, beholding the Pope with an vndaunted countenance, with a lowde voyce spake thus vnto him.

Most cruell Clement, seeing that there is no Iudge in this world, before whom a poore innocent man may call in question the vniuersal sentence which thou hast given against mee. I appeale from thee, a most vniuersal Iudge, to the rightest Iudge of al other, Iesus Christ himselfe, before whom I giue thee warning, and likewise King Phillip there by thee, to make your appearance, to answer the false iudgement of death which you haue given against mee. This appearance of yours before the Tribunnall seat of God, I do assigne to bee made within lesse then a yeare, to do me right there, where I may safely haue my cause determined, without any auarice or passion at all, as here you both haue dealt with me. The poore Knights desire sorted with his wordes, for about the same limited time, the Pope being pained with a great greefe in his stomach, died; so did K. Phillip; but howeuer it hapned, it was thought to proceed from the iust iudgement of God.

The very like fortune hapned to Ferdinand the fourth, King of Castile, who hauing caused two worthy Knights to bee executed, more by his owne wrathfull & angry spleen, then any warrant of iustice, being being no way to bee dissuaded from this violent cruelty, either by teares, intreats, or earnest solicitations; they (in very like manner) cited the King before the Tribunnall of Iesus Christ, and to make his appearance within thirty dayes. And it is credibly auouched, that on the last of those thirty dayes, the King dyed.

The like sort also befell to a Capitaine of the Gallies, which belonged to the inhabitants of Geneway, whereof Baptista Fulgoso maketh this report. This Capitaine making a sally forth vpon the Sea, tooke a Foyle or smal Gally appertaining to them of Cathelogna; wherein there was another Capitaine that neuer had done any iniurie to the Geneways. Notwithstanding in regard of the malice which the Geneways bare to the Cathelognians, hee gaue command, that this Capitaine thus taken prisoner, should forthwith be hanged. The Capitaine, shedding many teares, humbly requested, that he might not so shamefully be put to death, considering that he had neuer offended him, or his Nation. But in the end, finding no fauour or mercy in him, he made his recourse to the Diuine Iudge of al men, speaking thus to the cruell Capitaine; Seeing thou wilt needes execute on me this most vniuersal sentence, I haue no other friend but God to appeale vnto, who is the iust auenger of injured innocents. And therefore I humbly desire, that (this instant day) thy soule may appeare with mine before him, to yeeld an account for the wrong thou hast done me. Not many houres, after the Geneway Capitaine also dyed, and doubtlesse went to render a reason for his most extreme cruelty.

I could alleadge many examples more, apply fured to this purpose; but for the strangest of all, I will relate what hapned at Magonce or Mentz in Germany, which generally cost most deare vnto the whole City, according as it is briefly reported by Gantier, that renowned Poet, who wrote the life and actions of the Emperour Fredericke, first of that name. Conradus also the Byshop, declareth the same in his history, among many things hapning in the time of that Fredericke, and of Henrie the sixt his sonne, the History ensueth in this manner.

In the City of Magonce or Mentz in Germany, in the yeare one thousand, five hundred and fifty, little more or lesse, there liued an Arch Byshop, named Henric, a man singular in all vertues. This Archbyshop, according to the duty and office of a faithfull Pastor, as indeed hee was, did seuerely chastise publick sinnes and offences, because he was very ieaalous of Gods honour, and loue of one neighbour vnto another, the which made him to haue the greater care of his flocke. Heereupon wicked and dissolute persons grewe hateful against him, deuising many false and slanderous accusations, where-with the Pope was plentifully informed, imposing so many crimes and delicts vpon him, that he was reputed vnnecesse for such a dignity.

These matters thus vnder stood by the Pope, who alwayes thought him to bee a iust and holy man; being no way able to deny audience to such a crowde of accusers as desired iustice; at last he aduertised the Arch-byshop of these foule accusations. The good reuerend man, to make cleare his innocence, elected (among all his other friends) a man whom hee most affected, and on whom hee had bestowed more especial fauours, then on any man else beside. Hee was a Priest by profession, named Arnolde, advanced vnto many great dignities, as being a man of rich spirit, eloquence, and abounding in the wealth of the world beside.

Arnolde comming to Rome, being instructed and pressed on by the diuell, concluded in his priuate thoughts, to deprive his Lord of so high a dignitie, and make application thereof to himselfe. Which that he might the better compass, hauing brought great summes of money thither with him, he bestowed two wicked Cardinals, who, in stead of speaking in his Lords fauour, should enforce all matters more against him. For they affirmed, that they stood more obliged to God and truth, then to worldly respects or fauours of men; and therefore maintained, that the Archbyshop was apparently culpable of all the crimes inferred against him, and thereby iustly deserved deprivation. The Pope being thus abusively persuaded by theyre report, thought to haue sent two Priestes thither, to acquaint him with this information confirmed against him: but (indeed) he sent the two Cardinals confederated with Arnolde, to perfect the Proceffe, by them concluded for present execution. They

They were no sooner arrived in Germany, but they summoned the Arch-Bishop to come before them, where his hearing was admitted in such sort, that sentence was given against him, whereby he was deprived of his See and dignitie, and Arnolde advanced into his place, who had sold his Master, even as Iudas, our old blessed Saviour. In pronouncing the judgement, the Arch-Bishop Henry then present, delivered these wordes. God knoweth, that I am most vniustly condemned: neuertheless, I care not for making any appeale to the further censure of men: because I am assured, that I yes shall bee better belened among you, then traeth can be in mee. Therefore I receive this sentence, as some iust punishment for my sinnes, and yet doe appeale from your indirect doome, to the eternal iust Iudge Iesus Christ: before whom I aduowne you three to appeare.

These wordes were no sooner heard by the Iudges, but they fell into extremity of laughter, saying; That if he pleased to go on thither before, they would follow him at their leysure. This sentence was given in the yeare one thousand, five hundred, fifty six, which the deprived Arch-bishop endured with admirable patience; & being retired into his Monastery, he there remained the rest of his life, yet without acceptance of the habite. To conclude, God would not permit this wickednes to passe unpunished, to the end, that innocence might the better bee knowne: but about a yeare and an halfe after, this Henrie dyed in his Monastery in great holinesse, and doublelesse attained the glorie long time desired.

Newes of his death being brought to Rome, the two Cardinals being very merrily met together, one of them, said: The Arch-Bishoppe Henry is gone, and must not we in halt follow him? Indeed (quoth the other) so wee made him promise; but let him tarry (wherefoeuer he is) till wee come to him. Not many dayes after, one of them, being sodainly smitten by one of his seruants vpon the shoulder, fell downe so greuously afflicted with paine, that his bowels and entrailes issued out at his fundament, and instantly died. The other falling into phrenie and madnesse, did eate off his owne hands, and dyed very strangely. Now as concerning false Arnolde, hee exercised such cruelties and seditions among the people, that he became fo hated and despised of them all; as being one day besiedged in a Monastery, hee was there slayne, and afterward left lying naked in the common ditch of the Citie; where all the people, both men, women, and children, performed all cruelties vpon his body, that possibly could be deuised by them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the cruelty which Alboutine, King of Lombardie, used to his Queene & wife Rosamond. And by what meanes she reuenged her selfe on him at length.

Among those warlike people, which issued out of Germany, and the Northerne partes, to descend into Italy; the Longobards are named, who for the space of two hundred yeares & more, seized all those Lands, which (till this day) is called Lombardie, and vntill such time as Charlemaigne expelled them thence, according as in the History is amply related, written by Paulus Diaconus in the particular Booke which he made for that purpose. He saith, that when they left Hungary (where they had for sometime dwelt) to passe into Italy, they had one named Alboutine their King: a man of great spirit, and verie valiant in actions of warre. For he conquered in battayle Cunimond, King of the Garpides, and afterwards, causing his head to bee smitten off, made a drinking Cuppe thereof, wherein hee vied to drinke, and in triumph of his conquest and victorie. At which time, he detained (as his prisoner) a verie beautiful daughter to the fore-named King, called Rosamond, whom he made his wife, and then afterwards hee went to subdue Italy, carrying his Queene along with him, in the yeare, eight hundred, sixty two.

When he had conquered many towns and Cities, he came (at length) to the City of Pausa: where (since that time) the succeeding Kinges vied to keepe their seate and continuall residing, as the very principall City of their Kingdome. Having reigned three yeares and three moneths, and being then at Verona, he appoynted a solemne feast, where hee drunke to his Queene in the Cuppe made of her fathers head, and forced her to pledge him: whereat shee conceived such grieft and displeasure, that the intire loue which shee had formerly borne him, was converted into deadly hatred, with an absolute resolute and conclusion to kill him, in iust reuenge of her fathers death, & cruelty extended to her. And to assitt her in this determination, the conferred with a gentleman named Hermigilde: who presently tolde her, that to the execution of such an important busines, she should require the ayde of a valiant knight in the Court, called Paradine. Which instantly shee did, but he would not yeeld thereto, because hee tooke it to be too horrid a treason. Finding her hope frustrated, and fearing lest his intent would be discovered, yet desiring nothing more in the world, then to compass the height and pitch of her enterprise: shee set aside all care of honour and honesty, & being aduertised by Hermigilde, that Paradine earnestly affected one of her attending Ladies, shee deuised thereby to effect her purpose. Being acquainted with the secret resort where Paradine & his loue alwaies met together, shee found some other employment for the Lady, & made vse of her place for the time, Paradine keeping her there company a long time, imagining no other, but that it was the mistresse of his affections.

The Queene, who had spent all this while in soft whispers and dalliance, not vying any one word whereby shee might be discovered, perceiving opportunity to apply to fit her, spake thus vnto him. Knowest thou Paradine, who it is that keepeeth thee company? Full well (quoth he) with my Mistresse, and then named her. Thou iyst (false traytour, replied the Queene, I am Rosamond thy Soueraignes wife, whom thou hast dared to abuse in this manner, and dye thou must by the iust wrath of Alboutine, except thou saue thy life by killing him: aduise thee therefore, whether his life or thine owne is dearest to thee. When Paradine considered his dangerous estate, without any meanes of helpe or escape; hee resolved to kill the King: and for his better further-rance therein, both hee, the Queene, and Hermigilde tooke counsell together, plotting the project in this manner.

The King vied to sleepe in the heate of the day, and all else auoyded the chamber, the Queene onely excepted, and hee being a king of courage and high resolute, euer slept like a Souldier, with his Sword girded about him: which at this intended time of treason, the Queene had tyed so fast in the scabbard, as hee could by no meanes helpe himselfe therewith. Paradine and Hermigilde waiting the houre, which was vpon the Queenes issuing forth: they entered, and for all their soft treading, the King heard them, and started from his bed. VVhen he beheld two men armed with weapons, and at such a time of no suspicion: fury, not feare made him take no knowledge of them, but sought to defend himselfe with his weapon. VVhich failing him, by the meanes of so false a Queene, and they with their weapons euery where, wounding him: hee caught vp a stool, and therewith made his defence so long as hee could, till in the end they deprived him of life, yet neither noise heard, or any suspicion of murder.

The King being thus dead, and all well carried with a smooth countenance: Hermigilde possessed himselfe of the Pallace, intending to make the Queene his wife, as immediately hee did. But notwithstanding all their close packing, the Lombardes (not long after) came to the knowledge of their Kings death, and in what manner hee was murdered, which they purposed to reuenge with all possible speed. VVherein they were prevented, for Rosamond and her complices hauing packed vp most of her Jewells & treasure Royall, fled away thence, carrying with them Aluifinda Daughter to King Alboutine, by his first wife. And for their safer securitiy, they went to Raennna, where then gouerned a Lieutenant of the Empire, named Longinus, who kept that place for Thebrius, Sonne to the Emperour Constantine of Constantinople, by whom they were courteously entertained.

Not long after, Longinus becoming enamored of Rosamond, & desirous to enjoy her in marriage, whereto hee found her very tractable; counselled her to procure the death of Hermigilde, & then hee would marry her. Shee that had lost all loue and fear of God, respect of womanhood, and dreadlesse of the shame of men, couering withal, to aduance her downefalne estate, by marrying with the Emperours Lieutenant; gaue to Hermigilde an impoisoned potion at his coming forth of his Bath, perswading him, that it was most fowerraige for his health; by which perswasion he dranke a good part thereof. But when hee found it afterward to afflicke his body, so as he plainly perceiued himselfe to be poysoned; drawing forth his sword in extremity of rage, he compelled Rosamond to drinke vp all the rest that remayned in the Cup, so that at one instant time they both were iustly required for the death of Albanine. Tydings hereof being brought to the Lieutenant Longinus, he caused the young Lady Alminda to be seized on, and sent her (with all her jewels and treasure) to the Emperour Tiberius, at Constantinople, with Paradise also as a prisoner: where hauing his eyes pulled forth, he liued a while, and then died most miserably.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of a pleasant, witty, and honest deceit, which a famous and vertuous Queene used to her owne husband; whereby Iames, King of Arragon was begotten, with other remembrances both of his birth and death.

IVell remember, that in reading the Chronicle of the Kings of Arragon; I finde, that Don Peter, Count of Barcelona, who was the thirtieth King of Arragon, had Madam Mary in marriage, daughter to the Earle of Mount Pefulm. Nephew to the Emperour of Constantinople, the being a very beautifull and vertuous Lady. All which notwithstanding, the King was much addicted vnto other women, and vied such slender testimony of loue towards his Queene, that hee refused to keepe her company, as (in the duty of an husband) he stood obliged to doe. This strange behaiour in the King, did much afflicke and greeue the Queene, because they had no childe to succeed in the Kingdome, the greattest misery (of all other) that can happen to a well settled Estate. Heerevpon, by aduice of one of the Kings Pages of his Chamber, who (it may be) had formerly done seruice in the like affaires; shee compassed the meanes (vnder title of some one of the Kings cheefest fauourites) to bee brought that night to lodge with the King. Such familiar entercourtes hauing passed betweene them, as in such wanton seasons are commonly required, the King perceiuing the day-light neere approaching, in regard both of his owne honours safety and hers, made meanes to her for her speedy departure, but the taking hold of lo good an occasion, spake thus vnto him.

My gracious Lord and husband, I am none such as (perhaps) you take mee to be, but be well assured, that this night you haue slept with your true Queene and VVife. VVhat violence you shall please to mee, for I purpose not to leaue your bed, vntill some man, well deseruing faith and credite, may be witness of my this nights keeping you company. To the ende, that if the fauour of heauen hath bin so gracious to me, that fruite (long desired) may ensue by this aduerture; the world shal take true notice, that it is your owne. The King perceiuing this honest deceit of his Queene, appeared to bee well pleased therewith, and called two Gentlemen of his Chamber, to testifie the truth, according to her desire, and as (indeed) stood best with his honour. It so pleased God, that at fit and conuenient time, the Queene hauing at that instant time conceiued with childe; at such due season as the custome of women alloweth them for traualle, shee was deliuered of a goodly Sonne, euen on the first day of February, in the year one thousand, one hundred, ninety sixe. Soone after it was borne, the Mother caused it to bee carried to the Church, and (which is a thing deseruing memory) as they which carried the childe entred into the Church, the Priests began to sing, Te Deum laudamus, Wee praise thee O God. Passing from thence vnto another Church, as they were entring likewise thereinto, the Priests began to sing the

The Father and Mother, not knowing what name to giue him, caused twelue Torches (of equal length and making) to be all lighted in one instant, the twelue Torches bearing the seuerall names of the twelue Apostles. With this conclusion, that the name of the Torch which first sayled, or became extinguished; the selfe-same name should bee giuen to the childe, which happened to be that of S. Iames. Heereupon he was named Iames, because it was the name, which the men of Arragon gaue to that Apostle. Hee proued to be an excellent Prince, and of admirable gouernement, both in peace and warre, for hee made a cruell inuasion vpon the Moors, being euer more very liberal to his Souldiers. Among other most notable matters, hee leuied a great Army, which he conducted into the Isle of Maioira, that then was in the Moors possession, where hee fought many stout batailles. But after he had a long while besieged the City, he won it in the ende, and likewise other neighbouring Islands beside. Then coming into his kingdom of Maioira, especially to the City of Carthage, hee proued still the Conqueror, and neuer sayled in any of his attempts.

Hee had many children, as well sonnes as daughters, on whom (during his life time) he bestowed great gifts and goodly estates. Don Peter, that afterward was King of Arragon, was his Sonne. Likewise Don Iames, King of Maioira and Minorica. Hee had another that was Archbishop of Toledo. Madame Tolland, who was Queene of Castile; and Madame Isabel, that was Queene of France; and Madame Vrragua, who was married to Don Emanuel, Prince of Castile; and Don Peter, who espoused the daughter vnto the King of Nauarre. He liued seventy and two yeares, and dyed religiously, taking on him (before his death) the habite of a Monke. For he had a greuous discaise, which made him renounce his royall Scepter, with deliberate purpose, that if he might recouer his health againe, hee would imploy the rest of his dayes in the seruice of God. But weaknesse encreasing more and more vpon him, he dyed in the City of Valencia, Anno 1266. and at the beginning of the Moneth of August.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of an ancient and memorable Custome, obserued by the Inhabitants of the Prouince of Carinthia, at the Coronation of their Prince; and how cruell their punishments are to Thebes.

POpe Pius the second of that name, who was a man of great learning, & a diligent inquisitor for the truth of Histories, as wee haue in many places formerly alledged, saith in his description of the world; that the Prouince of Carinthia, is enclosed within the territory, and vnder the gouernment of Austria. Hee likewise relateth a custome, which the Inhabitants of that Prouince haue anciently obserued, at the election and Coronation of their Princes; appearing some-what strange, yet honest and very commendable. VVhich custome is also confirmed by A. Sabellius, in his tenth Decade; and by Sebastian Munster, in his composed Cosmography, which is after this manner.

In this Prouince of Carinthia, there is a very great and spacious plaine of folde ruined buildings, which seeme to bee the foundation of some former auncient City.

In which place also there is a great stone, and when obeyance is to be giuen at the new creation of a Prince; there is a day appointed, and a country labourer, or meane husbandman (allowed to this preheminance in regard of his lineage) hath order to seate himselfe vpon that same stone. standeth a poore Cow, that hath lately calued, which hee holdeth fastened by a corde, and on his left hand standeth a very leane and wretched Mare, eyed in like manner, and round about him is no meane crowd of labourers and country Boores. In this place, and at this Stone, the Prince that is to be enstalled, must make his apparance, attended with a great number of men on horse-backe, ryding in very formal order, with twelue Banners borne before him: among which there is one more large and sightly then all the rest, carryed by an Earle, thereto admitted by especial priuiledge.

The Arch-Duke, Prince of great Lord howeuer ye meane to rearme him, clothed in a Shepherds habite, commeth to the Stone wheron the poore man sitteth, & as he perceiueh him to approach somewhat neere, hee demandeth with a loud voyce, what he is, that cometh towards him with such glory and felicity? Answer is instantly made him, that it is the man, who commeth to be created Prince of the Country. Then as it were with a voyce like thunder, the labourer cryeth out. Is he a iust Iudge? Will he wel maintaine iustice? Will hee preferre the defence and safety of this Country? Is hee a man franke, and free-borne? Is he valiant, veruious, and worthy of honour and reuerence? Is he a Christian? Is hee a Defender of the faith of Iesus Christ? And all the company maketh answer, that he is such a man, and will so continue. Then hee beginneth againe, and maketh another demand. By what right or reason cometh he to dispossest me of this place, which belongeth onely to me? To which question, the Earle that beareth the cheefest Standard, replyeth thus. If thou wilt quit and forsake this place, threefoore Ducates of gold shall be frankly giuen thee, & this Cow, as also this Mare shall both be thine owne, beside the rich Robe, which our King didst all of put off, shall also be thine: moreouer, thou and thy family shal bee free, from paying any manner of tribute. After these words, the Prince approacheth neere to the Stone, & the poore man giueh him a gentle blow on the cheek, commanding him (in any case) to be a good Iusticer: & so descending from the Stone, he leadeth along with him the Cow and Mare, and deparreth.

Then the Prince dismounting from his horse, ascendeth vp, and sitteth vpon the stone, where drawing forth his Sword, and turning to each side of the stone, shall flourish the weapon round about him; hee maketh a solemne promise before all the people, vttering the words as loud as he can speake, that he will be a iust Iudge, and a good Prince. This done, one bringeth him (in a Shepherds bonnet) a small quantity of water to drinke: and so descending from the stone, hee remounteth on horsebacke, and rydeth on to a Church with all his company, there to heare Mass. Which being finished, hee changeth his former plaine and rurall garments, to very Royall and Princely habites: and after a pomepous Dinner with his whole train, he returneth againe into the open field, where hee heareth all the Officers of Iustice speake vnto him, to enstruct him in the lawes of the Country: and these are the vusual ceremonies, obserued at the creation of euery Prince.

There is another custome in vse among these people, for the punishment of thefts and robberies; which I hold to be vniust, and ouer-cruell, especially to bee vsed among Christians. For hauing but some note or apprehension onely, that such a man standeth in repute to be a theefe, they forthwith send him to execution, without any other proceeding against him. Then three dayes after his death, they examine the witnesses with all care and diligence; when if it shall appeare by solemne inquisition, that hee proueth to be guilty of the crimes alledged; they suffer him to hang vpon the Gibbet, vntill his limbes fall peece-meale from him. But if he be found to be innocent, they take him thence, and giue him honourable obsequies and funeral, with many prayers and almes-deeds, for the saluation of his soule.

With this severity doe they chastise theeues and robbers, neuertheless. I read of some other Nations, that greatly haue supported and countenanced them therein. As the Egyptians, of whom Aulus Gellius writeth in his Attick nights. And the Lacedaemonians likewise, who permitted their children to bee theeues, and learne climbing in at windowes, and wandring abroad in the night season, that they might be the more bolde and hardy for warre. CHAP. XXXIII.

In what part of the Zodiacque the Sunne and Moone, and likewise the other Planets were, at their first creating. Also of the beginning of yeares, and the course of times.

HE learned Philosophers say, that men are naturally curious & couetous of knowledge. Moreover, such is the zeale of their affection in this case, and the bent of humane vnderstanding so full of strange questionings, as they cannot content themselves to know such things as they may with some ease comprehend onely: but ouer and beside, they are scrupulous and searching (through bold presumption) to know such causes as are very hard, and almost impossible. Nor hath this painefull desire beene altogether fruitlesse and vaine, though many times it fayled, and came farre short of expectation: because by contemplation and continuall study, they haue found out such matters, as seemed before vtterly impossible and supernaturall, or that they should any way be attained vnto by the capacity of men. As namely the motions of the Heauens; the course of the Planets and other Starrs, with their severall influences and power, and the like things beside: among which is comprized my present intended argument, and what in this Chapter I purposed to discourse on, to wit how to know the beginning of times & yeares; and on what day the world began, or to speake better; when, or in what season God created the world; when began the year and times; and where was the Sun, or where God placed it at first, when hee began his course; & likewise the Moone, with the other Starrs and Planets.

Aristotle didd little care for these questions, and infinite other Philosophers beside, who thorow defect of the light of faith, did verily beleue, that the world was eternall, without any beginning or ending. But such as haue declared themselves not to be ignorant in these things, but verily beleued the beginning of times, seeme to stand diuided betwene two opinions. There are some among them, who say, that in the instant when the world was created, the Sunne was found to be in the first point of Aries, or the Ramme, which is in the Equinoctiall of Summer, the time comming then to the eleuenth day of March. Others say, that the world began, the Sunne then being in the first point of Libra, or the Balances, which is the other Equinoctiall of Winter, commonly happening in these our dayes, on the thirteenth or fourteenth day of September. Of this opinion were diuers Egyptians, Arabs, and Greekes likewise; according as Lincolniensis reporteth, in a Treatise of the world, which he wrote to Pope Clement; & Pincennius in his historical Mirrour.

Such as haue followed this opinion, alledge a reason for it, which (in my iudgment) is very weak, and of no force. For they say, that then the principall fruites of the earth were fully ripe, and in the very best of their sauiour; because it was most requisite, that (at the beginning) the earth should present it selfe in the height of perfection. To this purpose, they produce authority out of Deuteronomy, where it is said; That God made all things perfect and compleate. There are some others, who affirme, that the entrance of times, and of yeares, was on the very greatest day of all other; which was then, when the Sunne entred into the signe of Cancer, as now it is the eleuenth or twelfth day of Iune. Iulius Firmicus, an ancient Author, and of great authority in Astrology, in the beginning of his third Booke, which he wrote of the worlds creation, saith: That when the world began, the Sunne was in the fifth degree of the figure Leo; which is the figure wherein he hath most dominion, because it is called the house of the Sunne: the like he saith, in discovering the other Planets, by their order and degrees.

But that which relistheth of most reason in all these opinions, and appeareth most conformable to truth, is; that when both time and the heavens began to bee mooued; the Sun was in the first point of Aries, which is (with vs) in March, and at which time is the entrance of Summer. This is affirmed (beside all other reasons that we can alledge) by the greater part of Historians, as well Christians as Heathens; among whom are S. Hierome, S. Ambrose, S. Basil, and others, who doe all maintaine, that the beginning of the world, and likewise of the year, was in the Equinoctiall of our Summer. And although there may appeare some difference among them, because some will haue the worlds beginning to be in March, and others in April: it may well be endured, for they all agree together, that it was in the Equinoctiall, which now is in March. Notwithstanding, as we haue formerly affirmed, the Equinoctiall is not alwaies time or constant for Iesus Christ suffered his passion on the five and twentieth day of March, which was then the Equinoctiall, and now it is the eleuenth day of the same Moneth, whereby may well be presumed, that heretofore it was in April.

For this cause, some would haue April to be the first Moneth, and others March; yet notwithstanding, they all say, that when the Sun enters into the first point or degree of Aries, then is the Equinoctiall. This opinion is grounded on the Scripture, especially on the twelfth Chapter of Exodus, where it is said: *The Moneth * Nisan* (which is March with vs) is the entrance to your year. Vincentius, in the beginning of his historicall Mirrour, saith: The Hebrewes began their year in March, because in the like Moneth was the Equinoctiall, when as the world began. This opinion was likewise helde by some of the Gentiles; as Elpacus in his Astrological Treatise, where he saith: The Chaldeans being very great Astrologers, beleued likewise, that on the first day when the world was made the Sunne entered into the first point or degree of Aries; and this is also confidently maintained, by the most part of Astrologers, both ancient and moderne. Therefore when the Sunne came in his course thither, or to that Signe; then was the beginning of the year, and thence ensued the principall or beginning day. For it is a matter most manifest, that the first day wherein the world began to be made, was also made the first day of the year: considering, that till then, there was neither time nor year. And therefore the figure of Aries is reckoned (about all the rest) to be the first in order among the twelve signes.

Now, as when we come to iudge of the reuolution of years, and things to happen therein, as of necessity we must equal the figures, by the beginning of the world; even so it is as easie to proue, that God placed the Sunne in the first degree of this figure, at the beginning and creation of the world. And this may be coniectured without any great labor, by our professed in the sixth Chapter of the seuenth Booke, in our first Volume, where discoursing on the time and day, when as our blessed Lord and Saviour suffered; it is affirmed, that the Sunne was in the selfesame at the creation, as it was when the great Sunne of righteousness made the regeneration of the world, suffering death and passion in humane flesh, and that happened (as is formerly saide) in the Equinoctiall of Summer, which is an argument and presupposition, that euen so hee placed it, when as he created it.

Moreover, it appeareth very credible, that it was so made, because such as know any thing in Astrology, and in the Sphere, do well perceiue, that the Sunne entering into the degree of this figure, and making his reuolution by the space of a whole day: there is not any part of the world, which he leaueth viloock on with his bright splendour. And this he doth not in any other place of the Zodiacke, because in what place else soeuer hee is; there are some parts of the earth where he is not seene that day; but being in this first degree, as we haue saide, there is no place where he is vnseene, as hee walketh along in his diurnal course, or dayes iourney. And it standeth with good reason and conueniency, that the first day of the Sunnes setting forth on progrease, hee should begin in such a place, where hee may best visite the whole world with his beames. And that it should be in the figure Aries, rather then in that of Libra, appeareth plainly by our former relation, that on the day of our Lords passion, the Sunne was in the selfesame place, therefore there is some particular power in this signe.

Holding this opinion then for the most certaine, I say, that the reason alledged, by such as would haue the beginning of the world, to be in the Equinoctiall of September, is very weake. For it is not sufficient to say, that all the fruites were ripe and mellow; in regard it is no vniuersall rule: for when the fruites are ripe ned towards the Northern latitude, they are not so in the South, but wholly quite contrary. And therefore I craue no helpe of their reason, who say, that the Equinoctiall of March (already proued) is the beginning of the Spring-time, & of flow-ers ouer all the earth, all things beeing in procreation; for if with vs it be the beginning of Spring-time, it is then winter in the Southerne parts. Let our reasons then suffice, & the authority of such worthy men, to cleare all other doubt or scruple; although the Romane yeare, now in vse, seemeth to begin the first day of January: for this matter came so to passe, onely through the superstitious deuotion, which the Gentiles had to their God Nanus, conuicting to haue their year beginne with his name, as the Christians began theirs with the Natiuity of Iesus Christ, albeit the year doth not then begin.

The Romanes (in like manner) began their year in March, according as Marcus Varro writeth, and Macrobius in his first Booke, Quid in his Festis, and many more beside. Also God shewed his imment goodnesse, in placing our first Parents Adam and Eue, in the Northern parts of the earth, when he banished them out of the terrestriall Paradise; & that the first season which they saw in this world, was the Spring-time, finding the earth to be Greene & flowry, with the ayre milde, sweete and temperate, which was done for the consolation of their misery and nakednesse, and so they could not haue found it, if it had not beene Spring-time.

This matter being sufficiently proued, wee must know that there are other Planets, and especially the Moone, as being one of the principall, whom some do maintaine, to be set by God in conjunction with the Sunne, on the first day of her creation. Others say, that she was in opposition, and at the full. Saint Augustine reporteth these two opinions, in his booke vpon Genesis, the sixth Chapter, saying further, that such as maintaine her to be in opposition, and at the full; do alledge for their reason; that it was very inconuenient, that at her beginning, God should create her any way defectuous. Others vrge the contrary, and say it is more credible; that she began her first day in conjunction, encreasing in her age answerable to our account. But to quiet this controuersie, I say (in mine opinion) that God at such time as he created her, made her at full, and in opposition to the Sun. And it seemeth; that this iudgement is the most receiued, as of S. Augustine, in the place before alledged; and Rabanus on the twelfth Chapter of Exodus, saith the very same. This appeareth conformable to holy Scripture, where it is saide: God made two great lights, the greater light to gouerne the day, and the lesser light to illuminate the night. Now in the very same instant as the Sunne began his light, hee gaue splendour to the moiety of the world, because in that moiety or halfe part, hee made day. But the other moiety could haue no light of the Sunne, by reason of the earths shadow; therefore it seemeth consonant to reason, that in the other moiety of the earth, where it was night, the Moone should extend her office of shining. For like as they were both created at one instant; so should they both fulfill their offices in one and the same instant, and the one to gouerne the day, as the other the night, according to the words of the Text, verified apparently, that the world was wholly lightened at one & the same time.

Contrariwise, if the Moone had bene in conjunction, the light common and vniuersall could not haue come till fifteene dayes after; and beside, three or foure dayes must needs haue passed, before she could lend any light to the earth, and that must be but very little too, euen as when we see her to be but four or five daies old. Therefore it was very conuenable, that these two famous lights shold illuminate the earth at one instant. I say moreover, that the Moone then being in opposition with the Sunne, shee must needs haue her being on the other side of the signe Libra, for in her so being, she performing the same day the effects as the Sunne did, illuminating all the world, by her measurable pace of that dayes iourney; which els she could not haue done, if she had bin in any other place of the Zodiacque. Hereby it appeareth, that this opinion is the most likely; although Iulius Firmicus will needs say, that the Moone (at the time of her creation) had her first seating in the fiftenth degree of the signe Cancer, where shee affecteth most to be; & of this opiniō is Macrobius, in his first Booke of Scipios dreame.

As for the other Planets, it is very difficult to certifie them, and lesse profitable to know them: in which respect, I am willing to bestow the lesse paines on them. Neuertheless, Iulius Firmicus, in his second Booke before alledged, is so bold as to name the places where each of them is seated, saying: Saturne should be in the signe Capricorne; Iupiter in Sagittarius; Mars in Scorpio; Venus in Libra; & Mars in Virgo; which are the signes wherein they haue most power, and being signes likewise appointed to these Planets. Elpacus himselfe maintayneth as much, according as Ioannes Agricannus declareth in his Summary, entitled Agricannus; with Macrobius in his fore-named Booke of Somno Scipionis, and thereunto consenteth Iulius Firmicus, naming expressly the same signes, yet there are others, who haue thought, that in the recited instant, all the Planets were found to be in coniunction with the Sunne. Agallierus the Monke, in his booke of the Ages of the world, saith, that the ancient Indians held firmly this opinion.

As for my selfe, I am of the minde, that God did then place the Planets in such distant places, one from another, especially from the Sunne; that on such a chosen day, each one of them might illuminate the earth with his beames. VVhich could not be, they being in coniunction with the Sunne, because his presence, within any certaine space or proportion, so hindereth the greatest luster of their light, that they cannot bee discerned on the earth. Notwithstanding, being created according to the will of God; it sufficeth (saith Augustine) that they were made, in being perfected by the hand of God, whose works (in what kinde soeuer they be) are perfect.

CHAP. XXXV.

That men may learne examples by Birds, Flies, Wormes, and other Creatures, to leade the course of a vertuous life.

WE have already declared in our first Volume, how Beasts & Birds haue entrusted men in a great part of the properties appertaining to Physicke, by purging and preserving themselves from harmes: now I am briefly to entreate, how their example may be profitable to vs, both in body and soule. And vndoubtedly, whosoever wil consider & contemplate, on the nature & properties abiding in beasts; shall not only thence deriue good instructions for life and safety of our humane bodies; but rules and examples beside, of good, commendable, and vertuous manners. VVhy do not men strive to purchase peace with their neighbours; seeing what concord and amity is among Beasts of all kindes, and how they keepe company, vnite themselves together in each kinde, and stand defensue one for another? VVhy shame they not to bee slothfull and negligent, perceiuing & observing the care and sollicitude of the Ant, and after what manner shee maketh her prouision in Summer for VVinter? VVhat vassals and subiects are they, that will not serue and honour their good Princes; noting with what loue and obedience poore little Bees serue and honour their King, and that which they doe for him beside? In which respect, such Commonweales as haue no Prince, but enioy all things in common; may not they learne an example of liuing in peace and concord, by imitation of the poore Ants, who are so great in multitude, and yet preserve an order of peace & iustice among themselves? And why do not great Lords and Princes consider, what manifestude and clemency all of them are obliged vnto; when when they but behold the King of Bees, who doth no offence, neyther worketh any displeasure to the very meanest and filiest of his Subiects?

Our great Seigniors and high-minded men, may learne humility of the Camel, who falleth on his knees, to accept a heauy and ouer-chargeable burden. True and loyall married couples, may take example by the good custome among some Birds: especially Pigeons and Turtle-Doues, noting both in the Male and Female, that nothing but death can impeach their continuall companying, or hinder eyther from their first choyce. I finde written moreover, concerning Turtle-Doues, that the one dying, the other remaineth in the condition of a widow, & finisheth the remainder of her life in widowhood. Saint Ambrose writeth, that widowed women may learne chastity of the Turtle-Doue. As touching continency, all beasts (well neere) do lesse vs therein: for after the Female hath conceived, she neuer seeketh, or hath any appetite to the Male, till her full time be determined. They are likewise examples of temperance in all vices; because they eate no more then sufficeth to maintaine life, neyther sleepe they any more then necessity requireth.

To keepe our selues well and discreetly governed, the Peacoke may be our direction. For defence and maintenance of our houses, as also to liue liberally among our people; what better enstrueter can we haue then the Cock? For he will part with the food out of his owne Beake, to giue it to his Hens, and when need requireth, he will expose himselfe to all perils in their defence. The great obligation, wherein children standeth bound to their Parents, and how they ought to serue and asist them, the Storke plainly witnesseth; by nourishing their aged Parents in their owne nests, as they fedde and maintayned them in their youth. VVhy should not men blush and be ashamed, to commit frailty and sinne through feare, knowing the inuincible courage of the Lyon? Faithfullnes, friendship, and acknowledgement of receiued benefites, wee are notably taught by the meere behaviour of Dogs; that neuer forget the Masters they haue serued, but continually loue them, neuer ceasing to bee thankfull for the poorest bread they eate. If a man would benefit himselfe by the vse of another mans goods, yet without any harme or injury done him; let him looke vpon himself in that case, as doth the little laboring Bee, who draweth honey out of the fairest flowers, and yet no wrong at all done to them.

VVhat meanes and order we should daily obserue, for healthfull conseruation of our liues, we are not to learne it of any one beast onely, but of many, that know what food doth soonest offend them, as also in with-drawing from one place to another, according to the mutation of times. Moreover, they will liue in such foyles, as are answerable to their complexions and natures: excelling men herein as well as in all other things beside. VVhy should not men be absolutely learned, and ignorance in any thing quier removed from them, being enclued with hearing and vnderstanding: considering that an Elephant learneth what soeuer is shewne and taught him; a Dog attaineth to many familiar qualities; and Birds can speake, being thereto enstrueted? He that heareth the Nightingales sweeter Songs, and some other melodious Birds; how can he but desire to sing musically? VVhy couer not men to be excellent builders, beholding the Swallows skilfull enstruction; what arte shee declareth for her owne dwelling, and with what diuersity of matter it is composed? VVhat better Geometry, then that of the Spider? VVhat better Astrologie, then that of the Ant, & likewise of a Fish (according to Galen) called Pranoscopus, that hauing but one eye, yet looks continually vp to heauen? Haue men reason and iudgement, and yet are meere ignorant in these Artes?

How many other industrious and excellent perfections are in brute Beasts, which men either haue, or els may learne of them? Passages vnder ground, making of Caves in the earth, and knowledge how to dwell in them; came they not first from the Mole and Fox? There are certaine little VVormes, in Latine called erres, that enstrueted the meanes and manner to spin and make Silke. Next, the Spider taught how to spin thred for cloth, & so to make Nets, whereby to catch Birds. Men learned of Beasts to swim in the water, for there is no one of them but can do it; it; yet men cannot attaine thereto, but by practise and learning. What Physicall rules they haue taught men, and knowledge in the changes of weather, hath else where bene handled; and yet notwithstanding we make such prouision of them, for supply of hunger and other necessities, as I know not how wee could liue without their helpe. Our garments are made of theirs, and their flesh is our best Food: both being brought home to vs from far remote countreys, and whatsoever is needfull for vs, or else we send abroad to seeke after them. They labour, and make the earth pliable for our vse; whence we get our bread, and the best fruites of sustentation, so that they are the principall maintenance of our liues. And although they are sore laboured, pursued, and euill entreated by the spleenes of men: yet are they still obedient, both knowing, following, and euermore dooing them seruice.

Come we now to examples concerning the soule, as a matter of higher Argument, and much greater importance. Whence can a man deriue more worthe examples, both for vertues and good manners meete to bee in men, then from beasts? All those Vertues which naturall Philosophers hath perswaded vnto vs, are grounded on the similitudes and parables of Beasts: Oratours serued their turnes with them; and all that haue spoken or written elegantly.

God and his Saints haue oftentimes in sacred Scripture, instructed and perswaded vs, by the properties & conditions of beasts, for the perfection of our liues: And the rules of vertue and ciuil manners do tell vs, that we should be wise like Serpents, and simple as Doves; milde, like Lambes, and strong and constant as Lyons. In like sort, by the example of brute beasts, and voide of reason; we are taught to become men reasonable, and spiritually affected. We finde many Offices & estates in the Church, applyed and figured by beasts, and according vnto theyre properties. By Oxen (according to S. Augustine, writing on the second Chapter of S. Iohn) such men are signified, as doe publish and preach the holy Scriptures: for they till and plough vnto the knotted furrowes of our soules, sowing therein the feedes of Gods most glorious word.

Saint Paule, and Salomon in his Proverbs dooth say; Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the Ox that laboureth, Rom. 9. verse 7. Proverb. 12. chap. 14. The holy Doctors and Preachers of the Church, that with Doctrine and good Lawes doe gouerne and defend it, are termed Doves. Saint Gregorie speaks it on the wordes of Job: Quorum non dignabar patres ponere cum canibus gregis mei. The same Saint Gregorie, inuitheth men vnto a contemplatiue kinde of life, by the imitation of Goates, that alwayes climbe vp to high places, spending there their time in contemplation as it were: the word is in Leuiticus seem his motiue thereto, Leuitic. chap. 14. verse 12. Out of the Herd let the Goate be offered.

Moreouer hee sayth, that Preachers should imitate the Cocke; as grounding on the wordes of Job, who sayde; Who hath giuen vnderstanding to the Cock? Adding withall, that (like vnto the Cocke) they proclaime (in the dimme darkenesse of this life) the glorious light that is to come, and awake vs with their shrill voyces, out of sleepe sinnes, saying vnto S. Paul, The night is past, and day approacheth. And againe, It is time for vs to arise from sleepe, looke abroad yee in it, and sinne not. Phil. 1. 12.

The Church her selfe, pure, holy, and immaculate, is compared to a Dove, as Salomon declareth in his Canticles, saying, Beholde, thou art faire my Loue, thine eyes are like the Doves. And againe in another place; O my Loue, O my Dove. We see likewise, that of the foure Euangelists three are figured by three beasts. If I would continue longer on this argument, I could finde matter enough to discouree on. But above all other, that of our Saviour and Redeemer Iesus Christ, is the most notable, who would be figured by a Beast, as Saint Iohn speaketh in his Apocalypse, chap. 7. verse 14. The Lyon of the Tribe of Iudah hath bene victorious. And David sayeth in his Psalmes, Roulez thee like a Lyon: and so in many other places, which were too long to rehearse. Beside, in S. Mathew, he teacheth himselfe a Hen, saying; O Ierusalem, Ierusalem, how often would I haue gathered thee & thy children together, as the Hen gathereth hir Chickens vnder her wings, and ye would not.

Seeing then, that Christ compareth his workes to the properties of Beastes; men may doe well to receiue instruction from them, in leading a good and holie life. And contrarywise, what shame and confusion is it to vs, to see and know, that all kinde of Beasts do follow theyr nature perfectly, and men (onely made reasonable) vse their owne so badly, abusing that super-excellent gift very viciely. For, he that ought most to honor God, doth most of all offend him, and farre beyonde all other creatures, dayly perverting and adulterating his workes. So that there are some beasts, of whome men may learne much better examples, then from some kind of men among whome they liue. For they haue more apprehension of iustice, and offend farre lesse, then men that know what is their dutie, and yet do it not. And therefore, God deliuereth it by the mouth of the Prophet Esay: The Ox knoweth his Maister, and the Ass his Cribbe; but Israel knoweth him not, neither will his people vnderstand him.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of neglect in Martiall Discipline: and of an Army of Christians, that lost all their liues thorow drunkennesse, and want of following such courses, as are to be obserued in Military affaires.

WE haue already declared, how Bayan Chin'an, Lieutenant to the Tartarian Emperor Cublay, and director of his Military forces, tooke 12 Cities and Townes (by assault) at his first arriual, for conquering the great Province of Maugy, before all the rest would yeeld themselves tributary. One of them was utterly ruined to the very foundation and wote vsef then any other known to be, during the Empire of the said Cublay, which was about fixe and thirtie yeares. This City being called Cinginguy, was the second in wealth, greatnesse, and multitude of inhabitants, in all the rich Kingdom of Maugy, and the reason why it was wholly ruined, followeth thus.

Bayan Chin'an, pursuing his Conquest, was much withstood by a strong Cattle, builded vpon a small mountaine, very potent by naturall situation, and artificiall construction. For therein continued a powerful Garrison, that preyed with great advantages on his Army, passing along the foote of that Mountain; and this was the reason that he would proceed on no further, till hee had deriued some better correspondencie from the people of this Garrison. And yet he durst promise to himselfe, that (within some small distance of time) he should preuaile against them, as afterwards it proued true indeed.

In the meane while, and at the selfsame instant, the explorators or scouters were come backe againe, which he had sent to surueigh the citate of Cinginguy, who made knowne vnto him, that the people of the City appeared, to knowe nothing of his coming, neyther stood vpon any guard, or preparation to expect a besieging. This was the cause (to the end hee might the better preuent them) that hee forthwith dispatched a squadron of thirty thousand men, armed at the lightest, and very good soldiers, all of them being Christians (which came among the Tartarian Idolaters in open liberty, as the Iews haue done from all times of antiquity, and dayly yet doe) to possesse themselves of the Citie, and hinder the entrance of any succour, either by way of power or victuals, assuring them likewise, that he would follow them with all convenient speede that might be.

This warlike band of Christians, made such speedy diligence, that (within three dayes) they arriued before the City, and lodged themselves on the Ditches side, before any in the City took notice thereof. They made the salado in so many several places, and disposed their Archers so conueniently, as no one durst peep out at any of the bartlements, or else be scene vpon the walls. At length, the besieged (imagining the army that had thus engirt the, was of far greater strength then it was indeed) being overcome with feare, rendered themselves to the discretion & mercy of the assaillants, to the end, they might finde the more humanity at their handes. The gates being set open, the Christians entred, taking vp their lodgings in seueral all houses. And these indiscreete conquerors, without any other care of military discipline, finding the City well furnished with victuals of all kinds, & whatsoever was needfull for the life of man, but (above all) plenty of rich wines, fell to making themselves good chere, and drinking hard, after the German manner, till they fell asleepe with the pots in their hands.

Heereupon the Inhabitants finding themselves deceived, in yielding to so final a number of people, that had no better vnderstanding in actions of warre, neither knew how to vse the fortune so fauorably befall them; began to consult heereon with themselves, and how to worke their deliuerance with as much speed, as they were ouer-hasty in losing their liberty. The Christians continuing in this drunken behauiour, without any feare at all of the Inhabitants, that lodged the Soldiers in their houses, though not halfe so many as they were able to receiue: in one night it was fully concluded, that euery host should kill his guest, and so it was accordingly performed. Afterward, they threw their bodies into the great Riuer, which runneth through the midst of the City, saying: These are the renegadoes and faith-breakers, men of Christian Religion, of whom the Emperour Cublay made no great account, but suffered them to carry crosses in their Ensigns, to shame them the more in their least ill demeanour.

Bayan Chinjan having surprized the foresaid castle, commanded the Captains to be hanged, and the castle quite ruined; but pardoned all the Soldiers, journeying afterward on to Cingunguy: but with in lesse then two dayes journey, hee heard how all his men were slaine, therefore hee brought a strong siege before the City. The Inhabitants were not a little amazed, beholding so powerfull an Army to beset them, and conducted by a man so highly renowned: and therefore desired to haue a Parlee before any farther proceeding, which accordingly was granted. The summe of the Oration propounded by the Deputies, was thus. That they could not deny a manifest truth, but that they had slaine a number of runnagates, masterlesse men, seeming to haue no faith or honesty, neither shewing any open appearance of their power; but suddenly surprized their City. Moreover, that they were all Christians, more addicted vnto wine and gourmandizing, then any respect of valour or manhood: in which regard, his losse was little or none at all, by the deserued ouerthrow of such carelesse people, and they humbly desired pardon, if in this case they had transgressed.

Bayan returned his answer brauely and succintly, saying. His men were warriors, that had no other direction in this businesse, but commaund from his mouth onely, and he had bene well informed, that they tooke the City by faire order of warre: without offending any one in their goods, or violence offered to wiuers or maydes, or disarming any Inhabitant, but suffering them to continue in their wonted liberty. And in being Christians, they did not therefore deserue death, because he could as well tolerate them, as his Master the Emperour, who not onely suffered them to liue in all his Countreies, without the least injury done vnto them; but hauing conquered kingdoms, wholly Christian, he neuer innouated any matter touching their Religion. Moreover, the greater part of Officers in his Court, and the very worthiest of his warriors, were all Christians, being men more faithful, and of better conuersation, then any other Religion whatsoever.

As for their neglect in martiall discipline, he did not allow it in them, but confessed, that they deserued death therein, which (doublelesse) himselfe would haue inflicted on them; condemning them for being so forward, in executing any authority belonging onely to him. For which boldnesse (with an absolute denyall of pardon or fauour) he vowed to be reuenged on the men of Cingunguy, because (against all fidelity) they had slaine his men, and declared monstrous ingratitude for their extraordinary manuetude, and thence hee pretended to deriue his reason.

Having thus spoken, hee would seee them no more, but in this rough manner dismissed them. About an houre after, he caused his Rammes and other Engines of battery, to be mounted, for destruction of the walles and houses, and within few dayes after, tooke the City, with-without any great resistance, putting all the men to the sword, that were about 14 yeares of age. Women and maides went whither themselves pleased; but for their children, they were sold at the Out-cry, to such as would giue the most money for them: for there were certaine merchants of Beugala, which followed the army that did trafficke onely in such kinde of merchandise, and so do yet to this day. Afterward, vittalles beginning to faile, & the warlike enemy, hauing emptied the citie of all the wealth; he commanded it to be set on fire, and that the Army should not boudge thence, vntill it were intirely consumed.

Wine and gourmandizing more respected then manhood.

This City was seated on a goodly riuer, large and nauigable, whereby, the comerce which it made with other countreies, returned infinite profit and wealth. In it was made the richest & fairest works wrought with the needle, both in cloth of golde and siluer, as no other City in the world beside had the like. There were also made sumptuous vessells (for all vses) both of gold and siluer, by most admirable cunning, and in great plenty: besides costly clothes of fine Cotten, gold, siluer and silke. In briefe, it was the second or third City (as then) in all these parts: which was thus destroyed, thorow the drunkenness of Nestorian Christians, and by the perfidy of the Inhabitants, euen as Troyan Ilium by luxurie & whoredome, since when it was neuer rebuilded, or inhabited. The ruines thereof may be seene to this day, wheratt full many haue stood amazed, it being situated in so potent a territory: but it was thought to proceed from the iust displeasure of God, and for the bloody massacre of so many Christians.

We may now come homeward, and nearer to our selues, and speake of the like faults, as were among these Tartarian Christians, thorow lacke of knowledge, how to make vse of victorie: As not long since was seene in France, in the first battaile giuen neere to Dreux, betwene the French Protestants and the Catholics, in the yeare of our Lord God, 1562. vnder Charles the ninth. The Prince of Conde, being chief of those Protestants, ouerthrew with his horsemen (wherein he was strongest) a great part of the royall Catholique Armie, whereof Anne de Montmorancy, Constable, was commanded, putting the 22000. to flight, and the sayde Constable taken prisoner. Heereupon the Protestants becoming insolent, and vterly vnmindfull of Militarie Discipline: left their ranks, brake their order, gaue the chase, pursuing after certayne runaways, and, before they had fully conquered all their enemies; they beganne to gape after pillage with the Smart-ruttors and Launce-knights. During this disorder, Monseigneur de Guise, a most wise and valiant Captaine, hauing yet left him a band of braue men, beganne to set vpon those negligent fellows with his troups, and running on the Protestants (who imagined they had the whole victorie, which they knew not how to holde) got the better of them, and tooke their Leader the Prince of Conde, becoming sole master of the field. Thus, not knowing how to vse Militarie Discipline, by breaking their ranks, following the chase, and scrapping for pillage, when they had gotten the better of their enemies safe and soundly, yet not hauing wholly overcome them: did they not declare themselves very vnadvised, becoming guilty and well worthie of death? I am perswaded, that all good warriors are of that opinion. And so it happened, for thus the Protestant Armie was vterly soyled, which was (wellneare) equall in great Captaines and good men to the Royall. But such losse doth almost daily happen, where Military discipline is not obserued.

They that (at so cheape a rate) tooke the City of Cingunguy, should haue disarmed the Citizens, seized the strongest places into their owne power, planted Courts of guard in all the most frequented parts of the City, imprisoned the chiefeest persons, expelled out of the City, a greater part of the youthfull and most forward men, if they would not kill them, without vsing such courttesie after conquest. In so doing, they had kept Martiall discipline on foote, and auoyded the losse of their owne liues, besides the reproach, to their great infamie. But ouer and above all the rest, they should (as much as in them lay) haue abstained from wine: For there is not anie thing, that sooner bereaueeth a

The Duke of Bourgogne being before Morat, the people of the Towne yffied forth, and to belet the army of the Bourguignons, that twenty thousand (according to Faficius Temporum) or twentie two thousand, and feuen hundred (according to the Mother of Histories) were ther flaine. The fpoyle was left to the Duke of Lorraine, who likewife recouered Nancy againe afterward.

A third time likewife, the Duke of Bourgogne, being not a little offended, that he thould be vanquished by fo mean a Prince as the Duke of Lorraine, and hee recouering the Towne of Nancy; returned with fresh forces, and befiedged it againe with fourteen thousand able fighting men, beside some other bandes in expectation. The Duke of Bourgogne was difcomfited, and all his army; but by no means could his body be found. The Bourguignons could not be perfuaded that hee was flaine: but hauing escaped from the field, hee had retired himselfe into Germanie, where he had vowed to liue in feuen years penitence.

There were some Bourguignons, that made sale of precious Stones, Horfes, and such like things, to be paid againe vpon his retume, and namely to Brachelles, in the Dioceffe of Spire. There was a poore Begger, imagined to bee the Duke of Bourgogne, because he liued in the like estate of penance; which made verie many trauaile to see him, and bestow verie liberal almes on him. Naucler reporteth, that he saw the poore man begging in the same place. The King of France, hearing the Duke was dead, seized on Montdidier, Roye, Peronne, Abbeville, Montreuil, Arras, Hel din, and the two Bourgoynes, to wit, the Dutchy and Countie. The men of Gauant tooke his Daughter, that gouerned his estates very poorly, and married her as herselfe pleased; she hauing put to death the Chancellor, and other of his best officers. Thus you see how this great Prince ended his life, accompanied with many misfortunes.

Vladislaus, King of Poland, a young and gallant Prince, was called by the Hungarians to be their King, in the year 1440. He conceiued such glory by seeing himselfe King of two such mighty Kingdomes, that he thought himselfe to be inuincible. Whereuppon, being desirous to imploy his valour in warre against some enemy, that might take notice of his courage and power; he brake faith and Truce, which the Hungars had made with the Turk the year before. In the first battayle hee gaue, he was quickly slayne, and hadde but a short enioying of his two Kingdomes; for, thorow the inconstancie of Fortune, his pretended felicity was soon cut off, and all his supposed power viterly quailed.

The Emperour of the East, Constantine Paleologus, some fifteen yeares after, went to keepe company with this young King Pladislaus, in the other world. For Constantinople, the Metropolitane Cittie of his Empire, was besiedged and taken by Mahomet the second, sir-named the Great, thorow the negligence and treacherie of Iohn Iustinian of Genewey, Mahomet hauing 300000. able fighting men, and four hundred Cannons, and the siegde continued threescore dayes. The Emperour (in flight) was met withall, and murdered neere vnto the Gate: his head being carried vpon a Launces point, and so conueighed quite thorow the Cittie, while his bodye was trodden vnto dirt with their feete. Mahomet also caused a Crucifixe to bee erected, and wrote vpon it (in scornefull derision) these words: This is the GOD of the Chritians: commanding likewise, that euery one should cast dung and filthe vpon the fayre Image.

The wife to the Emperour, with her daughters, and the very Noblest Ladies attending on them, were brought before Mahomet; and after all reproach was done vnto them, euen the verie greatest Villanies in the world, their bodies were hacked and hewne in peeces.

Some few dayes after, there was another King (but of three dayes standing) put to death likewise. VVhich I may by no means omit, because it was the forenamed Iohn Iustinian the Genowefe, a treacherous Villaine. For hee had concluded with Mahomet, that if he would make him King, he would yeelde vp Constantinople, or the meane whereby hee shoulde surprize it. Mahomet kept promise with him; for hee constituted him a King for three dayes space: and on the fourth day, hee commanded his head to bee smitten off. So sayeth Faficius Temporum; and that that these things happened in the year, one thousand foure hundred fifty three, about the Moneth of May.

I am sure few people are ignorant, in what Bedes of state, the noble Kings of France vse to take their rest, and vnder what rich Paultions; yet the inquiry of our times hath bene such, that a Kings lodging hath bene more vile then a laxe. I speake of King Charles the eight of that name, who returning home to his kingdom, hauing bene in Italy, where hee conquered the kingdom of Naples, and the great Dukedomes of Calbria and Apulia, and wonne two famous battailes in those countries: vpon a Palme Sunday Eue, being the seuenth of Aprill, one thousand foure hundred ninety eight, lea- ding his Queene by the hand, Anne of Bretaigne, to see certaine Gentlemen play at the Tennis, in a Ditch belonging to the Cattle of Amboise, entred into an olde, broken, vncovered Gallery, where he gaue his head a great blow against the vpper part of the doore, albeit himselfe, was but of lowe stature. Taking hold vpon some staves for his recovery, neere vnto a noyome place, where euery one that would (by custome) vied to let passe their vrine, and other vnleaneesse of the body; he was contented to endure it, and stood there merrily discoursing with the Queene, and other noble persons there present, judging who deserued best of them that played. Suddenly hee was overcome with a rheume or catarre, which taking from him all his strength and motion in euery part of his body, he was deperied likewise of his speech. This was perceived by all there-about him, and how he lay vpon the ground, in such a foule, stinking, and vnseemely place; yet no one had the care, or subiect-like affection, to beare him thence to his royall bed, which was not about twenty paces off.

Hee languished in this manner, for the space of nine houres, and dyed there in that noyome place. Is it not a matter deferring admiration, that so worthy a King should dye in fo vile a place, being in his owne house, among his Officers, and many of the Nobility? Hee that was King of the sweete smelling Floure-de-Luce, to expire and end his dayes, not among heards or flowers of pleasing fanour: but in a place full of filth, then which, the whole world could yeelde no worse?

And to shew yee, that great Princes are as subiect to dye in battailes, as the simplest Souldiours: Iames, King of Scottes, may serue as an example, for hee was slayne in the field, with two Bishoppes, a great part of his Nobility, and many men of warre, that happened in the year of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and thirtee. And the year following, Iohn d'Albrat King of Nauarre, lost his Kingdom, which was leazed by Ferdinand King of Spain, because hee stood accused by Pope Iulius, for assisting King Lewes the twelfth, in warre against him; and about all, in the battaile of Raenens, which vntill this present his Successours neuer enioyed.

And Lewes Sforza, Duke of that rich and goodly Countrey of Milaine, was led prisoner into France, lying before the French to Nauarra, a Cittie of his Dukedome; hee was confined to imprisonment, within the great Tower of Bourge, where (in great want and pueritie) hee finished his dayes.

What shall wee say of King Francis, first of that name, the Father of Learning, whose wisdom and magnanimitie, could not warrant him against the Ambuscadoes of Fortune, no more then any of them before remembered? Hee fell into the hands of Charles the fifth, Emperour, enuious of his greatness, and had bene his competitor in the Empire, opposing himselfe against many of his desires. Hee detained him prisoner about a year; during which time, hee had a most yke-some disease, which compelled him (for enioying of his liberty, to yeeld to many hard and grievous conditions. As, to renounce and disclaime a multitude of rights, which hee pretended to many Dukedomes, Earledomes, and Kingdomes. Beside, he gaue fo great a quantity of money, as well for his expences, as discharge of martiall affaires, and his ransom withall, that his kingdom (for euer after) felt the smart thereof.

And not only haue temporall Princes felt the rigour of inconstant Fortune; but Ecclesiasticall persons also, howeouer high and great degree they haue carried in the world. For in the year 1410. Pope John was put in prison, flying from the Councell of Constance, and was given in guard to Lewes, Count Palatine, deposed from his Office, and one called Martine, filte of that name, seated in his place, being likewise very inhumanly entreated, for the space of three yeares. Afterwardes, by the humanity of the sayde Martine, he was set at liberty, and created Cardinal: whereby euery man may perceiue, how farre this John was falne from his former degree.

In the year 1466. the byshop of Liege brother to the fore-named Duke of Bour-gogne, by his wife, who was of the house of Bourbon: beside his Office, hee was a Prince of the Empire, a Lord both spiritual and temporal, and holding fo great and rich a country, as that of Liege. He was taken prisoner by his subiectes, and a great fort of his friendes and officers (among whome were ten Abbots and Promotoraries, or Canons, al of worthy houses) massacred in his presence, & himselfe kept prisoner for long time, and in great misery. At length hee got safely away, hauing (by money) won his Guards consent thereto.

At Florence, in the year 1448. the arch-Bishop of the saide place, being clothed in his habiliments of Priest-hood, and saying Masse, was sodainely surprized, and hanged or strangled at a Vindow, by the hands of the hangman; beside foure Cardinales massacred by the people, and many other Ecclesiasticall persons beheaded.

And although Popes (as hath bene held) by their great and spiritual authority, might impose silence vpon Christian Princes, from vndertaking warres, but to keepe themselves in quiet, and likewise to take armes at his command, for the affairs of the Christian world; yet it came fo to passe, that Pope Clement was taken prisoner, and locked vp seuen months in place in his castle of S. Angelo, kept by a guard of Spaniards and Germanes, and all of them Heretikes (wel-neere) about him. The City of Rome was greuously pilld, the Temples ransacked and prophaned; all which happened by the Souldiers of Charles the fit, a Catholike Emperour, in the year 1527.

After these men of Ecclesiasticall profession, it shall not differ much from our purpose, to conclude this chapter with the death of three potent Kings, that died all three in one day: to the end, we may obserue how vnhappy it is for Princes, to thinke that they can well manage their affaires, in meddling amongst the quarrels of other Princes, as pusiant euery way as themselves.

It came to passe, that two Princes contended for the kingdome of Fez and Marocco, situated in Barbarie of Affrica: the one of them being named Muley Mahumet, Nephew to the other that demanded these Realmes, called Abdelmelec. This Mahumet, who enioyed those Kingdomes ten or twelue yeares, was assayed three or foure times by Abdelmelec, hauing gotten assistance of the Turke, and wonne til the best in foure fought batailles. So that in the end, the inhabitants of Fez and Marocco receyued Abdelmelec: because Mahumet was a Tyrant, had very few friends, contemning euery one, and trusting altogether in his strength and Treasures, after all his losses in those former Batailles.

Sebastian, King of Portugall, made offer to him of his ayde and friendship, but hee refused it; vntill such time as hee had neyther place or person to retire vnto, nor any to follow him. Moreover, he had spent the great heapes of money which hee had gotten together during his reigne, & now withdrewd himselfe into the Mountaines, which are fixe Leagues off from the City of Marocco. There hee liued about seauen or eight months, like a theefe or robber, with some few companies of needie persons, which yet againe were cut off by the troopes of Abdelmelec; and Mahumet constrained to wander in the most vnacceffable places of the Mountaines, where he endured a million of miseries, for the space of a whole year, liuing in continual feare and distrust, onely thorough his conceyued opinion, that hee should be taken, or betrayed in his secret walks.

In breefe, necessity compelled him to repent his former denials, and to require the friendly succour offered him; by that braue King of Portugall, Sebastian: vnto whom he sent an expresse Messenger, (afterward) two of his Captaines. In the meane while, he found the means to defend cent from the Mountaines, by wayes of little or no resort, and fought for his safety in * Tanger, a Towne which the Portugales held in Affrica: where hee was well entertained by the Gouernour, who knew some part of Sebastians minde towards him, and therefore furnished the two Captaines with well armed horsemen, for the dispatch of their Embassie in Portugall.

King Sebastian was very ioyfull to see these Ambassadors, because he was naturally addicted to Armes, and the disposition of his person (ioyned with his height of courage) incessantly spurred him on to this businesse. And in this respect, hee did but awaite some apt ouerture, for making his passage into Affrica, forming his pretext, vpon an earnest desire (as hee would alwayes say) which hee had to aduance Christian Religion, and to extirpate that of the Mahumetists. Whereupon he suddenly promised (without any better consideration of the businesse) to succour Muley Mahumet, and to re-seate him in his kingdomes againe: hee made promise (I say) to such a one, as himselfe had before fought vnto, for this effect, by so large a passage ouer the Seas, and two severall times had bene misprized by him. The Pope, the King of Spaine, and many other great personages, could not dissuade him from this enterprize, but still hee persisted in treading the path vnto his owne death, death that followed him so hard at the heeles. So did hee set on into Affrica, with thirtene hundred sayle, as well of great as small Vesselles in that Fleet, the very sayrest and goodliest that had bene seene in those times. His Army was composed of Lance-knight, Spaniards, Italians, Portugales, and some small number of Affricane Moores, which took part with the Portugizes, and thirty fixe Pieces of Ordnance for the field, well fitted and furnished. In all, there was not aboute sixteene thousand men of warre; setting aside the Souldiours boyes, Waggoners, Strumpets, Calltadours, and other such like people very vnprofitable for the field.

Abdelmelec (wee may well perfwade our selues) slept not all this while carelessly, for hee brought threecore thousand men to the field, as well Pykes as Harquebuziers, and twenty fixe Peeces of Orde-

nance for the field, well appointed & gouerned by most expert men. Abdelmelec was very sorry, that hee should haue any conquest against Christians, in regard he bare them much affection; not because he feared the Portugizes, but as fore-seeing, that Barbary would proue the graue to the King of Portugall who (indeede) was too weake to encounter with him, that went so farre beyond him in power.

And in due consideration of the case, hee would oftentimes thus say to himselfe, King Sebastian should bee more respectiue, then so vnadvisedly to runne vpon his owne ruine: for he would take two kingdomes from me, which in right and iustice doe appertaine to me, and giue them vnto a Negro, wherein Christendome can no way be eased or accommodated, neither is it a thing which God (being iust) will permit.

The report and rumors spread abroad, of Abdelmelec valiant carriage, was the cause that euery one came to offer him seruice and obseyance; and from euery Province they brought him goody presents and gifts of inestimable value. Many Christian Kings rooke pleasure in his friendship, and embraced him as their kinde well-willer; esteeming themselves happy in his acquaintance. So that from diuers places, great store of Christians traiailed into his countries, where they receiued gracious entertainment, and hee shewed them much better countenance, then to any other men that resorted thither, helping them liberally in their necessities. On the contrary part, Muley Mahumet oppressed the Christians all the time of his reigne, or else permitted, that all greeses and molestations should be done vnto them: wherefore King Sebastian (in this respect) did greatly forget himselfe.

Now to deteine the Reader no longer in suspence, the two Armies disposed themselves for the encounter, and mette in a field, which contained aboute two miles in spaciousnesse, so euen and plaine, that there was nor any tree, grasse, brambles, or stones, to offer the least hinderance. The Army of Sebastian, had the River of Arache behinde it, and that of Abdelmelec, the River of Alcassar. Muley Mahumet, for whom this Tragedy was to be acted, contrary to his oath and promise, did not bring with him any ayde for Sebastian; hating
